

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at <http://books.google.com/> liberally construed, and its provisions are sufficiently comprehensive to be applicable to the present case.

But, apart from the statute, the ruling was free from error. The general doctrine is thus clearly stated in 11 Enc. of Law, 427-429: "As a general rule, an estoppel may arise from silence as well as words; but this is only where there is a duty to speak, and the party upon whom the duty rests has an opportunity to speak, and, knowing the circumstances requiring him to speak, keeps silent, or, in other words, where his silence amounts to a fraud, actual or constructive. This doctrine proceeds upon the ground that he who has been silent as to his alleged rights when he ought, in good faith, to have spoken, shall not be heard to speak when he ought to be silent. It is not necessary that the duty to speak in such case should arise out of any agreement, or rest upon any legal obligation in the ordinary sense. It arises whenever the principles of natural justice require the disclosure. It may be stated as a general rule that, if a person having a right, and seeing another person about to commit, or in the course of committing, an act infringing upon that right, stands by in such a manner as really to induce the person committing the act, and who might otherwise have abstained from it, to believe that he consents to its being committed, he cannot afterwards be heard to complain of the act. This, it has been said, is the proper sense of the term 'acquiescence,' which in that sense may be defined as 'quiescence' under such circumstances as that assent may be reasonably inferred from, and is no more than an instance of the law of estoppel by words or conduct. Thus, it has been held that, if the owner of the goods stands by and voluntarily allows another to treat them as his own, by which means a third person is induced to purchase them bona fide, the former cannot recover them from the purchaser." After the plaintiff placed his mortgage on record, he did not owe any further duty to persons having dealings concerning the horse, other than not to mislead them by his conduct. He did not owe them the duty of giving them that information which the record of the mortgage disclosed, and the testimony does not show that he failed, in any other duty.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

(77 S. C. 393)

KAYLOR et al. v. HILLER.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. July 17, 1907.)

JUDGMENT—COLLATERAL ATTACK—PRESUMPTION—SERVICE OF PROCESS.

Where a minor was living with the executor of the mother's estate, service of summons on such minor in action by the executor without proof of service on the parent, or without any showing in the proof of service as to absence of the father from the state, raises a presumption of jurisdiction of the minor which cannot be brought in question collaterally.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 30, Judgment, §§ 933, 936.]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Richland County; Memminger, Judge.

Action by Felicita Rosetta Kaylor and others against Louis Paul Hiller. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

De Pass & De Pass and Bellinger & Welch, for appellants. W. S. Monteith and Lyles & Macmahon, for respondent.

GARY, A. J. This is an action to recover the possession of certain lands described in the complaint. Lewis H. Trevett died in 1878, leaving a will, whereby he devised his whole estate to his wife during the term of her natural life, and after her death then to be divided into four equal parts, one-fourth of which was settled in trust upon each of his granddaughters, Felicita Embleton and Josephine Embleton. After Trevett's death an action was instituted by Louis Paul Hiller, the executor of the will, seeking to marshal the assets and to sell the real estate to pay debts, alleging that the estate was insolvent. To this action both Felicita and Josephine Embleton were made parties. They were then minors under 14 years of age. Their mother was dead, but there was testimony that their father then lived in the city of Columbia. The return of service on the summons was as follows:

"Personally came John McCabe, who, being duly sworn, sayeth on oath that he served Louis H. Embleton, George W. Embleton, Felicita Rosetta Embleton and Josephine Embleton, Martha Hiller and Mary Trevett each with copies of this summons personally, and left the same with them.

"John McCabe.

"Sworn to and subscribed before me, July 10, 1878.

"[L. S.]

W. S. Monteith.

"Notary Public."

On the 6th of July, 1878, a petition was filed for the appointment of a guardian ad litem for said infants, in which it was stated that they had no general or testamentary guardian, and that they resided with L. P. Hiller, the plaintiff in that action. The present action was commenced in May, 1904, 26 years after the land described in the complaint was sold by order of the court.

After quoting authorities in support of his ruling, his honor, the presiding judge, thus stated his reasons for directing the jury to render a verdict in favor of the defendant: "This is not a direct action to try to set aside the decree on the ground of fraud or irregularity in the decree, but it is for the possession of real estate in which these parties seek to establish title to real estate as not being bound by this decree, as not having bound the parties to the action by reason of alleged irregularity, appearing on the face of the record. Now, in this case it appears in the record that the service was complete; that is, complete and proper service, such as is recognized by the court as proper service, was made. The only question upon which that service is sought to be shown to be improper is that the absence from the state of South Carolina of the father does not affirmatively appear on the record. The record is silent on the point whether the father was in the state or not. As a complete service is shown in the absence of the father from the state, and the record being silent upon the point whether he was absent or not, and the other facts stated throughout the record tending to show that the father must have been absent from the state, I think the law will come in and presume that the father was absent from the state, and that the service was complete. It seems to me from these circumstances and the record before me that complete service on these minors is shown, that they were proper parties to the action, that they were represented before the court, that the case was carried through the usual course before the master, who reported upon it, and a decree rendered, and they are barred from recovery in this action; therefore, there is nothing to submit to the jury. The foreman will come forward and write the verdict, 'We find for the defendant the land in dispute.'

The record shows that a copy of the summons was served upon each of the said infants; that they had no general or testamentary guardians, and resided with L. P. Hiller; and that he was the plaintiff in that action. As he was the plaintiff, and the infants resided with him, it was not necessary to serve a copy of the summons on him. Kennedy v. Williams, 59 S. C. 378, 38 S. E. 8. If it appeared from the record that the infants did not have a father or mother, or that neither was in the state, there would have been a complete compliance with the requirements of the section of the Code regulating the mode of service on infants as it stood in 1878, which is identical with section 155, subd. 2, of the present Code of 1902, which is as follows: "If against a minor under the age of fourteen years, to such minor personally, and also to his father, mother or guardian, or if there be none within the state, then to any person having the care and control of such minor, or with whom he shall reside, or in whose service he shall be employed." But in this case the record is silent as to the alleged jurisdictional defect upon which the appellants rely.

In Ex parte Gray, 48 S. C. 566, 569, 26 S. E. 786, the court says: "All presumptions must be indulged in favor of the jurisdiction of a court of general jurisdiction. To avoid such a judgment for want of jurisdiction, the jurisdictional defects must appear affirmatively on the record." The rule is thus stated in 1 Greenleaf on Ev. § 19. "Conclusive presumptions are also made in favor of judicial proceedings. Thus, the records of a court of justice are presumed to have been correctly made, a party to the record is presumed to have been interested in the suit, and after verdict it will be presumed that those facts, without proof of which the verdict could not have been found, were proved, though they are not expressly and distinctly alleged in the record, provided it contains terms sufficiently general to comprehend them in fair and reasonable intendment." In the case of Clemson College v. Pickens, 42 S. C. 511, 518, 20 S. E. 401, 404, Mr. Chief Justice McIver says: "The practical inquiry is whether the record as set forth in the 'case' shows on its face that the court did not acquire jurisdiction of the person of defendant, and not whether such record is defective in showing that all of the steps necessary to acquire jurisdiction had been taken." The court, in the case of Galpin v. Page, 18 Wall. (U. S.) 850, 21 L. Ed. 959, says: "The presumptions which the law requires in support of the judgment of superior courts of general jurisdiction only arise with respect to jurisdictional facts, concerning which the record is silent. Presumptions are only indulged to supply the absence of evidence respecting the facts presumed." The following language is used in the case of Hahn v. Kelly, 34 Cal. 391, 94 Am. Dec. 742: "Undoubtedly, if the record was silent as to what was done in respect to some material matter, we will presume that what ought to have been done was done. If there is no proof of what was done in obtaining service in the record, we will presume that legal service was in fact made." The foregoing language from the last two cases was quoted with approval in the case of Rice v. Bamberg, 59 S. C. 498, 38 S. E. 209.

The presumption is that those facts existed, without which the court could not have rendered judgment. Therefore the jurisdictional defect relied upon by the appellants, to wit, that it does not appear upon the face of the record that the father was absent from the state, cannot be sustained. When it does not so appear, it cannot be brought in question collaterally, but the party relying upon the defect must have recourse to a direct proceeding. Sanders v. Price, 56 S. C. 1, 33 S. E. 731.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

(77 S. C. 870)

MARTIN v. SOUTHERN RY. CO.

1. CARRIERS—INJURY TO PASSENGERS—WANTONNESS.

In an action for injuries to a passenger, where the evidence showed that the conductor promised a young girl that he would assist her when her station was called, that at her station her father asked the conductor if any passengers were aboard for that station, and that he said he did not know, and that the train was not stopped at the usual stopping place and passengers were not instructed to get out, it is sufficient to carry the case to the jury on the question of wantonness.

2. SAME—CONDUCT OF TRAIN—STATIONS.

A railroad is bound to stop its train at the usual stopping place and for sufficient time; but, if there were other circumstances requiring extra care, then the carrier was bound to give such extra care to a passenger, and if it failed to do that, and some volunteer attempted to aid the passenger in her efforts to alight, and, while exercising ordinary prudence in so attempting with the aid of such volunteer, the passenger was injured, yet if the negligence of the carrier in failing to stop its train at the proper place, or for a sufficient time, or to render assistance, was the cause of plaintiff's injury, then the carrier would be liable.

3. SAME—EVIDENCE—QUESTIONS FOR JURY.

Where a carrier fails to stop its train at the usual stopping place for passengers, it should suppose that a passenger would attempt to alight from the moving train if he could do so prudently; and, when a stranger assists the passenger in so doing and the latter is injured, it is for the jury to determine whether the negligence of the company or that of the assisting person was the proximate cause of the resulting injury.

4. SAME—NEGLIGENCE.

Failure to stop a passenger train at the usual place for letting off passengers is prima facie negligence.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Fairfield County; Klugh, Judge.

Action by Elizabeth B. Martin, by guardian, against the Southern Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. E. McDonald, for appellant. Buchanan & Hanahan, for respondent.

POPE, C. J. Elizabeth B. Martin, by her guardian ad litem, Milo B. Martin, brought this action to recover damages of the defendant railway company for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by the negligent, reckless, and wanton conduct of the defendant in failing to stop its train at the usual stopping place at Dawkins, a station in Fairfield county, and put her off. The facts are as follows: On December 2, 1904, plaintiff, a girl of 13 years of age, being in Spartanburg attending school and wishing to go home for the holidays, purchased a ticket for Dawkins, her home, and boarded defendant's train. As the conductor was taking her ticket she requested him to help her off at her destination. He instructed her to keep her seat until the station was called, and promised then to see her off. When the train reached Dawkins it went into a side track to allow the up train to pass. It then came back on the main line, and, according to plaintiff's testimony, stopped some distance above the regular stopping place. Here one or two passengers alighted, and as many got on. Plaintiff, thinking the train would stop at the regular place, kept her seat. Her father, who was at the station to meet her, asked the conductor if there were any passengers for that place, and on being motioned to the car nearby which the conductor was standing he boarded it. On failing to find his daughter, according to his testimony, he again asked the conductor if there were any passengers for Dawkins, and he responded that he did not know. Soon after the train began to move away, and plaintiff, who was in an extra car behind the one her father had entered, seeing her father and recognizing that the train was not going to stop again, jumped or was pushed off and injured. The defendant denied that it was negligent, and for a defense alleged contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff. The case was tried at the March, 1906, term of court for Fairfield county, and resulted in a verdict of $1,000 for the plaintiff. Judge J. C. Klugh, the presiding judge, having refused a motion for a new trial, the defendant appealed.

1. The first exception alleges error on the part of the circuit judge in refusing to charge the jury that there was no evidence in the case tending to show wantonness, willfulness, or recklessness on the part of the defendant. Could such a charge have been made? The testimony was uncontradicted that the plaintiff asked the conductor to help her to alight from the train at Dawkins. He admitted himself that he told her to keep her seat until the station was called and he would then help her off as best he could; that he was approached by plaintiff's father and asked as to passengers for Dawkins. The overwhelming weight of the testimony was that the train stopped from 80 to 90 yards from the regular stopping place. From these facts the jury might infer that there was such a disregard of plaintiff's rights as to amount to recklessness; that the conductor's mind adverted to his duty, and he failed to perform it. It is possible that the crowded state of the train might have led him to forget for the time his promise to the plaintiff, a matter as regards which he did not testify, but we are unable to think it at all probable that he could honestly have failed of his duty after being questioned repeatedly concerning it. The question was properly submitted to the jury.

2. The circuit judge charged the jury as follows: "The defendant was bound, not only to stop its train at the usual place, and for sufficient time, but if there were other circumstances which required extra care, even beyond that, on the part of the defendant, then the defendant was bound to give such extra care to the plaintiff, and, if the defendant failed to do that, and some volunteer, attempting not to perform the duties of the defendant, but attempting to aid the plaintiff in her efforts to alight from the train, and in that way, the plaintiff, while exercising the prudence that the circumstances required of her, and that a person of her situation, of her condition, would ordinarily exercise, was attempting to alight from the train, if you find that some person, whether it was a stranger or passenger, or who, was attempting to aid her in her own efforts to do what, under the circumstances of the situation, she thought was proper and prudent for her to do, then, although that conduct on the part of the stranger along with the conduct of the plaintiff herself may have led to her getting off the train and suffering injury, yet if the negligence of the defendant brought about that state of things, and if the negligence of the defendant in failing to stop its train at the proper place, or for a sufficient time, and in failing to render any extra assistance, if it was required by the circumstances of the case, if that was still the direct and proximate cause of the plaintiff's injury, then the defendant would still be liable, notwithstanding the fact that some other person may have also intervened and aided the plaintiff in her efforts to get off of the train." Defendant objected to this charge, on the ground that it in effect instructed the jury that the act of a third person in putting plaintiff off of the train could not be the proximate cause of her injuries if defendant failed to stop its train at the usual place, and for a sufficient time, or did not render the assistance required, and that by such charge his honor made the standard of plaintiff's negligence, or contributory negligence, to depend entirely upon "what under the circumstances of the situation she thought was proper and prudent for her to do," instead of the standard prescribed by law. Reference to the charge will clearly show that the last objection cannot be sustained. The circuit judge was very thorough in his charge as to contributory negligence. He charged that the law requires of every person ordinary care, the care that a person of ordinary prudence under the circumstances would exercise; that the law does not hold a person of immature years to the same rule of measurement that it does a mature person; that if a child is a mere infant that it is not capable of negligence, but if it is advanced in years and developed in intelligence to such an extent that it is capable of exercising some degree of care, then the law requires of such child the exercise of such a degree of care as a child of ordinary intelligence, ordinary development of a similar age, would naturally or usually exercise; that in this case, if the jury find that the plaintiff was a child of immature years, and that for a child of that degree of development she exercised the ordinary care that a child of such age would exercise, then the negligence could not be imputed to her under the circumstances; that if she did not exercise such care, then she could not recover. This was the tenor of the judge's entire charge. That the propositions of law laid down by him are correct is too evident to require citation of authority.

3. The other question is fraught with more difficulty. It is well settled that before recovery can be had for negligence it must be shown that the injury was the proximate result of that negligence. If there be an intervening cause, and the prior cause do nothing more than give rise to the circumstances under which the injury occurs, then such prior cause cannot be said to be the proximate cause. There may be, however, a succession of causes, and the first be the proximate cause. Cooper v. Richland Co., 78 S. C. 202, 56 S. E. 958; Mayrant v. City of Columbia, 57 S. E. 857. The above charge sought to convey to the jury that if a third person aided the plaintiff in doing what under the circumstances she would have done without such aid, then his act could not be the proximate cause of her injury. It was perfectly natural for the defendant to suppose that if it failed to stop its train at the usual place at Dawkins that plaintiff, if she thought she could prudently do so, would endeavor to get off. If she were injured in getting off, provided she exercised ordinary care, then the failure to stop would be the proximate cause of her injury. Now, if a third person helps her to do what she intended doing on account of the negligence of the defendant, it seems perfectly clear that the act of such third person was not necessarily the proximate cause, but merely an aid in carrying out the result which would inevitably have followed from her own independent act. The distinction between this case and the cases cited by the appellant is that there is evidence from which the jury might infer the plaintiff was about to alight without respect to the interference of the third person, while in those cases the result took place merely from a condition brought about by the third persons, without whom it would not have happened. Take, for instance, the case of Snyder v. Railway (Colo. Sup.) 85 Pac. 686, where the conductor on a crowded train pushed a passenger against another, who pushed him off of the train. There no injury would have resulted had it not been for the act of the passenger. If the plaintiff had no intention of alighting from the train, but was pushed off by a third party, there would be room to assign the act of such third party, and not the negligence of the defendant, as the proximate cause. But, inasmuch as in this case there is evidence from which the jury might infer the defendant was negligent, and that the plaintiff could have undertaken to alight from the moving train in the exercise of ordinary prudence, and would have done so of her own volition, the fact that an outsider aided and accelerated her act of alighting would not be sufficient to take from the jury the consideration of what was the proximate cause. In this view of the case we think the circuit judge was correct, and properly submitted it to the jury to say whether the defendant's act was the proximate cause of the injury.

The consideration of these questions disposes of the motion for a new trial which was made upon the grounds: (1) That there was no evidence of wantonness or recklessness; (2) that the injuries were caused by the act of a third person. There being evidence on both of these issues, this court cannot interfere. Miller v. Railway, 69 S. C. 116, 48 S. E. 39; Wilson v. Assurance Co., 51 S. C. 549, 29 S. E. 245, 64 Am. St. Rep. 700.

4. The fifth exception alleges error on the part of the circuit court in charging that it is prima facie negligence on the part of a carrier to fail to stop its cars at the usual stopping place. It is the duty of railroads to stop their trains at their stations. Civ. Code 1902, § 2134; Cooper v. Railway, 61 S. C. 345, 39 S. E. 543. It has been held in a number of cases that failure to give the signals at crossings as required by statute is negligence per se. Bowen v. Railway, 58 S. C. 223, 36 S. E. 590; Smith v. Railway, 53 S. C. 121, 30 S. E. 697. We are unable to see that this statute is more mandatory than the one now under consideration, or that one duty is superior to the other. Hence the only logical and consistent view is that it is negligence per se for defendant to fail to stop its train at its station. What is stopping at a station is a question which must be left to the jury. Cooper v. Railway, supra. Likewise what would constitute the usual stopping place must be a question for that body. It may include a greater or a less distance, according to the circumstances. The stopping place is the station, and if the jury find that the carrier did not stop at the station then prima facie it is negligent. This contention is overruled.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

SMITH v. WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH CO.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. July 13, 1907.)

1. TELEGRAPHS—DELAY IN DELIVERY—NOTICE OF CLAIM.

Where a telegraph blank stipulates that a claim shall be presented in writing within 60 days, suit within that time for negligence in delivery of message is a sufficient presentation.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 39, Telegraphs and Telephones, § 42.]

2. APPEAL—CONFLICTING EVIDENCE.

Where the evidence was conflicting as to the efforts of a messenger boy to find the addressee of a telegram, a judgment finding negligence will not be disturbed.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, §§ 3935-3937.]

3. TELEGRAPHS—DELAY IN DELIVERY.

Where a telegram, delayed in delivery, announced a death, and requested an answer as to whether addressee could come, he has a cause of action, there being nothing to show that he could not have gone to the funeral.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 45, Telegraphs and Telephones, § 33.]

4. SAME.

A telegraph company is not liable for delay in delivering telegram received after closing hours, if the office hours are reasonable, and the message so received may be transmitted within a reasonable time after the office is open next day.

5. TRIAL — INSTRUCTIONS — REQUEST — NECESSITY.

Where, in an action against a telegraph company for negligence and wantonness in the transmission of the telegram, evidence is received as to the wealth of the company, it is not reversible error, where a nonsuit is granted as to the cause of action for wantonness, to fail to instruct not to consider such evidence on the cause of action for negligence, in the absence of a request therefor.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 46, Trial, § 623.]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Kershaw County; Hydrick, Judge.

Action by C. L. Smith against the Western Union Telegraph Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Geo. H. Fearons and Nelson & Nelson, for appellant. Clark & Von Fresckow, for respondent.

WOODS, J. The plaintiff recovered judgment for mental anguish, alleged to have been produced by the negligent delay of the defendant in delivering the following telegram, sent by plaintiff's father, concerning the death and burial of his brother: "Apex, S. C., Oct. 4. C. L. Smith, Camden, S. C. Anderson dead; be buried here tomorrow; answer if you can. Rufus Smith." The issue of punitive damages was eliminated by an order of nonsuit, from which the plaintiff has not appealed.

1. The main contention of the defendant is that a nonsuit should have been ordered, as to the whole case, on several grounds submitted to the circuit judge. The first was the failure of the plaintiff to show that any claim for damages was presented in writing within 60 days after the filing of the message. This point might be dismissed with the remark that the stipulation relied on does not appear on the telegram as printed in the record. But as the remarks of the circuit judge, in considering the motion, show that it was before the court, we will not refuse to pass on it. The suit was brought within 60 days after the alleged breach of duty and consequent damage to the plaintiff, and the question is whether this was a sufficient compliance with the requirement that the claim should be presented within 60 days. While the requirement that the claim for damages shall be presented within 60 days has been held valid, because essential to the proper investigation of claims, nothing should be added to the meaning of the language which the company has itself employed in imposing the condition. The general rule is that the liability attaches by operation of law as soon as damage to the plaintiff results from the negligence of the defendant, and there is nothing in the stipulation to the contrary. The stipulation is, if the person injured fails to make claim under the liability within 60 days, the liability which had been incurred comes to an end and the cause of action is gone. But the suit is a presentation of the claim in writing, and under the stipulation preserves the liability. The defendant's counsel relied on the case of Western Union Telegraph Company v. Yopst (Ind.) 11 N. E. 16, in which the court takes his view; but the weight of authority supports the conclusion we have reached. Phillips v. Telegraph Co., 95 Tex. 641, 69 S. W. 63; Telegraph Co. v. Trumbull, 27 N. E. 313, 1 Ind. App. 121; Telegraph Co. v. Mellon, 33 S. W. 725, 96 Tenn. 66; Telegraph Co. v. Henderson, 18 Am. St. Rep. 148, 89 Ala. 510, 7 South. 419; Bryan v. Telegraph Co., 45 S. E. 938, 133 N. C. 603; Shearman and Redfield on Negligence, § 554; Thompson on Elec. § 256.

2. The defendant relied on two additional grounds in the motion for nonsuit: "Because there is no evidence which shows or tends to show any damage, actual or nominal, of which the failure to deliver the telegram in question was the proximate cause, which would entitle the plaintiff to recover under the mental anguish act; * * * because the testimony does not show any negligence on the part of the defendant in its efforts to deliver the telegram." The message was received at Camden at 2:47 p. m., and delivered the next day. There was undisputed evidence of great diligence on the part of the operator to locate the plaintiff and deliver the telegram. The negligence, if any, was on the part of the messenger boy. The plaintiff was living with Mrs. Joyner, two blocks from the telegraph office; and the operator in the afternoon directed the messenger to try to find plaintiff there. He failed to go to the Joyner house, saying he could not find it, but the witness McCain testified that he told him where it was. The messenger denied McCain's statement, but clearly the evidence made a question of fact for the jury as to his negligence. The position that there was no evidence of actual damage to the plaintiff was equally untenable.

3. When plaintiff received the belated telegram, he replied: "Message received too late; wife sick; will come to see you as soon as she is better." There is nothing in this message to indicate that plaintiff would not have gone to the funeral of his brother, notwithstanding his wife's illness, had he received the message in time; and he testified he would have gone.

4. The defendant next contends the circuit judge erred in not charging the following request, without modification: "If the jury find the defendant used due diligence and could not locate the plaintiff, C. L. Smith, and asked the sender for some address, and such address was not received until after closing hour, then the company was under no duty to deliver the message until within a reasonable time after the opening hour the next day, provided such opening and closing hours were reasonable. And if the company should, under such state of facts, deliver the message within a reasonable time after the opening hour next morning, then the jury should find for the defendant." After reading the request to the jury, the circuit judge said: "Now, with regard to that request, I charge you this, that the telegraph company has the right to establish reasonable rules for the conduct of its business, has the right to establish reasonable office hours, and, if the office hours established as shown by the testimony are reasonable, then the company is not bound to either deliver, send, or receive a message after office hours, unless, by a course of dealing, by a custom, it has so conducted itself as to have waived the office hours which it established. That is a question of fact for the jury. I will read it to you. If the office hours established for an office are reasonable, the company is under no duty to transmit messages except during such hours, and a message offered for transmission, after the close of such office, at the office of destination, may be transmitted within a reasonable time after the office is open next morning. The failure of the agent to observe the office hours when habitual may be shown in evidence as indicating that no rule on the subject prevails or was enforced; but proof merely of the occasional transmission or delivery will not be sufficient to establish waiver of the regulation. You see, an occasional violation of office hours, sending, receiving, or delivering messages out of office hours, occasionally, would not be sufficient proof to show waiver of office hours; but it must be habitual, and it is for the jury to say whether or not it is so habitual as to amount to waiver of office hours." The charge was in accord with the opinion expressed in Bonner v. Telegraph Co., 71 S. C. 303, 51 S. E. 117, and Harrison v. Telegraph Co., 71 S. C. 386, 51 S. E. 119.

5. The defendant charges the circuit judge erred "in not instructing the jury that they were not to consider the testimony introduced, as to the wealth of the company, in granting a nonsuit as to the cause of action based upon wilful tort, the error being that it tended to mislead the jury and to lead them to believe that they could, on account of the wealth of the company, increase their verdict for mere negligence; whereas, such testimony could only apply to the cause of action based on willfulness and wantonness, and the jury should not have been so instructed." Testimony was received as to the wealth of the defendant, which defendant's counsel concedes was competent, before the cause of action resting on the alle gations of willfulness and wantonness had been disposed of by nonsuit. No request having been made for an instruction that this evidence could not be considered under the cause of action for negligence, the omission of the court to give instruction cannot avail defendant. Jennings v. Manufacturing Co., 72 S. C. 420, 52 S. E. 113, and authorities cited.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

(77 S. C. 385)

STATE v. JONES et al.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. July 16, 1907.)

1. DISTURBANCE OF PUBLIC ASSEMBLAGE—RELIGIOUS WORSHIP—EVIDENCE.

Where there was evidence that a congregation was broken up by a riot about 40 feet from the church, the parties engaged therein were guilty of disturbing public worship.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 17, Disturbance of Public Assemblage, §§ 1-5.]

2. CRIMINAL LAW—DISTURBING PUBLIC WORSHIP—JURISDICTION—EVIDENCE.

On a trial for disturbing public worship, the fact that one of the witnesses was struck by a plank is insufficient to show that weapons were actually used so as to make the offense beyond the jurisdiction of magistrate.

3. SAME—HEARSAY EVIDENCE.

Declarations by a participant during the progress of a riot are not hearsay.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 14, Criminal Law, § 809.]

4. DISTURBANCE OF PUBLIC ASSEMBLAGE.

Evidence as to the conduct of parties arrested for disturbing religious worship by a riot after congregation has dispersed is competent.

5. SAME—PUNISHMENT—EXCESSIVE FINE.

Sentences of $30 and $17.50 for disturbing public worship are not excessive.

Appeal from General Sessions Circuit Court of Anderson County; Watts, Judge.

Berry Jones and others were convicted of disturbing religious worship. From an order modifying the judgment of a magistrate, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Martin & Earle, for appellants. Julius E. Boggs and E. M. Rucker, Jr., for the State.

WOODS, J. The defendants were convicted before a magistrate of disturbing a religious congregation. The sentence of the magistrate was as follows: "Berry Jones, Andrew Jones, Adger Davis, $50 each or 30 days. Cephas Davis, Jim Jordan, Tom Mauldin, $25 each or 30 days." On appeal the fines of $50 and $25 were held excessive and reduced to $30 and $17.50. The other grounds of appeal were overruled. The defendants, Berry Jones, Tom Mauldin, and Jim Jordan, then appealed to this court.

1. There is no ground to ask for reversal for lack of evidence to support the charge of willful disturbance of a religious congregation. There was evidence of a congregation engaged in worship being disturbed and broken up by a riot, about 40 feet from the church, in which each of the appellants were active participants. The disturbance was a result so certain to follow the riot that it must be held to have been within the contemplation and intention of all who participated.

2. The position is taken that the judgment should be reversed, because "the magistrate did not have jurisdiction of the offense herein; it not being affirmatively shown that no weapons were actually used and no wounds inflicted." The part taken by the appellants was detailed at length by the witnesses, and there was no evidence of the use of an instrument by any of them, which the magistrate and circuit court as a matter of law must have held to be a weapon. One of the witnesses, it is true, testified that the defendant, Berry Jones, hit him three times with "a piece of plank." The Century Dictionary gives these comprehensive definitions of the word "weapon": "(1) Any instrument of offense. Anything used, or designed to be used, in attacking an enemy, as a sword, a dagger, a club, a rifle, or a cannon. * * * Any object, particular, or instrumentality, that may be of service in a contest or struggle, or in resisting adverse circumstances, whether for offense or defense. Anything that may figuratively be classed among arms." A piece of plank might be so large as to fall clearly within the definition; but obviously it might be so small as to be useless for attack or defense. As the witness said nothing of any inconvenience resulting from being hit three times with this piece, there was good reason for the magistrate and circuit court to regard it not a weapon. The position taken—the exception that the use of weapons should be presumed in order to make out the greater offense and oust the jurisdiction of the magistrate—is obviously without support.

3. Adger Davis was one of the defendants, and we are at a loss to understand on what ground his remark to Moses Chapman, made while the riot was in progress, could have been excluded as hearsay.

4. The position that testimony as to the continuation of the riotous conduct of the parties after the congregation had left the church should have been excluded cannot be sustained. Evidence as to the entire disturbance was competent to show the gravity of the crime.

So far from the reduced sentences being excessive, as the appellants allege, they have reason to be grateful for the clemency of the circuit judge.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

(77 S. C. 399)

DEMPSEY v. WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH CO.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. July 23, 1907.)

1. TELEGRAPHS—DELAY IN DELIVERY—PLEADING.

In an action against a telegraph company for delay in delivering a telegram, allegation that "notwithstanding the defendant had every reason to know the message was important" is sufficient to apprise defendant of plaintiff's intention to prove notice of reasons why message was important.

2. SAME.

Whether one subjected to damage by the negligence of a telegraph company in delivering a message used all reasonable means to minimize his mental suffering is for the jury.

3. SAME—NOTICE OF DAMAGES.

It cannot be said, as a matter of law, that on a failure of a telegraph company to deliver a telegram "Will be to Perry on morning train; meet me there"—resulting exposure and sickness could not have been anticipated.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 45, Telegraphs and Telephones, §§ 64, 74.]

4. TRIAL—ERROR IN INSTRUCTION—CURE BY OTHER INSTRUCTION.

An instruction that punitive damages could be awarded for failure to deliver a telegram is not reversible error, when followed by an instruction that it could only be given on proof of willfulness.

5. SAME—WILLFULNESS.

Unexplained delay in delivery of a telegram for nearly 17 hours raises the question of willfulness.

6. TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where the judge gave a charge in general and comprehensive terms covering the law of the case, and no requests were made for a more definite statement thereof, no error is shown.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 46, Trial, § 628.]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Bamberg County; Gage, Judge.

Action by A. R. Dempsey against the Western Union Telegraph Company. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Jno. R. Bellinger, for appellant. J. F. Carter, for respondent.

WOODS, J. A statement of the facts alleged in the complaint is necessary to an understanding of the appeal. December 28, 1905, was the day appointed for the marriage of plaintiff at the residence of Roland Williams near Wagner, S. C. On December 27th, while on his way from his home at Midway to meet the appointment, the plaintiff became so ill that he was obliged to stop over at Bamberg. Having then missed the only train which would have taken him direct to Wagner by the hour appointed, he delivered by the hand of his agent, G. H. Smoak, to the defendant's agent at Bamberg, for transmission, this message: "Number 1 Rx. Sent by G. Received by W. Check 10, paid. Received at 6:20 p. m. Check 12-27, 1905. Dated Bamberg, S. C.

To Roland Williams, Wagner, S. C. Will be to Perry on morning train; meet me there. A. R. Dempsey." When Smoak handed in the message, he offered to pay any extra charge for sending the message to the home of the addressee; but the agent declined the offer and agreed to deliver the message promptly. The purpose of the telegram was to get Roland Williams to meet plaintiff at Perry's, so that he might be at the appointed place at the time fixed for the marriage. The allegations as to the defendant's notice of the importance of the telegram, the failure to deliver, and the damage which ensued are thus made: "That, notwithstanding that defendant had every reason to know that the message was important, defendant willfully, wantonly, recklessly, and negligently failed to deliver said message as directed and as agreed upon, it not being delivered until the following day about 11 or 12 o'clock, and not then until plaintiff's friend called for it. That defendant had on previous occasions delivered messages to the home of the said Roland Williams without extra charges, but willfully, wantonly, recklessly, and negligently failed to deliver this message as directed and as agreed upon, and by defendant's willful, wanton, reckless, and negligent failure to deliver said message when plaintiff arrived at the town of Perry on the morning train there was not one there to meet him, and after waiting there for some time and no one having come for him, the hour having arrived when his marriage was to take place, he endeavored to get a conveyance, but after trying diligently he failed to get any conveyance whatever, and was forced to go afoot in the rain, it having been raining hard all the morning, and plaintiff was unable even to procure an umbrella. That plaintiff walked a mile or more before he succeeded in getting a horse and buggy, and was then compelled to take an open buggy, without an umbrella, and drive several miles exposed to the hard rain, not being able to reach the home of the young lady whom he was to marry until long after the hour set for the marriage. That when plaintiff arrived at the home of the young lady whom he was to marry he was wet through and through, was cold, greatly pained, and humiliated, and suffered great mental anguish on account of not being able to meet the lady at the appointed hour, and on account of his appearance, his clothes being wet through and through. That from the exposure to which plaintiff was subjected, being already in ill health, he was caused several weeks' serious illness, was confined to his bed, attended by a physician, and came very near losing his life, having not yet fully recovered and perhaps being injured for life, and having to pay a heavy doctor's bill." Damages were demanded for "mental anguish at not being able to meet the lady whom he was to marry at the appointed hour, the serious illness which he has suffered, his impaired health, and the heavy doctor's bill which his illness has cost him." Plaintiff recovered judgment, and the defendant appeals. Of the defenses set up, the appeal concerns only the general denial and the allegations that plaintiff could have avoided mental anguish and the exposure resulting in sickness by hiring a conveyance at Perry's.

1. Before entering on the trial, defendant's counsel made a motion to strike from the complaint all allegations relating to mental anguish, on the ground that the message failed to show on its face that neglect in delivering would result in mental anguish, and the complaint contained no allegation of notice to the defendant of the mission of the plaintiff. The circuit judge deferred the decision of the motion until the plaintiff offered evidence of notice to the defendant's agent, and then by admitting the evidence over objection practically decided the motion. In this there was no reversible error. The allegation "that notwithstanding the defendant had every reason to know that the message was important" is objectionable for indefiniteness. But it was sufficient to apprise the defendant of intention of the plaintiff to bring home to defendant notice of the reasons why the message was important. The remedy was a motion to make the allegation definite and certain. Wingo v. Inman Mills, 76 S. C. 552, 57 S. E. 525.

2. The plaintiff offered evidence tending to establish every allegation of his complaint. It is true it was his duty to use all reasonable efforts to hire a conveyance and to use all other practicable methods to prevent or minimize the mental anguish or other suffering resulting to him from defendant's negligence. But this rule cannot avail the defendant, for the plaintiff testified that he did make considerable effort to hire a conveyance. Whether he used reasonable diligence in his efforts was a question for the jury.

3. It cannot be said, as a matter of law, the exposure and sickness were results which could not have been contemplated by the parties, which the defendant could not have reasonably anticipated from a failure to deliver the telegram. There was evidence that the defendant knew of plaintiff's sickness at Bamberg, and the high consideration which required him to use his utmost efforts to reach his destination by the hour appointed for his marriage. Whether reasonable prudence required the plaintiff under the circumstances to wait until he could obtain a conveyance which would have protected him from the weather, and whether the exposure and sickness was due to the dereliction of the defendant as a proximate cause, were questions for the jury. The case is quite different from Jones v. Telegraph Co., 75 S. C. 208, 55 S. E. 318; Carter v. So. Ry. Co., 75 S. C. 355, 55 S. E. 771; and Keys v. Telegraph

Co., 76 S. C. 301, 56 S. E. 962. In these cases the exposure and sickness were not made necessary by the negligence of the defendant, but arose from the choice of the plaintiffs to undergo hardships which the defendant's negligence did not make necessary. Here, on the contrary, the evidence tended to show the exposure became unavoidable on account of defendant's negligence. The case, therefore, falls within the principle of Toale v. Telegraph Co., 76 S. C. 257, 57 S. E. 117; Machen v. Telegraph Co., 72 S. C. 256, 51 S. E. 697; Pickens v. Railroad Co., 54 S. C. 498, 32 S. E. 567.

4. The circuit judge, at the request of plaintiff's counsel, did erroneously, and no doubt inadvertently, charge the jury that primitive damages might be recovered for mere negligence. But subsequently the mistake was corrected by instruction so explicit that the jury could not fail to understand that punitive damages could not be recovered for negligence, but only on proof of willfulness.

5. The defendant did not attempt to explain the conduct of the operator at Wagner in making no effort whatever to deliver the telegram for about 17 hours. It was therefore for the jury to say whether he wantonly or willfully withheld it. Young v. Telegraph Co., 65 S. C. 93, 43 S. E. 448; Willis v. Telegraph Co., 73 S. C. 385, 53 S. E. 639.

6. There are numerous exceptions setting forth propositions of law which it is alleged should have been charged. The circuit judge made a charge to the jury covering in general and comprehensive terms the law bearing on the cause. The defendant made no request for elaboration or a more definite statement of these general propositions, and hence he cannot be awarded a new trial on this ground.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

KIRBY et al. v. WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH CO.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. July 23, 1907.)

1. TELEGRAPHS—DELAY IN DELIVERY—SPECIAL DAMAGES.

A message: "Your mother is dead; come to-night"—would not lead the telegraph company to infer that delay in delivery would cause the addressee to miss a comfortable conveyance sent for her.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 45, Telegraphs and Telephones, § 65.]

2. EVIDENCE—OPINION EVIDENCE.

A witness not an expert should not give an opinion of a person's physical condition.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 20, Evidence, § 2235.]

3. TELEGRAPHS—DELAY IN DELIVERY—NOTICE.

Where the addressee of a telegram, because of failure to deliver it, was compelled to sit in a cold waiting room at night, she having no money to pay hotel bill, she cannot recover damages therefor, unless the carrier had notice.

4. SAME—DELIVERY.

"Deliver," as applied to a telegram, means "transmit and deliver."

5. EVIDENCE—OPINION EVIDENCE.

It is within the discretion of the trial judge to allow a telegraph messenger to testify what would be a reasonably quick delivery of a telegram.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 20, Evidence, § 2193.]

6. TELEGRAPHS—DELAY IN DELIVERY—EVIDENCE.

An addressee of a telegram, in an action for damages, makes out a case by proving long delay in delivery and damages resulting therefrom.

7. TRIAL—ARGUMENTS OF COUNSEL.

Statement of attorney for plaintiff, in action against telegraph company for failure to deliver message, that if the telegram had been sent to any prominent man in the city "the company would fall over itself" to deliver it, was prejudicial and ground for reversal.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 46, Trial, § 803.]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Union County; Memminger, Judge.

Action by Mamie G. Kirby and Wm. F. Kirby against the Western Union Telegraph Company. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Geo. H. Fearons, Evans & Finley, and J. Ashby Sawyer, for appellant. S. Means Beaty and De Pass & De Pass, for respondents.

POPE, C. J. Plaintiffs, Mamie G. Kirby and her husband, William F. Kirby, brought this action against the defendant telegraph company to recover actual damages alleged to have resulted from the negligent delay in delivering the following telegram sent to the plaintiff Mamie G. Kirby by her father, J. E. Kinsey: "Your mother is dead; come to-night." The message, according to the testimony, was received by the agent at Branchville, the home of J. E. Kinsey, between 7 and 8 o'clock on the morning of the 3d of March, 1904, and was delivered to the plaintiff at Union about 2 o'clock p. m. of the same day. Plaintiff alleges that by reason of the delay it was impossible for her to reach Branchville that day, the noon train, the only day train south, having already gone; that she was compelled to leave Union at 9 o'clock that night, and arrived at Columbia at 11 o'clock, where she was forced to remain in the depot all night, suffering much from the severe cold; that upon reaching Branchville, and learning that it was about time for the funeral, being unable to obtain other conveyance, she was forced to take passage with a mail carrier who proved very obnoxious to her; that she arrived too late for the interment; that she suffered much mental anguish by reason thereof; and as a result of her stay in the depot and her ride through the country in the uncomfortable vehicle of the carrier she took cold and became sick, and was put to much inconvenience and expense. Defendant denied that it was negligent, and sought to show that, even if it was, its negligence was not the proximate cause of plaintiff's damage. The case was heard at the November, 1903, term of the court for Union county, and resulted in a verdict of $500 for the plaintiff. Judge Memminger, the presiding judge, having overruled a motion for a new trial, the defendant appeals.

1. The first exception alleges error: (1) In admitting the testimony of the witness J. E. Kinsey that he sent a comfortable buggy by one of his sons-in-law to meet plaintiff at Branchville about 6 o'clock in the afternoon, expecting her to be there about that time in response to the telegram. (2) In allowing said witness to state the physical condition of the plaintiff at the time she reached his house from the cemetery. We think this exception should be sustained. There are a number of cases recently filed by this court holding that the plaintiff can recover only for damages such as the defendant had notice of, or as a reasonable person should have known would result from delay in delivery. Doster v. Telegraph Co., 57 S. E. 671<sup>1</sup>; Du Bose v. Telegraph Co., 73 S. C. 220, 53 S. E. 175; Arial v. Telegraph Co., 70 S. C. 418, 50 S. E. 6. The telegram here under consideration on its face contained nothing that could put defendant on notice that, if it was not delivered promptly, plaintiff would be deprived of the convenience of a comfortable buggy in which to make the trip to her father's. Such a result was not in the contemplation of the parties, and therefore defendant cannot be held responsible. Evidence tending to show damage resulting therefrom was, hence, incompetent.

2. As to the second ground of the exception, it was not shown that the witness was in a position to testify as to the physical condition of the plaintiff. It does not appear that he was a physician or an expert in such matters. His opinion was, therefore, not admissible. He could have stated the facts from which the jury might have inferred plaintiff's condition. 17 Cyc. 25.

3. The second exception alleges error in allowing plaintiff to testify that she stayed in the waiting room because she did not have money to pay hotel expenses and was a stranger in Columbia. Damages resulting from these causes could not be other than special damages, and for them it is well settled the defendant cannot be held responsible, unless notice is given. Jones v. Tel. Co., 75 S. C. 208, 55 S. E. 318.

4. The circuit judge instructed the jury that by delivery here was meant transmission and delivery. The defendant contends that delivery does not include transmission. We think the circuit judge was correct. To deliver means to hand over. To transmit is to communicate; to send from one person to another. The terms imply to some extent the same idea; the distinction being that the latter implies separation of the actors. There is nothing to lead to the conclusion that while a message is passing over the wire it is being transmitted, and while in the possession of the messenger boy, being carried to its destination, it is being delivered. We think the whole constitutes one transaction, the passage of the message between the sender and the person to whom it is sent.

5. The fourth exception alleges error on the part of the circuit court in refusing to permit the witness J. R. Mathis, a messenger boy, to testify as to what would be a reasonably quick delivery in this case. The admission of such testimony is largely in the discretion of the trial judge, and will not be ground for reversal, except where it is clearly harmful to the appellant. 17 Cyc. 28; Watts v. Railway, 60 S. C. 70, 38 S. E. 240; Tinsley v. Telegraph Co., 72 S. C. 352, 51 S. E. 913. That the exclusion here could not have been harmful is very evident. The witness was allowed to state the facts, and from these the jury could form their own opinion.

6. The circuit judge charged the jury that unreasonable delay created the presumption of negligence; that the defendant was called upon to relieve itself of the presumption, and, if it failed, then they must inquire whether Mrs. Kirby had shown that she suffered by reason of that negligence. Defendant contends that this relieved the plaintiff from proving her case by the preponderance of the evidence. It is well settled in this state that long, unexplained delay gives rise to the presumption of negligence. Poulnot v. Telegraph Co., 69 S. C. 545, 48 S. E. 622; Hellams v. Telegraph Co., 70 S. C. 83, 49 S. E. 12; Arial v. Telegraph Co., 70 S. C. 423, 50 S. E. 6. Therefore, if such delay is shown, and it is not explained, clearly the preponderance of the evidence is that the company was negligent. If the plaintiff then go further and show that she suffered by reason of that negligence, then certainly her case is made out. This contention cannot be sustained.

7. The eighth exception alleges error on the part of the circuit court in permitting the plaintiff's counsel to use the following language in his argument to the jury: "If a telegram were to be sent to Mr. Duncan, Mr. Nicholson, or Mr. Farr, that the telegram would go to them with arms open, and the company would fall over itself to deliver the message to any prominent man in Union." And also: "That the newspapers of the state were constantly publishing, from New York to St. Augustine, articles about South Carolina juries not doing their duty when trying criminal cases, and that Mr. Sease, the solicitor, had remarked about it last week." In the case of State v. Robertson, 26 S. C. 118, 1 S. E. 443, it is said: "That it is most certainly proper, and especially in criminal cases, that counsel, in addressing a jury, should keep themselves strictly within the record." In 2 Ency. of P. & P. 752, it is said: "Very many abuses in argument may be sufficiently counteracted by instructions of the court to the jury, and a large discretion as to the refusing of new trials because of such violations of propriety is accorded to the trial courts. The appellate court will frequently condemn the language or conduct of counsel, and at the same time affirm a judgment denying a new trial, on the ground that under all of the circumstances the rights of the defeated party were not materially prejudiced, or that the action of the trial court in the premises was effectual to restore to the proceedings the fairness of which they had been divested." Let us, then, inquire whether the rights of the defendant here might have been materially prejudiced. It will be borne in mind that there was not a cause for punitive damages. Only actual damages were sought. Another fact which must not be overlooked is that there seems to be a tendency at the present day to hold corporations to strict accountability for their acts. Any language which tends to fan this natural feeling into greater fury, "flights of oratory" though it be, certainly has its weight and should be avoided. Courts are for the purpose of dispensing justice, and, were this kind of advantage allowed, in many cases that purpose might be defeated. Where the record does not sustain the remarks made, if it is evident that harm does result from them, it seems that this court should exercise its power and grant a new trial. We think the language here used was highly prejudicial to the defendant, and therefore sustain the exception.

The last exception raises the point that a new trial should have been granted because there was no evidence to show that the delay in the delivery of the telegram caused Mrs. Kirby any damage whatever. It being already decided that a new trial should be granted, we do not consider it necessary to pass upon this question.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be reversed.

GARY, A. J., concurs in the result. JONES, J., concurs in the result, and thinks the eighth exception should be overruled, citing State v. Williamson, 65 S. C. 249, 43 S. E. 671.

LYON v. CHARLESTON & W. C. RY.
(Supreme Court of South Carolina. July 10, 1907.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT—INJURY TO SERVANT—EVIDENCE.

In an action for injuries to a flagman while attempting to uncouple cars, evidence held insufficient to show negligence on the part of the master.

2. SAME—FELLOW SERVANTS.

A flagman who had been instructed to obey the orders of conductors and engineers while the conductors are in charge of trains, while obey-ing the orders of such conductors is a fellow servant of the engineers.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 34, Master and Servant, §§ 493-514.]

3. SAME—NEGLIGENCE—PROXIMATE CAUSE.

Where failure of a railroad company to have the cars equipped with air brakes operated from the engine, as required by act of Congress, was not the proximate cause of the injuries to a flagman, such failure cannot be assigned as negligence on the part of the railroad.

4. APPEAL—REVIEW—NEW TRIAL.

It is the duty of the court, on appeal, to reverse a judgment against a master for injuries to an employé and grant a new trial, where the evidence in its opinion admits of no other inference than that plaintiff's own negligence contributed to his injury as a matter of law.

5. MASTER AND SERVANT—INJURIES TO SERVANT—ASSUMPTION OF RISK.

Where a flagman was injured while uncoupling cars under the order of the conductor, which duty was within his employment, he assumed the risk.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 34, Master and Servant, §§ 550, 648-651.]

Gary, A. J., dissenting

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Greenwood County.

Action by A. B. Lyon against the Charleston & Western Carolina Railway. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

See 56 S. E. 18.

S. J. Simpson and McGhee & Richardson, for appellant. Grier & Park, for respondent.

WOODS, J. The vital question in this case is whether the circuit judge erred in refusing a motion for a nonsuit and for new trial.

The plaintiff, a flagman on defendant's freight train, while attempting to uncouple a moving car, fell on the track and had his leg crushed. He brought this action for damages and recovered judgment, alleging the accident was due to the defendant's negligence. Without taking up the exceptions in detail, we consider whether there is evidence to support any one of the several charges of negligence as a proximate cause of the injury. The case depends principally on the testimony of the plaintiff, who gave this account of the accident on his direct examination: "What did you do? We went and unloaded all of the freight that was for Hampton, and the conductor got out of the car and signed the engineer ahead, and the train rolled off at the rate of about three or four miles an hour. He ordered Stephen New, the brakeman, and myself, to cut the flat car loose, and let the rear of the train trail behind and roll clear of the siding, put the flat car in the side track, and come back to the main line and get the train and go on to Brunson to meet 41, a passenger train. Stephen New went and caught hold of the lever on the cattle car to cut it loose from the flat. The lever was hard to work, and it seemed like it was impossible for him to cut the car, and I knew I could not, and I crossed over to the corner of the flat car and pulled the lever, and a jerk from the car threw me under the rolling train behind. There was no air on the train. What happened when you fell under there? The front trucks of the cattle car rolled over me, broke my leg, fractured my hip and ankle, broke my collar bone, and bruised my shoulder, and cut a gash in my head." On cross-examination he says: "Just state again how it happened; where were you and what were you undertaking to do, to carry out the conductor's orders. Just tell what you were doing. Stephen New, when we got orders, he went over and caught hold of the lever on the outside, without going in between the lever on the cattle car so that you could stand on the outside, without going in between the cars and uncouple it, one of those iron automatic levers? Yes, sir; it don't set outside the car, it sets in between. You can stand outside of the car without going in between them? Yes, sir. And you intended to turn that lever over and raise the peg up and uncouple the car? That was Steve New's idea, and it seemed he could not work his lever. When Steve New caught hold of that lever, where were you? On the flat car. Why did you get on the flat car? I was going down with the train, and when it got near the siding I was going to get on the top of the cattle car and apply the brakes, as ordered to do. How were you going to get across the gap between the flat car and the cattle car? Several ways. I could have got down on the ground and got up, or I could have reached over and got the ladder. You knew that Steve New was going to separate them as soon as he could? He was getting pretty close to the clear post, and he had not got them loose, and I just pulled the lever on the flat car. When Steve New first caught hold of the lever, where were you? I was on the flat car. You got on the flat car? I was already on the flat car. I just got up to ride on down. There was not any need of my trotting beside it. You got on the flat car the first thing you did, before Steve New caught hold of the lever? That is true, is it not? I don't recollect about that. You knew that as soon as Steve New worked that lever, if it worked all right, the cars would separate? Yes, sir; but as I cut the car I was expecting to give my own signals, but it was done before I could do it. I thought you said that Steve New was going to cut the car off? I said he was trying to pull it up and it looked like he could not get the lever to work, and I pulled the lever on the flat car. But, when you went on the flat car, you did not intend to have anything to do with the lever? I was going to carry out the orders of the conductor. Didn't you, when you got on the flat car, think that Steve New would operate the lever so as to separate the cars? I knew that was his intention, sir. And at that time you did not intend to have anything to do with uncoupling the cars? I was going to carry out the orders of the conductor, and I could not have done it otherwise. But, when you got on the flat car, your intention was that Steve New should do the uncoupling, and then you were to get over on the other car and put on brakes? Yes, sir; but, when he could not do it, there was but one lever on his side, and I was compelled to pull the lever. And, when he had difficulty in uncoupling, you undertook to help him? Yes, sir."

1. Negligence as a proximate cause of the injury is charged against the conductor, in that he "ordered, required, and directed this plaintiff to get upon and uncouple the said cars while in motion, and get upon and apply the brakes to the trailing cars while in motion, and in leaving the train without seeing that his orders were carried out and the train operated with due care, without a sudden increase of the speed of the train." The plaintiff's own account shows clearly the accident was due to his act of leaning over the corner of the moving car and uncoupling it by pulling a lever at the side; but there is no evidence whatever that the conductor ordered the plaintiff to get upon the moving car and uncouple it from that position, or even saw him when he did it. There is evidence of an order from the conductor to uncouple the moving car, but a lever was provided on each side of the car as a means of uncoupling from the ground. That the plaintiff, as well as New, understood the order to mean that the lever should be used from the ground, is conclusively shown by his evidence that they went about the uncoupling in that manner; New handling the lever and the plaintiff mounting the car in order to leap over on another car and put on the brakes as New uncoupled. New, the brakeman, made an unsuccessful effort to use the lever on his side from the ground, and then the plaintiff, without giving any signal to stop the train or attempting to use the lever on the other side from the ground, or even reporting to the conductor or receiving any order from him, of his own volition, without even giving notice to any one in control of the motion of the train of his intention, attempted the perilous feat, of stooping over from the moving car and pulling the lever below him. There is no ground for saying the order of the conductor required or contemplated such peril. Without doubt, when an order is given, it is the duty of the servant to take the safe way of carrying it out, if one is provided; and, if that fails, he cannot, except, perhaps, in cases of emergency arising from the fault of the master, charge the master with the result of using a dangerous method not in the purview of the order. If the order of the conductor could in any reasonable view be regarded as suggesting to the plaintiff to stand on the flat car and uncouple from that position, then there might be ground for saying that the defendant could not escape liability for a condition of things produced by its order to him, in which on a sudden impulse he took a dangerous course, resulting in his injury. But it would be beyond all reason to say the order contemplated mounting a flat car as the plaintiff did, with the intention of stepping or leaping from that to the following car, in order to apply the brakes to that car, or the attempt to use the lever while stooping from the end of the flat car. Here, then, was a general order from the conductor to uncouple, and there was a lever provided for the purpose to be used from the ground, and, if it had been used as intended by the defendant, the plaintiff could not have been injured by falling from the car. This distinguishes the case from Carson v. Railway, 68 S. C. 55, 68, 46 S. E. 525, 529; for in that case the court said: "It was shown, or rather there was testimony offered tending to show, that the conductor ordered this servant, the plaintiff, to couple those cars; that such conductor in this matter represented the master; that the servant called to such conductor to hold fast the train until he signaled; that this servant did not signal the conductor to move the train; that it was under these circumstances the train was moved so that the two cars bumped against each other, thus causing his injuries; that, when the cotter pin was out of its place, it would be necessary for a servant to go between the cars to arrange it; that it was necessary to go between the cars to open the instrument by which the coupling was made." The conductor's position at the time of the accident does not appear from the evidence, and therefore there could be no finding of negligence on the ground that he was not present to direct the details of the uncoupling and the movements of the train. The plaintiff's testimony shows that he clearly understood the manner in which the lever was to be used, without any instruction or direction. That the master is not liable for any injury which results from the use of a safe appliance in an unsafe and dangerous manner not contemplated by him seems too obvious to require a particular citation of authority. The cases will be found collected in 20 Am. & Eng. Ency. 141. No authority has been cited, and we think there is no foundation in reason, for the proposition that, though the plaintiff knew fully the safe and proper way to use this safe appliance, it was nevertheless the duty of the conductor to stand by him and see that, whenever ordered to uncouple cars, the plaintiff should use with due care the safe means provided, and should not take the peril of an improper use of such means. The evidence of the plaintiff shows beyond doubt that he knew the safe way, and chose the dangerous.

2. The plaintiff further charged "that the said defendant was further negligent, careless, and reckless in the said engineer in charge of the said engine, who was a superior officer and agent to the said plaintiff, and who had the right to direct the services of the said plaintiff, and who was in charge of the said train in the absence of the said conductor, gave the said train a sudden and violent lurch and start forward, without warning to the said plaintiff or signal from him, and while the said plaintiff was engaged in carrying out the directions and orders of the said defendant, and was in a dangerous position, which negligence, carelessness, and recklessness was a direct and proximate cause of the said injuries." The general rule in this state and elsewhere is that an engineer is not ordinarily the representative of the master, but is the fellow servant of the train hands; all being under the orders of the conductor as the representative of the master. The plaintiff in this instance testified, however, that at the time of his employment as a flagman he was told by the train master that he must obey the orders of the conductor or the engineer, and that accordingly he did obey, to use his own words, "the conductor when he needed my services and the engineer when he needed my services." The Constitution provides: "Every employee of any railroad corporation shall have the same rights and remedies for any injury suffered by him from the acts or omissions of said corporation or its employees as are allowed by the law to other persons by law who are not employees, when the injury results from the negligence of a superior agent or officer, or a person having a right to direct or control the services of a party injured, and also when the injury results from negligence of a fellow-servant engaged in another department of labor from that of the party injured, or of a fellow-servant on another train of cars, or one engaged about another piece of work." Under this constitutional provision, in view of the plaintiff's evidence as to obeying the orders of the engineer, the question arises whether in this case the engineer was a superior agent or officer, or person having the right to control or direct the services of the plaintiff. Under a constitutional provision identical with ours, the Supreme Court of Mississippi held an engineer not to be a person having the right to control or direct the services of a brakeman. Evans v. Railway, 12 So. 581, 70 Miss. 527. In this state the rule adopted is thus clearly stated in Brabham v. Tel. Co., 71 S. C. 56, 50 S. E. 716, and is quoted and approved in Martin v. Royster Guano Co., 72 S. C. 237, 243, 51 S. E. 680, 682: "In determining who are fellow servants, the test or rule in this state is not whether the servants are of different grade, rank, or authority, one of them having the power to control and direct the services of the other, but the test is in the character of the act being performed by the offending servant, whether it was the performance of some duty the master owed to the injured servant, the performance of which duty the master had intrusted to the offending servant. In the case under consideration there was no duty resting upon the defendant to give notice to the plaintiff, as the danger was not hidden or unusual, and the plaintiff had knowledge thereof." Assuming that the engineer was the offending servant, through whose negligence the plaintiff was injured, the whole evidence shows that, in accordance with the well-understood custom, the master had intrusted to the conductor, and not the engineer, the duty of giving orders for the shifting and coupling of cars, and there was no evidence that the conductor was absent and the train in the charge of the engineer. Therefore, in carrying out the conductor's orders, the plaintiff was not at the time under the engineer, as a person having the right to direct or control his services, but was under the conductor, and hence was a fellow servant of the engineer on the same train. But, in addition to this, we do not see how negligence can be imputed to the engineer as the proximate cause of the injury. The plaintiff, it is true, testified he fell on account of a sudden jerk of the train, but jerks are inevitable and are to be expected in movements of freight trains (Steele v. Railroad Co., 55 S. C. 389, 33 S. E. 509, 74 Am. St. Rep. 756); and there is nothing in the evidence indicating the engineer had any reason to suspect the plaintiff was attempting to uncouple the cars while stooping over the corner of a moving car, or in any other position of danger. If the plaintiff had been on the side of the train uncoupling the car by the use of the lever from the ground, it would have been impossible for a sudden jerk to have precipitated him from the car under the wheels.

3. Another specification of negligence alleged as a proximate cause of the injury was a failure to have a sufficient number of cars "equipped with power driving wheel brakes and appliances, commonly known as air brakes, as is required by law, and have air properly working for the operation of said brakes on said cars." The sections of the federal statute (Act March 2, 1893, c. 196, §§ 1, 2, 8, 27 Stat. 531, 532 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, pp. 3174, 3176]), relating to interstate trains on which this allegation of negligence rests are as follows:

"Section 1. That from and after the first day of January, eighteen hundred and ninety-eight, it shall be unlawful for any common carrier engaged in interstate commerce by railroad to use on its line any locomotive engine in moving interstate traffic not equipped with a power-driving wheel brake and appliances for operating the train brake system, or to run any train in such traffic after said date that has not a sufficient number of cars in it so equipped with power or train brakes that the engineer on the locomotive drawing such train can control its speed without requiring the brakeman to use the common hand-brake for that purpose.

"Sec. 2. That on and after the first day of January, eighteen hundred and ninety-eight, it shall be unlawful for any such carrier to haul or permit to be hauled or used on its line any car used in moving interstate traffic not equipped with couplers coupling automatically by impact, and which can be uncoupled without the necessity of men going between the cars."

"Sec. 8. That any employee of such common carrier who may be injured by any locomotive, car, or train in use contrary to the provisions of this act, shall not be deemed thereby to have assumed the risk thereby occasioned, although continuing in the employment of such carrier after the unlawful use of such locomotive, car or train had been brought to his knowledge."

This statute was amended by Act March 2, 1903, c. 976, 32 Stat. 943 [U. S. Comp. St. Supp. 1905, p. 603], section 2 of the amendment being: "That whenever as provided in said act any train is provided with power air-brakes, not less than fifty per centum of the cars in such train shall have their brakes used and operated by the engineer of the locomotive drawing such train; and all power-braked cars in such train which are associated together with said fifty per centum shall have their brakes so used and operated; and to more fully carry into effect the objects of the said act, the Interstate Commerce Commission may, from time to time after full hearing, increase the minimum percentage of cars in any train required to be operated with power or train-brakes which must have their brakes used and operated as aforesaid; and the failure to comply with any such requirement of the said Interstate Commission shall be subject to the like penalty as failure to comply with any requirement of this section." This last section is the one most important to this discussion. Construing the original statute and the amendment together, it seems manifest under the amendment that Congress meant to establish the rule that railroads would comply with the provision of section 1 of the original act requiring the train to be under the control of the air brakes operated by the engineer of the locomotive, and would not be liable under this act if they had 50 per cent. of the cars equipped with power brakes used in operating by the engineer from the locomotive and all other cars on the same train and associated with these cars which might have been equipped with power brakes also under like control of the engineer. The statute does not require all cars which may be equipped with power brakes to be coupled or associated together but only fifty per cent. of such cars, but it does require all that may have been equipped with power brakes and actually associated with 50 per cent. to be controlled by the engineer from the locomotive. The statute contemplates and allows that there may be cars in the train equipped with air brakes and not associated with the 50 per cent. operated from the engine. The word "associated," as here used, manifestly means the cars immediately connected with the 50 per cent. equipped with power brakes and operated from the engine; and those associated cars are also required to be operated from the engine. But the terms of the statute not only fail to require all cars of the train to be equipped with air brakes operated from the engine, but impliedly excludes such requirement, by expressing the requirement that such cars when associated with the minimum number of cars shall be so equipped.

The number of deaths and physical injuries of railroad employees in this country had become so appalling as to shock the sensibilities of all civilized people, and the object of this legislation was to require the railroads to use the means prescribed in the statute as a reasonable precaution against such casualties; and as has been shown with great force by Chief Justice Fuller, in Johnson v. Southern Pacific Co., 196 U. S. 1, 25 Sup. Ct. 158, 49 L. Ed. 363, courts should give the statutes a broad interpretation, having in view the beneficent object of the legislation. Nevertheless the statute fixes 50 per cent. as the proportion of the cars required to be equipped with air brakes operated from the engine, and in the face of this provision the court would be going very far to hold it to be evidence of negligence under the statute not to have all the cars so equipped. On this train there was a dummy—that is, a car not equipped with brakes—somewhere near the middle of the train, and the evidence made an issue of fact as to whether 50 per cent. of the cars of this train were so associated together as to have their brakes operated from the engine, as required by the statute. If we assume, however, the defendant had not complied with the law, and 50 per cent. of the cars of the train were not so associated as to have the brakes operated from the engine, this omission to have 50 per cent. of the cars so operated had no connection with the plaintiff's fall and injury, for the train consisted of from 14 to 16 cars, and all but 5 of these were between the engine and the flat car from which plaintiff fell, so that, if the brakes of the 8 cars connected together immediately behind the engine had all been operated from the engine, the car which ran over plaintiff's leg would not have been included in the number. Hence the plaintiff's evidence that, if the car which he uncoupled had been equipped with air brakes working from the engine, it would have been stopped from running on him after he fell by the automatic action of the brakes the instant it was uncoupled, cannot avail him. The statute did not require this car to be operated from the engine because it was not associated with the 50 per cent. required to be so operated, and the failure to have the 8 associated cars next to the engine so operated had no connection with the accident. The presence of air brakes operated from the engine could not have prevented the accident, and the absence of such equipment on these cars could have contributed nothing to it.

This case is entirely different from Schlemmer v. Buffalo, etc., R. R. Co., 27 Sup. Ct. 407, 51 L. Ed. 681, where the deceased was ordered by his superior to do the precise act in the doing of which he lost his life. The inadvertent placing his head above the coupling and its being caught were results likely to occur from the peril the deceased was required by the master's representative to take contrary to law. In the present case, as we have pointed out, the servant was injured in doing a negligent act not demanded or called for by the conductor, and which he well knew was not intended by the order he had received. This was therefore clearly contributory negligence as distinguished from assumption of risk. Bodie v. Railway Co., 61 S. C. 478, 39 S. E. 715; Barksdale v. Railway Co., 66 S. C. 211, 44 S. E. 743; Schlemmer v. Railway Co., supra.

We express no opinion as to the constitutionality of the federal statute, as that point is not made in the exception. Aside from the statute, however, there was evidence that the safe and proper place for a dummy was at the rear of the train next to the cab, and that, if it had been so placed, the air brakes on the car uncoupled by the plaintiff would have worked automatically, so as to bring it to an almost instant stop, and thus probably would have prevented it from running over plaintiff when he uncoupled it and fell. If full credence and force be given to this evidence as tending to show that there was negligence on the part of the defendant in the management and arrangement of its cars and that such negligence was a proximate cause of the injury, the facts as stated by the plaintiff himself admit of no other inference than that his own negligence contributed to the injury as a proximate cause, without which it could not have been received. Knowing the cars to be arranged as they were, that hardly anything short of a miracle could save him from injury if he fell between the moving cars, that it would be impossible for him to be so injured if he uncoupled by using the lever from the ground, he balanced himself in a stooping or kneeling posture on the corner of the moving flat car, and uncoupled by reaching down to the lever. No reasonable man could fail to see the extreme peril, or doubt that it was extreme negligence to take it; and it is too plain for difference of opinion that this negligence contributed to the injury as a proximate cause, and that without it the injury would not have been received. Taking the view of the evidence most favorable to the plaintiff, it cannot be doubted the facts conclusively show contributory negligence, and therefore, under the principles laid down in Jarrell v. Railway, 58 S. C. 491, 38 S. E. 910, the plaintiff could not recover.

4. The general rule that it is the province of the jury to determine whether the evidence shows negligence on the part of the defendant or contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff is universally recognized. Issues of negligence and contributory negligence are not different in this respect from other issues of fact between litigants. The rule is that all issues of fact in law cases are for the jury. Yet the rule is no less familiar and no less generally recognized that, where there is a total failure of evidence on the part of the plaintiff to establish his case or full establishment of a complete defense by plaintiff's evidence, there is no longer an issue of fact, and it becomes the duty of the court to adjudicate the matter as on issue of law by granting a nonsuit or directing a verdict or ordering a new trial. To illustrate: If A. sues B. on a contract for the payment of money and makes proof of existence of the obligation, but introduces evidence which admits of no other inference than that the obligation had been discharged, could the proposition be entertained for a moment that the court would not have the power to dispose of the cause by nonsuit just as if the plaintiff had failed completely to offer evidence tending to prove that an obligation ever existed? In Hutchinson v. Noland, 1 Hill, 222, the court says: "The general rule certainly is that the plaintiff is not to be nonsuited on what constitutes the defendant's defense, but the rule applies only where the decision goes on the defendant's evidence. In such case the jury alone can decide. But, if the defendant's defense be established by the plaintiff's witness, then the objection does not apply." Pool v. Railroad Co., 23 S. C. 289; Slater v. Railroad Co., 29 S. C. 100, 6 S. E. 936. The principle is the same in issues of negligence. This court has never hesitated to hold a nonsuit proper where the plaintiff failed completely to offer evidence tending to prove negligence as a proximate cause of alleged injury. Carrier v. Dorrance, 19 S. C. 32; Hale v. Railway Co., 34 S. C. 292, 13 S. E. 537; Glenn v. Railroad Co., 21 S. C. 470; Davis v. Railroad Co., 21 S. C. 103; Pickens v. Railroad Co., 54 S. C. 509, 32 S. E. 507. In Hooper v. Railroad Co., 21 S. C. 548, this language is quoted with approval: "The judge has to say whether any facts have been established by evidence from which negligence may be reasonably inferred; the jurors have to say whether, from these facts, when submitted to them, negligence ought to be inferred. The relevancy of evidence, and whether any exists which tends to prove, or is capable of proving, negligence, is for the court."

We can see no possible ground on which the power and duty of the court to grant a nonsuit can be distinguished and denied where plaintiff proves the negligence of the defendant as a proximate cause and at the same time makes good the defense of contributory negligence by introducing evidence which admits of no other inference than that his own negligence contributed to the injury as a proximate cause. It is true in Carter v. Railroad Co., 19 S. C. 24, 45 Am. Rep. 754, the circuit court was held to be without power to grant a nonsuit on proof by plaintiff of contributory negligence, and the authority of this case is recognized in Darwin v. Railroad Co., 23 S. C. 537, 55 Am. Rep. 32; Petrie v. Railroad Co., 29 S. C. 322, 7 S. E. 515; Carter v. Oil Co., 34 S. C. 215, 13 S. E. 419, 27 Am. St. Rep. 815; Whaley v. Bartlett, 42 S. C. 468, 20 S. E. 745; Hankinson v. Railroad Co., 41 S. C. 19, 19 S. E. 206. A careful review of these cases suggests that the leading idea in the mind of the court was that the court could not under the Constitution hold a particular act or omission, such for instance as a failure to look and listen, to be under all circumstances proof of contributory negligence as a matter of law. Be that as it may, in the subsequent case of Jarrell v. Railroad Co., 58 S. C. 495, 36 S. E. 912, the court states the rule, applying the well-recognized general principles to contributory negligence: "We may also say that, while contributory negligence is ordinarily a matter of defense, yet if the complaint shows contributory negligence by plaintiff, that would render the complaint demurrable for insufficiency, since it contained allegations that would defeat the cause of action alleged, or prevent a recovery thereon." This case has been cited and approved in Elkins v. Railway Co., 64 S. C. 561, 43 S. E. 19; Creech v. Railway, 66 S. C. 533, 45 S. E. 86; Hunter v. Railway Co., 72 S. C. 337, 51 S. E. 860, 110 Am. St. Rep. 605. The question in the Jarrell Case arose on a demurrer, but on this point there is no ground for distinction between a demurrer and a motion for a nonsuit. It would not only be illogical, but inconceivable in any system of jurisprudence that a court should have power to dismiss an action on the grounds that plaintiff has stated no cause of action, or stating it had also stated as a verity and a complete defense to it, assuming all his allegations of fact to be true, and yet should be without power on proof of the truth of the same allegations to adjudge as a matter of law that proof by the plaintiff of the facts alleged constituted a complete defense to his actions. Cases in other jurisdictions laying down the principles which we have stated will be found collected in Shearman and Redfield on Negligence, § 114. There is no difference in the application of the rule to the plaintiff and the defendant. If the defendant makes out the plaintiff's cause of action either in contract or tort by evidence which admits of no other inference than that the plaintiff is entitled to recover, it is the duty of the court to direct a verdict for the plaintiff, leaving it to the jury if the damages are unliquidated to fix the amount only. This is the principle applied to waiver in Hollings v. Bankers, 63 S. C. 193, 41 S. E. 80. There are strong reasons for the great caution which this court has always exercised in the use of its power to reverse a judgment of the circuit court refusing a nonsuit or a new trial, or the direction of a verdict, on the ground that the evidence admits of no other inference than that there has been a complete failure of proof to make out the plaintiff's alleged cause of action, or that there had been complete proof by the plaintiff of a defense set up in the answer. But the court may not avoid the responsibility when a case like this arises calling for the exercise of this power. Juries try issues of fact. When the evidence makes no issue of fact, it is the duty of the court to announce the conclusion of law which the evidence requires.

5. Another ground on which responsibility for the injury was imputed to the defendant was set out in the twelfth paragraph of the complaint: "That the said duties and work assigned to the plaintiff on the occasion above described were not those plaintiff was ordinarily required to do in the scope of his employment as a flagman, but were unusual and outside of the ordinary duties of his employment, which, on the occasion in question, he was required to perform by the said defendant." The plaintiff testified he contracted to work as a flagman, his ordinary duties being to protect the rear of the train, to see that the lanterns and flags were placed, and the torpedoes and fuses were kept and used when needed, and to keep the cab clean; but he also testified that, when he was employed, he was charged by the train master to obey the conductor or the engineer, and he regarded it within the scope of his employment to perform other labor, such as unloading freight and uncoupling cars, when so directed by the conductor. It is clear from the evidence that in uncoupling cars the plaintiff was not acting within the scope of the duties he had contracted to perform without directions from the conductor, but it is also clear he was acting within the scope of duties he had undertaken when directed by the conductor to perform them. The general rule is well established that the servant does not take upon himself risks which he would not reasonably expect to encounter because not within the scope of his contract of hiring. But, in order for this rule to be available, it must be shown that the servant was transferred to essentially new duties and that the order under which he acted was negligent. This is the view presented in Labatt on Master and Serv- ants, §§ 465-468, and it will be found very difficult to state a more accurate test, for from the nature of the subject each case must be decided on its own facts, whether the service required was essentially new and whether the order given was negligent are ordinarily questions of fact to be decided by the jury. But there are cases, and we think this is one of them, where it cannot be said there was any testimony upon which a finding could rest that the duty of uncoupling a car was essentially new and not within the capacity of the plaintiff and not contemplated by his employment. The plaintiff had been employed on the freight train about three months and for some time before had been on the railroad bridge force; and his testimony already quoted shows that he had full knowledge of the purpose for which the lever was provided and that he used it in a way not contemplated by the company in placing it or by the conductor in giving his order, and the great and necessary danger of the method of use adopted by the plaintiff could not fail to be obvious to any reasonable man.

The conclusion is irresistible that the plaintiff's injury was due, not solely to his own negligence, certainly to his contributory negligence, in taking unnecessary hazards to carry out the order of the conductor.

We do not deem it necessary to refer separately to the errors alleged in the charge and in the admission of the testimony, as the foregoing discussion practically disposes of all the material questions made in the case which arose either on the motion for nonsuit or for a new trial.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be reversed and the case remanded to that court for a new trial.

GARY, A. J. (dissenting). While there was testimony tending to show that the plaintiff was negligent, it likewise tended to prove negligence on the part of the defendant in several particulars. The testimony was susceptible of more than one inference. Therefore it cannot be said that the negligence of the plaintiff was the proximate cause of his injury, and the inference to be drawn from the testimony was properly submitted to the jury, especially when it appeared that the plaintiff did not have time for deliberation in executing the order to uncouple the cars. But there is even a stronger reason why the question of contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff was properly submitted to the jury. This was an interstate commerce train, and the construction of the statute mentioned in the complaint involves a federal question, in which case this court is bound to follow the decisions of the United States Supreme Court. There is no difference in principle between the present case and that of Schlemmer v. Railroad, 27 Sup. Ct. 407,<sup>1</sup> from which we quote at length, as it is decisive of the question under consideration. The facts in that case were as follows: "This is an action for the death of the plaintiff's intestate, Adam M. Schlemmer, while trying to couple a shovel car to a caboose. A nonsuit was directed at the trial and the direction was sustained by the Supreme Court of the state. The shovel car was part of a train on its way through Pennsylvania from a point in New York, and it was not equipped with an automatic coupler, in accordance with the act of March 2, 1893, c. 193, § 2, 27 Stat. 531 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3174]. Instead of such a coupler, it had an iron drawbar fastened underneath the car by a pin, and projecting about a foot beyond the car. This drawbar weighed about 80 pounds, and its free end played up and down. On this end was an eye, and the coupling had to be done by lifting the free end possibly a foot, so that it should enter a slot in an automatic coupler on the caboose, and allow a pin to drop through the eye. Owing to the absence of buffers on the shovel car, and to its being so high that it would pass over those on the caboose, the car and caboose would crush any one between them if they came together, and the coupling failed to be made. Schlemmer was ordered to make the coupling as the train was slowly approaching the caboose. To do so he had to get between the cars, keeping below the level of the bottom of the shovel car. It was dusk, and in endeavoring to obey the order and to guide the drawbar he rose a very little too high, and, as he failed to hit the slot, the top of his head was crushed." In reversing the decision of the state court the United States Supreme Court used this language: "It is enacted by section 8 of the act that any employé injured by any car in use, contrary to the provisions of the act, shall be deemed to have assumed the risk thereby occasioned, although continuing in the employment of the carrier after the unlawful use had been brought to his knowledge. An early, if not the earliest, application of the phrase 'assumption of risk' was the establishment of the exception to the liability of a master, for the negligence of his servant, when the person injured was a fellow servant of the negligent man. Whether an actual assumption by contract was supposed on grounds of economic theory, or the assumption was imputed because of a conception of justice and convenience, does not matter for the present purpose. Both reasons are suggested in the well-known case of Farwell v. Boston & W. R. Corp., 4 Metc. 49, 57, 58, 38 Am. Dec. 339. But at the present time the motion is not confined to risks of such negligence. It is extended, as in this statute it plainly is extended, to dangerous conditions, as of machinery, premises, and the like, which the injured party understood and appreciated, when he submitted his person to them. In this class of cases the risk is said to be assumed, because a person who frankly and voluntarily encounters it has only himself to thank if harm comes on a general principle of law. Probably the modification of this general principle by some judicial decisions and by statutes like section 8 is due to an opinion that men who work with their hands have not always the freedom and equality of position assumed by the doctrine of laissez faire to exist. Assumption of risk in a broad sense obviously shades into negligence, as commonly understood. Negligence consists in conduct which common experience, or the special knowledge of the actor, shows to be so likely to produce the result complained of, under the circumstances known to the actor, that he is held answerable for that result, although it was not certain, intended, or foreseen. He is held to assume the risk upon the same ground. Choctaw, O. & G. R. Co. v. McDade, 191 U. S. 64, 68, 24 Sup. Ct. 24, 48 L. Ed. 96. Apart from the notion of contract, rather shadowy as applied to this broad form of the latter conception, the practical difference of the two ideas is in the degree of their proximity to the particular harm. The preliminary conduct of getting into the dangerous employment or relation is said to be accompanied by assumption of the risk. The act more immediately leading to a specific accident is called negligent. But the difference between the two is one of degree rather than of kind; and when a statute exonerates a servant from the former, if at the same time it leaves the defense of contributory negligence still open to the master (a matter upon which we express no opinion), then, unless great care be taken, the servant's rights will be sacrificed by simply charging him with assumption of the risk under another name. Especially is this true in Pennsylvania, where some cases, at least, seem to have treated assumption of risk and negligence as convertible terms. Patterson v. Pittsburg & C. R. Co., 76 Pa. 389, 18 Am. Rep. 412. We cannot help thinking that this has happened in the present case, as well as that the ruling upon Schlemmer's negligence, was so involved with and dependent upon erroneous views of the statute that if the judgment stood the statute would suffer a wound." This decision shows that the United States Supreme Court regards as "shadowy" the distinction between the assumption of risk, and contributory negligence, and that it will not allow the provisions of the statute to be abrogated by a mere change of name, in the designation of the defense. But, even if these defenses must be regarded as distinct, the same result should follow in this case. In critically reviewing the case of Schlemmer v. Railroad, supra, the Central Law Journal (May 8, 1907) thus clearly points out the distinction generally recognized, between assumption of risk and contributory negligence: "One has to do with the contract between master and servant, the other with the latter's own deliberate act and judgment independent of any contract requirement of the master. If a master tells a servant to do such and such a thing, and the servant sees the danger, or knows the defects of the appliances used, and the liability he is incurring, his undertaking to comply with his master's wishes is an assumption of the risks involved. It may be negligence on his part to do what he is doing, but it is negligence assumed by contract with his master, and of which his master has or ought to have knowledge. On the other hand, where a servant in the course of his employment does an act not demanded or called for by his master, and especially against the doing of which he is warned, and such act is clearly an act of negligence, the commission of such an act on his part amounts to contributory negligence, and is effective as a complete defense to a defendant in an action for damages."

Tested even by this distinction, the question whether the plaintiff assumed the risk, or was guilty of contributory negligence, was, in this case, proper for the jury. For these reasons I dissent.

ROSE v. STATE. (No. 247.)

ROSE CO. v. STATE. (No. 248.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. April 11, 1907.)

1. INTOXICATING LIQUORS—ILLEGAL SALE.

Section 428 of the Penal Code of 1895, as amended by the act of 1897 (Acts 1897, p. 39), is by its terms made applicable only in those counties, cities, or other localities where the sale of spirituous, malt, or intoxicating liquors "is prohibited by law, high license, or otherwise."

2. SAME.

The sale of liquor is not "prohibited by law, high license, or otherwise," in Bartow county. Therefore, an indictment in that county for an alleged violation of the said section as amended was invalid, and a conviction thereon was contrary to law, and must be set aside.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Bartow County; Fite, Judge.

Randolph Rose and the R. M. Rose Company were convicted of an illegal sale of liquors, and bring error. Reversed.

Rosser & Brandon, Ben. J. Conyers, and Neel & Peeples, for plaintiffs in error. Sam. P. Maddox, Sol. Gen., for the State.

HILL, C. J. In the superior court of Bartow county an indictment was returned against Randolph Rose, W. F. Baker, and R. M. Rose Company. The indictment contained two counts. The first charged a violation of section 431 of the Penal Code of 1895. The second charged a violation of section 428 of the Penal Code of 1895, as amended by the act of 1897 (Acts 1897, p. 39). The defendants Randolph Rose and R. M. Rose Company interposed a demurrer to the second count, on the ground that it "does not allege a crime under the laws of this state, there being no law of force prohibiting, by high license or otherwise, the sale of liquors in Bartow county." The court overruled the demurrer, and the defendants excepted to that judgment. The court instructed the jury that there was no evidence that any spirituous, malt, or intoxicating liquors had been sold in Bartow county, and directed a verdict for the defendants on the first count in the indictment. The defendants were convicted on the second count of the indictment, and their motion for a new trial was overruled.

The controlling question in this case is made by the demurrer to the second count of the indictment. This count, as before stated, charged the defendants with a violation of section 428 of the Penal Code of 1895, as amended by the act of 1897. The offense is set forth in the language of the statute; it being alleged that W. F. Baker, Randolph Rose, and R. M. Rose Company, in Bartow county on the 1st day of January, 1907, did "sell, contract to sell, take orders for, and solicit, personally and by agent, the sale of spirituous, malt, and intoxicating liquors in said county of Bartow, where the sale of such liquors is prohibited by law, high license, or otherwise, said R. M. Rose Company being then and there a corporation doing business in this state, and said offense then and there having been committed within the corporate limits of the city of Cartersville, in the said county of Bartow." Was the sale of spirituous, malt, or intoxicating liquors prohibited by law, high license, or otherwise, in Bartow county at the time when the offense charged was alleged to have been committed? If such sale was not prohibited in that county, it follows that the conviction, whatever may have been the facts in the case, was unlawful, and must be set aside. By its express terms, section 428 of the Penal Code of 1895, before and since the amendatory act of 1897, makes it an offense, personally or by agent, to sell, contract to sell, take orders for, and solicit the sale of spirituous, malt, or intoxicating liquors, only in those counties in this state where the sale of such liquors is prohibited by law. Justice Cobb, in the case of Barker v. State, 117 Ga. 433, 43 S. E. 746, gives the legislative intent in the enactment of section 428 as follows: "The manifest purpose of this law is to prevent the sale of intoxicating liquors in a prohibition county, town, or district." See, in the same connection, Loeb v. State, 115 Ga. 241, 41 S. E. 575 (2). The Supreme Court in Strauss v. Mayor of Waycross, 97 Ga. 476, 25 S. E. 329, says: "Prior to the passage of the act of December 18, 1893 [now section 428 of the Penal Code of 1895], soliciting orders for the sale of spirituous, malt, or other intoxicating liquors, in any 'prohibition' county in this state was not indictable under any criminal statute of Georgia, but was for the first time made a state offense by the passage of that act." Section 428 of the Penal Code of 1895 was amended by the act of 1897, by inserting after the word "sell," in the second line, the words "contract to sell, take orders for." It is clear that the Legislature of 1897 thought that this section applied only to those counties wherein the sale of liquor was then prohibited by law; for the caption of the amendatory act expressly restricted its application to "where the sale [of such liquors] is now prohibited by law." In the case of Williams v. State, 107 Ga. 694, 33 S. E. 642, the Supreme Court holds that "the purpose of the act [section 428 of the Penal Code of 1895, as amended by the act of December 9, 1897] is to prevent whisky dealers from selling or contracting to sell, taking orders for, or soliciting, personally or by agent, the sale of intoxicating liquors in a 'dry' county, town, or district." The use of the word "dry" was intended to designate those counties where the sale of liquors is prohibited by law. It is unnecessary to multiply authorities on this point, for it cannot be doubted that the plain, manifest purpose of section 428, as amended, was to protect from the liquor traffic those counties wherein the sale of liquors was prohibited by law, and that this section is applicable only in those counties where the sale is prohibited. It therefore follows that, if there was no valid law which prohibited the sale of spirituous, malt, and intoxicating liquors in the county of Bartow at the time when the alleged offense was committed, there could have been no violation of section 428, as amended by the act of 1897, in that county; and an indictment based on that statute was invalid.

So the question recurs, was the sale of spirituous, malt, and intoxicating liquors prohibited by law, high license, or otherwise, in Bartow county on January 1, 1907, or at any time prior to that date, within the statute of limitations? Let us review the legislation on the subject of the liquor question, as applicable to Bartow county. On February 26, 1875 (Acts 1875, p. 338), a local act was passed, permitting an election in Bartow county to determine the question "whether or not spirituous, vinous, or malt liquors shall be sold, bartered, or in any way disposed of for a valuable consideration, in quantities less than one gallon." No election was ever held under this act, and it never became operative. On February 21, 1876 (Acts 1876, p. 328), this act of 1875 was amended, but there was no election under the act as amended, and it never became effective. On December 2, 1884, a local act was passed entitled "An act to submit to the qualified voters of Bartow county the question of the sale and furnishing of intoxicating, alcoholic, spirituous, vinous, or malt liquors in said county, and to prohibit the same from being sold or furnished after said election, if a majority of those voting shall so determine, and to provide penalties for such sale and furnishing, and for other purposes." This act was amended October 7, 1885, forbidding the sale of domestic wines at public places, and in quantities less than one quart. Acts of 1884-85, p. 541. An election was held under this act, and it received the number of votes necessary for its adoption, and became operative. On November 6, 1901, the Supreme Court, in the case of Griffin v. Eaves, 114 Ga. 65, 39 S. E. 913, following the principle ruled in Papworth v. State, 103 Ga. 36, 31 S. E. 402, and subsequent cases, declared that the special local act of 1884 for Bartow county was in conflict with the general domestic wine act of February 27, 1887, and was violative of that clause of the Constitution which prohibits special legislation in any case for which provision has been made by an existing general law. It was further decided in the same case that the general statute making it an offense to retail or sell intoxicating liquor without license was operative in Bartow county. Since the decision of the Supreme Court declaring the special local act of 1884-85 unconstitutional, this general law is the only one that has been of force in Bartow county. This law does not prohibit the sale of liquor. It permits the sale under a license granted by the proper county authorities. This is a regulation, and not a prohibition.

It seems perfectly clear to us that it would be a legal paradox and a logical absurdity to hold that section 431 of the Penal Code of 1895, which regulates, and section 428, which prohibits, can be effective and operative at the same time in the same county or locality. We do not understand the able Solicitor General to combat the correctness of this position. He claims, on the contrary, that section 428 does apply in Bartow county, because in that county the sale of liquor is prohibited by law. He admits that such sale is not prohibited by high license, for high license does not necessarily prohibit. Neither does he claim that there is in that county any special prohibition law, or that the people of the county have prohibited the sale under the provisions of the general local option law. He supports his contention that the sale is prohibited in Bartow county by the word "otherwise," used in the act of 1897, "prohibited by law, high license, or otherwise." He contends that the act of 1874 (Acts 1874, p. 330), creating the board of county commissioners for Bartow county, gives them exclusive jurisdiction to issue licenses for the sale of spirituous liquors in that county; that, having exclusive jurisdiction, the commissioners can refuse or grant licenses at their election; and that the fact that no license has been granted shows that the policy of the county is not to legalize the sale of liquors, and therefore the sale of spirituous liquors in that county is "otherwise prohibited by law," the "otherwise prohibited by law" consisting in the fact that the county commissioners have not granted a license to sell in the county. The syllogism of the Solicitor General proceeds in this wise: Exclusive jurisdiction is given to the county commissioners of Bartow county to grant or to refuse licenses for the sale of spirituous liquors in that county. They have not granted a license. Therefore the sale of liquor is prohibited by law. The conclusion is a palpable non sequitur from the premise. There may be many reasons for not having issued a license. No one may have applied, or no one acceptable to the commissioners may have applied. Questions of policy or expediency may have induced the commissioners to refuse those who applied. But the power to license existed, and this precluded the possibility of prohibition. The commissioners were not authorized by law to prohibit the sale of spirituous liquors, but only to regulate the sale thereof. Regulation is absolutely contradictory of prohibition. The former can never exist where the latter prevails, or vice versa. Even regulation that places the license so high that it amounts to practical prohibition does not, as a matter of law, prohibit. Glover v. State, 126 Ga. 594, 55 S. E. 592. According to the Supreme Court, in Griffin v. Eaves, supra, the only penal law applicable to the sale of liquor in Bartow county is that contained in section 431 of the Penal Code of 1895, and this law could not be applicable in that county if the sale of liquor was prohibited. The truth of the proposition is self-evident, and argument seems superfluous.

The words "otherwise prohibited," relied on by the state, really mean nothing in this statute. When the Legislature used the words "prohibited by law," it exhausted the subject, and the addition of the words "high license or otherwise" was "wasteful and ridiculous excess." These general words are sometimes added to specific enumeration in statutes out of abundance of caution, but they usually mean nothing. Certainly such words must be "restricted to the same genus as the things enumerated," and the use of the word "otherwise," following the words "prohibited by law," meant that the "otherwise" prohibition of the sale of liquor was to be a legal prohibition, that is, prohibited by the law of high license, or otherwise prohibited by law. But we do not think this general word means anything in this statute. Whatever it was intended to mean, it could not by any rule of logic give to the failure of the commissioners to grant licenses the force and effect of a positive enactment prohibiting the sale. The word "prohibit" is an active, transitive verb. As defined by the Standard Dictionary, it means "to forbid, especially by authority or legal enactment; interdict; as, to prohibit liquor selling, or a person from selling liquor." The word "prohibit," in its legal sense, implies some legislative enactment forbidding something. "The laws of England, from the early Plantagenets, sternly prohibited the conversion of malt into alcohol." "Prohibition," in the United States, specifically means "the forbidding by legislative enactment of the manufacture and sale of alcoholic liquors for use as beverage." Giving, therefore, to the word "prohibited" its ordinary signification and its technical meaning, as applied to the particular subject-matter of the sale of spirituous liquors, it must involve some positive act done by authority. If the position of the Solicitor General is correct, there is no necessity for any general prohibition law in Georgia, and the general local option law was an entirely useless piece of legislation. All that is necessary to secure prohibition in a county is to elect county officials who will arbitrarily and at all times refuse to grant licenses. This would put it in the power of one or more county officials to give or refuse prohibition to the people. This great question in which all the people are so much interested would not be under the control of positive statute, but of the caprice or honesty of a few individuals. If such were the law, a county might be "wet" one day and "dry" the next. If the people of Bartow county want the traffic of spirituous liquors prohibited in their county, they must avail themselves of the provisions of the general local option law of the state. The Supreme Court has repeatedly held that no special local law will give the protection, and surely the failure to grant licenses by the commissioners will not furnish such protection, for, at any time, the commissioners could change their minds and issue licenses.

We conclude that the sale of spirituous, malt, or intoxicating liquors was not prohibited by law, prohibited by high license, or prohibited otherwise, in Bartow county, when the plaintiffs in error were charged with a violation of section 428 of the Penal Code of 1895, as amended by the act of 1897, and that the demurrer to the indictment on this ground should have been sustained. Let the judgment of the Superior court, refusing to grant a new trial, be reversed, the verdict in both cases set aside, and the indictment quashed. The petition of the Solicitor General to review the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of Griffin v. Eaves, 114 Ga. 65, 39 S. E. 913, is refused. The principle upon which that case was decided was approved by the Supreme Court in several cases before and since the decision of that case. As late as the case of Glover v. State, 126 Ga. 607, 55 S. E. 592, it was cited and approved. In the case of Edwards v. State, 123 Ga. 544, 51 S. E. 630, the Supreme Court cites with approval the principle of the Papworth Case, and all subsequent cases involving the same question. In view of these repeated rulings of the Supreme Court, this court is not of the opinion that the question is one of so much doubt that it should be referred to the Supreme Court for review.

CRIMINAL LAW—REVIEW—DISPOSITION OF CAUSE.

The constitutionality of the act of December 20, 1898 (Acts 1898, p. 60), amending section 341 of the Penal Code of 1895, by inserting therein, after the word "any," and before the word "pistol," the words "kind of metal knucks," being the only question involved in this case, and the question having been certified to the Supreme Court, and that court having held adversely to the contention of the plaintiff in error, and that said act is not unconstitutional, an affirmance of the judgment of the trial court, in overruling the demurrer based upon the contention that said amendatory act was unconstitutional, must result.

WILLS—CONSTRUCTION—DEVISE OF LIFE ESTATE.

A devise of a life estate, made in distinct terms in a prior item, will not be enlarged into a fee-simple estate by the general language of a subsequent item, where the language and the general context of the will do not clearly and plainly indicate such to be the testator's purpose and intent.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Troup County; R. W. Freeman, Judge.

Action by S. A. Smith, administrator, against H. C. Kimbrough. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant brings error. Affirmed.

S. A. Smith, as administrator de bonis non cum testamento annexo of John A. Smith, filed his complaint for land against Kimbrough, administrator of Thomas Wesley Smith, and the case was submitted to the judge without a jury under an agreed statement of facts. In accordance with the terms of this agreement he subsequently rendered his decision, which was in favor of the plaintiff, and the defendant filed the present bill of exceptions complaining of that decision. The agreed statement of facts shows that John A. Smith died in 1880, testate, and that his sons, S. P. and Thomas Wesley, who were named as executors in the will, duly qualified and administered the estate, and were discharged in 1883. The third item of the will is as follows: "I give and bequeath to my beloved wife, Mary Smith, and to my son Thomas Wesley Smith, jointly, the following lots and fractions of lots of land [being the land sued for in the present case]. The lands with their appurtenances, herein mentioned, are to be held, and the rents or profits thereof enjoyed, jointly by them. If one dies before the other, the survivor shall have the share of the one who dies, and at the death of both said property shall revert to my estate, to be equally divided among my heirs at law, at that time in life; and, as the mills situated on the lands thus disposed of require repairs, I give my wife and son Thos. Wesley five hundred dollars for the purpose of making such repairs." The fourth, sixth, and seventh items of the will make bequests to his other children of lands therein specified; the estate in each instance being without any limitation. Item 5 gives certain land to his sister for life, with remainder to a named daughter. Item 8 sets out that "in making the above and foregoing bequests it is distinctly to be understood that in every instance the property so bequeathed is to go to the legatees mentioned and their lawful heirs, and in no instance to be subject to the debts of said legatees, and the same ruling to apply to the bequests that are to be made in the items that follow, and I value the lands thus bequeathed as follows, to wit: Those to my wife and Thos. Wesley jointly, $6,000; to Nannie White, $3,500; to Sarah E. Cleveland, $3,942 [these two being daughters]; and to Samuel P. Smith, at $3,805." Item 9 provides that "all the balance of my property, of each and every description, whenever and wherever it may be or consist of, I desire and direct that the same may be divided and distributed among my heirs at law hereinbefore mentioned in the foregoing items, so that the distribution may be equal, taking as a basis upon which to estimate the values I have placed on the realty bequeathed, counting my wife and Thos. Wesley as two shares; and it is to be distinctly understood that the bequest to my wife is in lieu of dower." The residue of the estate immediately after the death of the testator was appraised at $35,000. These legacies were assented to, and the legatees took possession of the lands bequeathed to them. Thomas Wesley was born in 1832, and from his childhood had lived with his father and mother, never having married, and was so living at the time the will was made, and at testator's death. The other children had married and with their families were living apart from the testator. Thomas Wesley continued to live with his mother, unmarried, till her death in 1884, but later, in 1894, married. He continued to live upon the land devised to himself and mother after her death, and till his death, which occurred on June 13, 1904. He left surviving him a wife and one child, who continued to live on the place after his death, and this suit is brought by the administrator de bonis non of his father's estate, against the administrator of Thomas Wesley Smith, to recover this land.

F. M. Longley, for plaintiff in error. J. R. Terrell, for defendant in error.

EVANS, J. The solution of the case presented by this record depends upon the character of the estate, whether fee simple or for life only, which Thomas Wesley Smith took in the lands devised in the third item of his father's will. If no other considerations entered into the construction of this item beyond defining the plain and unambiguous language of the testator according to its obvious legal effect, no difficulty would be experienced in declaring the nature of the estate therein created. With almost technical precision the testator devised to his wife and son Thomas Wesley an estate for their joint lives, with survivorship, and after the death of the survivor a reversion of the land devised to his estate, to be distributed among his heirs at law living at the time of the death of the survivor. But the plaintiff in error insists that the eighth item of the will is irreconcilable with item 3, and that the life estate created in the third item became absolute under the eighth item, and vested in Thomas Wesley Smith an absolute fee-simple estate upon the death of his mother. Civ. Code 1895, § 3346, provides that, "where there are inconsistent provisions in the same will, the latter must prevail." Before a posterior provision shall be given the effect of nullifying a devise previously made in the will, the conflict between the two provisions must be irreconcilable. A subsequent provision which diminishes a precedent gift, as by cutting down to a life estate a prior devise, is not so far conflicting and irreconcilable with that gift as to be in a legal sense repugnant thereto. Broach v. Kitchens, 23 Ga. 515; Sheftall v. Roberts, 30 Ga. 453; Vaughn v. Howard, 75 Ga. 285. In these cases the language of the posterior clause reducing the estate was in express terms, and not in general language. When the words of the will in the first instance distinctly indicate an intent to make a clear gift, such gift is not to be cut down by any subsequent provision which is inferential, and which is not equally as distinct as the former. 30 Am. & Eng. Enc. L. (2d Ed.) 687; 1 Jarman on Wills, *438. The reason underlying this principle is equally applicable to the converse of the proposition, to wit, that, where the prior devise of an estate less than a fee is made in distinct terms, it will not be enlarged into a fee by the general language of a subsequent item, unless the language and general context clearly and unmistakably discloses such to be the testator's purpose and intent. It is familiar law that the whole will is to be taken together, and operation to be given to every part of it, if possible, and no part should ever be rejected because of conflict with another part, except where the repugnancy is so palpable that both items can not be given effect. The language relied on in this case to create the repugnancy is the statement in the eighth item that the property bequeathed in the previous items "is to go to the legatees mentioned and their lawful heirs, and in no instance to be subject to the debts of said legatees." It is quite evident that the testator was of the opinion, from the language he used, that he could devise property to his children, and at the same time exempt it from liability to their debts. The eighth item does not remotely suggest the testator's intent to modify or annul the provisions as to survivorship between his wife and Thomas Wesley, and there could be no survivorship except that a life estate was created. We would be doing violence to the clear and distinct purpose manifested by the testator in the disposition of the land devised in the third item to hold that the clear and distinct gift of a life estate was to be converted into a fee-simple estate by the general language employed in the eighth item of his will.

Plaintiff in error further contends that the testator discloses an intention, in the eighth and ninth items of his will, to make an equal distribution among his heirs at law; that the real purpose of the testator was to divide his estate into five equal parts, giving two to his wife and Thomas Wesley, and to the three other children each an equal share. We gather from the whole will that the testamentary scheme did not comprehend equality in the estates devised. A construction which would enlarge the estate granted to Thomas Wesley in the third item into a fee simple would destroy that equality for which the plaintiff in error so earnestly contends, since Thomas Wesley, if he should survive his mother, would be given a much larger share than would pass to the other children under the terms of the will. It would seem that the testator had more in mind equality in present interest than equality of the estate devised to his several children. In his estimate of the land devised to the different legatees he values the land without reference to the estate created therein, and for the purpose of making an equal division of the residuum on the basis of such valuation. The will itself is demonstrative that this was the general testamentary scheme, and presents no ambiguity. But, even if we were of the opinion that the will raised an ambiguity, the attendant circumstances of the testator and his family, appearing in the agreed statement of facts, illustrates that the construction we place upon it is the correct one. The precise date of the will does not appear in the record, but it was probated in 1880. At that time Thomas Wesley was 48 years of age, living with his mother, and unmarried. The other children were married and living apart from the testator at the time of his death. It is easy to infer from these circumstances that the testator did not believe that his son Thomas Wesley would ever marry, and he desired the land specifically devised to go to his lineal heirs upon the death of the survivor named in the third item of his will. The residuum of the estate was appraised at $35,000, approximately double the value of the land specifically devised. The record is silent as to whether this residuum consisted of personalty or realty. Both his wife and Thomas Wesley took their shares of this residuum without limitation. While we are of the opinion that the will is unambiguous, we advert to these attendant circumstances of the testator and his family, which were before the trial judge, only to show that the construction which we have given is consonant with those circumstances at the time the will was executed. The case was tried by the judge without a jury, by consent, upon an agreed statement of facts, and we agree in the judgment of the trial judge that Thomas Wesley Smith's estate in the lands devised in the third item of the will determined upon his death.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 15, 1907.)

1. WRIT OF ERROR—RECORD—PROCEEDINGS ON MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL.

The record contained an original motion for new trial, based upon the general grounds only, and also two amendments to the motion for new trial, containing various special grounds. It does not appear that an order was taken at or before the hearing approving the special grounds, but it does appear that a number of the special grounds are set forth in detail in the bill of exceptions, which contain an averment that "the recitals of fact contained in the motion for new trial are true and correct." Held, that such of the grounds as are set forth in the bill of exceptions are sufficiently verified to be considered by this court. Starling v. Thorne, 13 S. E. 552, 87 Ga. 513.

2. TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—SUBMISSION OF MATTER NOT WITHIN ISSUES.

The case involves simply the question as to whether the claimant was entitled to the specific performance of an alleged parol agreement for the sale of land between himself and the plaintiff's intestate; the plaintiff being an administrator who was seeking to sell the land in dispute. The pleadings and evidence were not of such character as to raise an issue of fraud. The instructions of the judge with reference to fraud, being wholly foreign to the issue, were calculated to mislead the jury, and a new trial should have been granted on account of the error committed in giving such instructions.

Where counsel for both parties agreed, in regard to the execution and return of certain interrogatories, that "any disinterested party may act as sole commissioner in the execution and return of the above interrogatories, but the answers must be written by the witness personally," compliance with this stipulation was sufficiently shown when it was made to appear that the witness to whom the interrogatories were to be propounded dictated his answer to another person who wrote them out on a typewriter, and that the answers were read over to the witness, who then, having previously been duly sworn, signed the same.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Cobb County; Geo. F. Gober, Judge.

Action by L. G. Zenovitch against N. A. Glenn. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Zenovitch brought suit against Mrs. Glenn on a promissory note, dated October 21, 1902, for the principal sum of $300. The defendant filed a plea and several amendments, in which she alleged that said note had been obtained by fraud of plaintiff, and, "if signed by her, is totally without consideration." She further alleged, and set up in her testimony, that plaintiff is indebted to her upon two promissory notes, dated February 20, 1903, and February 21, 1903, for the principal sum of $259 and $150, respectively; and she prayed judgment on said notes against the plaintiff. The plaintiff testified that he had had dealings with the defendant prior to October 21, 1902, and that she had become indebted to him up to that time in the sum of $1,673 on a note and $200 for money loaned; that he commenced legal proceedings upon said indebtedness against her, and on October 21, 1902, they agreed upon a settlement whereby she paid him $500 in cash and gave her note for $300, which note is the subject of this suit. The only portion of plaintiff's testimony which can be construed as a denial of the notes set up by the defendant in her cross-petition is the following: "The only cash I received besides the $500 was the sum of $15 paid by her, for which I gave a note for $15. * * * I have never received since October 21, 1902, any money or other thing of value from Mrs. Glenn in settlement of this note [the note here sued on] or for any other purpose—that is, in satisfaction of any existing debt, as a gift or as a loan—except the $15 hereinbefore mentioned, that she paid me in Tacoma in 1903." The evidence upon the other material issues was conflicting. The jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $300, with interest. The defendant's motion for new trial was overruled, and she excepted.

F. Roland Alston, for plaintiff in error. Moore & Pomeroy, for defendant in error.

BECK, J. (after stating the foregoing facts).
1. The plaintiff filed no responsive pleading to the counterclaim set up by the defendant in her cross-petition, and we are left to gather from plaintiff's testimony what his defense, if any, was. In this connection the defendant swore: "One day he [plaintiff] asked me for $250, and gave me his note for it. This is Mr. Zenovitch's signature [identifying note for $250, dated February 20, 1903]. I saw him sign that paper. * * *. This entire note is in his handwriting. * * *. At that time I loaned him $250. This note [identifying note, dated February 21, 1903, for $150] is for money that I gave him. That is his signature. The paper is in his handwriting." It is argued in the brief of counsel for plaintiff below, defendant in error here, that "plaintiff had no knowledge of them [the notes set up by the defendant] until the plea was filed on the day of the trial; and, as his interrogatories had been taken several days before and were then in court, he had no notice of this defense, and consequently did not deny these notes specifically, but his evidence leaves no doubt that said notes were never signed by him." Under these circumstances, it would have been perfectly competent for the plaintiff to move for a continuance of the case on the ground of surprise, in order to prepare to meet the issue thus raised; but this he failed to do, relying upon his other testimony to rebut the presumption in favor of the notes (the execution of which was nowhere denied) and the direct testimony of the defendant in support of the same. It is true the plaintiff testified that he had received no "money or other thing of value" from the defendant, "as a gift or as a loan," since October 21, 1902; but this entire statement is qualified by the words, "in satisfaction of any existing debt." This averment, therefore, is altogether too loose and general to support a plea of want or failure of consideration of the notes held by the defendant, the alleged consideration of which was money loaned, not "in satisfaction of any existing debt," but as an independent transaction whereby plaintiff became indebted to the defendant. It follows from what has been said that the verdict in favor of the plaintiff, for the full amount of the note sued on by him, was without evidence to support it, and the court erred in overruling defendant's motion for a new trial based on that ground.

2. The movant complains in one of the grounds of the motion for a new trial that the court erred in admitting in evidence the interrogatories of Zenovitch; the ground of the objection being that "they were not executed in accordance with the agreement between counsel as to the manner of execution, in that the answers were not written by the witness and were not in the handwriting of the witness as provided by said agreement." The agreement above referred to was as follows: "It is agreed that any disinterested party may act as sole commissioner in the execution and return of the above interrogatories. But the answers must be written by the witness personally and certified to by a notary public." The notary public, who acted as commissioner to execute the interrogatories, certified the same as follows: "This is to certify: That L. G. Zenovitch presented to me, William Thompson, notary public in and for the state of Washington, duly commissioned and sworn, the attached interrogatories together with the exhibits thereto attached, and that, before answering said interrogatories, I propounded an oath to the said L. G. Zenovitch, which oath he took, and said that in his said answers to his said interrogatories he would tell the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. That the answers to each and every one of said interrogatories were given in my presence, and were dictated to a stenographer upon a typewriter directly, and that the same were carefully read over to him after being written and answered, and are verified by him as being the true and correct answers as [he] dictated them. That he did not write out the answers to the interrogatories in longhand himself, for the reason that he is a slow writer, and it is only with the greatest difficulty that he can write on account of poor health and a stiff wrist. That he signed his name after the same had been carefully read over by him, and that he has taken oath before me that the answers have been correctly transcribed according as he dictated them in person." And the following affidavit of said Zenovitch is attached to the answers to the interrogatories: "That he either wrote or dictated the foregoing answers to the interrogatories. That he has carefully read the same over and the interrogatories. That he knows the contents of all of said answers, and that the same constitute his answers as dictated by him, and the same are true." It has been held by this court, and we do not desire to be understood as laying down any rule in conflict therewith, that, "to render the evidence of a witness taken by written interrogatories admissible in the first instance, the statute requires that two commissioners shall act in taking the depositions of the witness; and, if for any reason the parties waive this provision of the statute and agree that such may be taken by one commissioner, it is a compliance with the terms of the agreement which makes the execution legal, and authorizes the admission of the evidence so taken. It follows that, to bring about this result, the terms of the agreement must be strictly observed." Rooney v. Southern Association, 115 Ga. 400, 41 S. E. 648. In the case just cited the court said: "The terms of the agreement * * * were neither strictly nor substantially observed." In the case at bar, however, the witness dictated his answers to the interrogatories just as he would have written them. The same were carefully read over to him after being written. He makes oath that they were his answers as dictated by him, and signs the same with his signature. And we can see no reason for holding that this was not a sufficient compliance with the agreement that "the answers must be written by the witness personally."

3. Where a note is given in settlement of a suit pending in court against the maker of the note, said party is bound thereby; and this is true whether the suit itself was instituted upon a just and valid claim or not. City Electric Ry. Co. v. Floyd County, 115 Ga. 655, 42 S. E. 45.

4. No error appears to have been committed by the trial judge, except as indicated above, and the judgment is reversed alone for the reason stated in the first division of the opinion.

3. TRIAL — INSTRUCTIONS — SUBMISSION OF MATTER NOT WITHIN THE ISSUES.

There was no evidence authorizing the judge to charge the jury on the law of special deposits; and the instruction on this subject was, under the facts of the case, an error of such a grave nature as to require a reversal of the judgment.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Warren County; B. T. Rawlings, Judge.

Action by C. E. McGregor, receiver, against B. L. Battle. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

McGregor, as receiver of the Bank of Warrenton, brought suit against Battle, alleging that on February 17, 1902, and prior thereto, and especially on February 14th the bank was insolvent or in contemplation of insolvency, and while so insolvent the bank, in collusion with the defendant, delivered to him, and he took therefrom, the sum of $7,000 in cash, which amount was received by him under the following circumstances: On February 11th he became a stockholder in the bank, having purchased 70 shares of its capital stock of the par value of $100, and certificates of stock were duly issued and delivered to him. On February 13th, in collusion with Allen, who was his brother-in-law and president of the bank, defendant delivered to Allen the 70 shares of stock, and Allen directed the cashier to pay to defendant $7,000 of the cash of the bank, or to place the same to the credit of the defendant as a depositor, and on February 14th the defendant, with a full knowledge of the insolvency of the bank, drew said $7,000 in cash therefrom. The purpose of Allen was to give the defendant a preference over the other creditors of the bank; the liabilities of the bank being at that time $80,000 while its assets did not exceed $10,000. At that time the bank was absolutely insolvent and known to be so by the defendant. Some of the depositors made inquiries with a view to withdrawing their deposits, when the defendant, in collusion with Allen, made a public display of the $7,000 for the purpose of deceiving them, and they, being so deceived, allowed their deposits to remain in the bank. The assets in the hands of the plaintiff, as receiver, are not sufficient to satisfy all of the liabilities of the bank, and it is therefore necessary to recover from the defendant the amount he fraudulently received. It is charged that the payment to Battle by the bank was for the purpose of giving Battle a preference over the other creditors of the bank, and was done with the intent to delay, hinder, and defraud such other creditors, and that this intent was known to Battle. The prayer was that Battle be required to receive the certificates of stock, and that plaintiff have a judgment for the sum of $7,000, with interest from February 14, 1902. The defendant filed an answer, alleging as follows: He was never a stockholder in the bank. He had no knowledge whatever, until within a few days before its failure, that it was insolvent or in an embarrassed condition. A week or 10 days before the failure, at the solicitation of the cashier, who assured him that the bank was solvent and its stock was a good investment, he agreed to make some investigation as to the bank's affairs with a view to taking stock therein, and, making a casual investigation, he ascertained that three named parties owed the bank large sums, but there was other large indebtedness to the bank that he did not know of. In ignorance of the indebtedness, other than that of the three persons above referred to, he agreed to take $15,000 of stock in the event that one of such persons paid the entire indebtedness and the others reduced theirs to a safe amount. These negotiations began about February 1st; and on February 10th he agreed to take the stock on the conditions referred to. He made arrangements by which he obtained the money, and on February 12th deposited in the bank $7,000 which he expected to use to pay for the stock. On February 14th he happened to be in the bank, when the cashier, who had been very officious in endeavoring to induce him to take the stock, without any request from him, handed him through the window a paper, which, to his surprise, he discovered was a certificate for $7,000 of stock. He then stated to the cashier that he was not to take any of the stock except upon certain conditions, and asked the cashier where was Mr. Allen, the president. On being informed that Mr. Allen was in his office in the rear of the bank, he immediately took the certificate to Allen, and asked him if the conditions on which he was to take the stock had been complied with. On being informed that they had not, defendant at once told Allen that he could not take the stock until these conditions had been complied with, and left the certificate of stock with Allen. It was immediately after this that the defendant drew out his money which was on deposit in the bank. It was not placed there in payment for stock, and was not passed to the stock account with the defendant's knowledge and consent. Allen agreed to release the defendant from his contract for the stock, and, in pursuance of this agreement, paid him the money which he had deposited. The trial resulted in a verdict for the defendant; and the plaintiff made a motion for a new trial, which being overruled he excepted.

CORB, P. J. (after stating the facts). 1. The liability of the defendant to the plaintiff depends upon the character of the deposit made by him when the $7,000 were turned over to the bank. If it was a special deposit for a particular purpose—that is, to be kept by the bank intact to be used to pay for the stock if the conditions upon which he was to purchase were complied with—he would not be liable to the plaintiff for withdrawing the deposit at the time that he did. If the money was deposited with the bank for safe-keeping only, there to remain intact until called for, the defendant would have the right to call for the same at any time, and have delivered to him the parcel containing his money, without reference to the financial condition of the bank at the time that the demand for the special deposit was made upon it. In either event, no title to the money passed to the bank. Zane on Banks & Banking, § 162 et seq. If the money was placed in the bank on general deposit, the moment the deposit became complete title to the money passed to the bank, and the relation of debtor and creditor was created between the parties. "The moment the deposit was made the credit of the banker was substituted for the money." Ricks v. Broyles, 78 Ga. 614, 3 S. E. 773, 6 Am. St. Rep. 280; Schofield Mfg. Co. v. Cochran, 119 Ga. 901, 47 S. E. 208. The defendant admits in his answer and in his evidence that he deposited the money in the bank. The question, therefore, is whether it was general deposit or a special deposit. The money was turned over to the officers of the bank. There was no request that the deposit should be kept separate from the other funds of the bank. It was entered upon the books as a general deposit. A certificate of deposit was issued to the defendant, which, so far as the evidence discloses, had none of the indicia of a special deposit. When the defendant sought to withdraw his money, he signed a check upon the bank—the usual manner in which general deposits are withdrawn. The transaction had all of the characteristics of a general deposit, and was entirely lacking in any of the essential elements of a special deposit. It is true that on the day following the making of the deposit, when the check drawn by the defendant was paid, he received in payment of his check a part of the identical money that he had deposited the day before, but he received other money from the bank also; the amount of money put in by him not being on that day sufficient to discharge his check in full. What he received on the day following his deposit was the money of the bank. It was true that it was his money at one time on the preceding day, but, as a legal consequence resulting from the deposit in the manner in which it was made, title to the money vested in the bank; and, when he drew his check as a general depositor, while he received back some of the very money which he had himself deposited, he did not receive it as his own money, but as the money of the bank. Some of this money, although the identical money that he had deposited on the day before, was as much the property of the bank as the remainder of the amount paid to him which came from other funds of the bank. There are respectable authorities holding that if a bank receives a general deposit at a time when it is insolvent, and its insolvency is known to the officers of the bank, but unknown to the depositor, the depositor may reclaim his deposit; no title to the money passing on account of the fraud perpetrated upon him. In some cases this doctrine seems to have been recognized in the general terms above stated. In others it has been limited to those cases where the money of the depositor could be identified and separated from the general funds of the bank. In other cases it has been held that the doctrine does not apply if the money of the depositor has become mingled with the general funds of the bank. 5 Cyc. 565; 2 Morse on Banks

(4th Ed.) § 629; Boone on Banks, § 295; Magee on Banks, § 333; Zane on Banks, § 344; 3 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 847. The Code declares that if an insolvent bank or banker, with knowledge of such insolvency, shall receive money on general deposit, and fail to pay the depositor within three days after demand, such banker or officer in charge of the bank receiving the deposit shall be guilty of a felony. Civ. Code 1895, § 1982; Pen. Code 1895, § 207. The primary purpose of this provision is to punish the officers of a bank who receive on deposit money of others, knowing that the bank is in a condition where it cannot repay the same. It is contended that this is a recognition, by the General Assembly, of the fact that the receiving of the deposit under such circumstances is a fraud on the depositor who is ignorant of the condition of the bank, and therefore is in effect a recognition of the principle above alluded to, which authorizes a depositor to reclaim his deposit. It is to be noted, however, that the banker or officer of an incorporated bank may prevent a prosecution by repayment of the deposit within three days after demand. In the case of a private banker he may repay the same from any assets owned by him independently of those embarked in his banking business, or assets thus embarked so long as he is in a position where he can legally control the disbursement of such assets; but in the case of an officer of an incorporated bank, in order to prevent a prosecution, he must refund to the depositor the amount of his deposit out of his own assets, for the penalty of the law is placed upon him as an individual, and he has no authority, by virtue of his office in the bank, to use the assets of the bank for the purpose, unless it is done by the authority of those in control of the bank, and under the circumstances it is lawful for the bank to make such a disposition of its assets. The Code also declares that all conveyances, assignments, transfers of stock, or other contracts made by the bank in contemplation of insolvency, or after insolvency, except for the benefit of all creditors and stockholders, shall be fraudulent and void unless made to an innocent purchaser for value, without notice or knowledge of the condition of the bank, and the officers making or consenting to such conveyance or contract shall be punished as for a felony. Civ. Code 1895, § 1979; Pen. Code 1895, § 208. The purpose of this provision is to prevent the bank from preferring one of its creditors when the fact of insolvency is known to the creditor. A depositor by general deposit is a mere creditor, and if the bank makes to the depositor a conveyance, or assignment, or transfer of stock, or other contract the legal effect of which is to give to such depositor a preference over the other creditors, the transaction is void, and the officer conducting the same a felon. It is a well-settled principle that, if one obtains the goods of another under a contract of sale as the result of a fraudulent misrepresentation as to his solvency, the seller, upon discovering the fraud, may rescind the sale and reclaim the goods in the event they are still in the possession of the buyer, and the rights of innocent parties are not affected by such reclamation. It may be therefore that where, by the fraudulent representation of the officer of a bank as to its solvency, one is induced to make a general deposit of his money, the depositor may, after the discovery of the fraud that has been perpetrated upon him, recover the money that he has deposited, provided the same can be identified and the actual money received by the bank returned to him; but, where one intending to become a depositor in a bank makes no inquiry as to its solvency, and is not induced to make the deposit as the result of any statement made by the officers of the bank, such depositor is in no better position than any other person who deals with an insolvent under the impression that he is solvent. One who sells goods to an insolvent, such sale not being brought about by any fraudulent misrepresentation, cannot, after the goods have been delivered, reclaim the same upon the ground that he has since discovered that his buyer is insolvent, even though the fact of insolvency were well known to every other person than the seller himself. Upon the same principle we think that where one deals with a bank upon the assumption that it is solvent, and intrusts his money to it as a general depositor, he has no superior claim over other creditors growing out of the fact that he was ignorant of the insolvency at the time of the deposit; there being no other fact amounting to an inducement to make the deposit other than the bank holding itself out to the world as a bank of deposit. We do not think that the mere silence of the officers of the bank as to its condition at the time of the deposit is sufficient either to authorize a depositor to reclaim his money on account of a fraud, or to give him any superior lien over other creditors in the distribution of the assets of the bank. As stated above, however, we are aware that there are respectable authorities which go to this extent.

2. If a bank is insolvent, but is still conducting its business, and pays the check of a depositor in the usual course of business, and the depositor has no notice of the insolvency, the payment is good, and the depositor is protected notwithstanding the bank is actually insolvent. In Hill v. W. & A. R. Co., 86 Ga. 284, 12 S. E. 635, it was held that a depositor who draws his check on a bank and receives effects therefrom, without notice of, or reason to suspect, its insolvency, will be treated as a bona fide purchaser under the act above referred to. See, also, Dutcher v. Importers' Bank, 59 N. Y. 5. There is no ruling in the case in 86 Ga. 284, 12 S. E. 635, as to what would be the effect upon the transaction if the depositor knew of the insolvency, or had reason to suspect it, at the time that he received payment of his check, when such payment was made while the bank was still in operation and the payment made in the usual course of business. It is a well-known fact that the suspicion that a bank is insolvent causes all depositors who are acquainted with the facts leading to the suspicion to rush at once and withdraw their deposits. A run on a bank is always produced by those who think they have reason to suspect that the bank is in a failing condition; and we are not prepared to hold if a bank is still in operation, open during the usual hours of business, paying its checks in the order in which they are presented, according to the custom of bankers, that a depositor who merely had reason to suspect the solvency of the bank, this being the motive for his drawing a check, would be required to repay to the bank the amount so withdrawn, less what would be his pro rata share in the assets of the bank on the day that the amount was withdrawn, in the event that the bank was afterwards forced to liquidation, and was, in fact, insolvent. Neither are we prepared to hold that one who actually knows that a bank is insolvent, but does nothing except to draw his check and present it and receive payment over the counter in the usual course of business, would be required to refund the amount so withdrawn, less his pro rata share, upon a final winding up of the affairs of the bank. As we understand this record a decision of these questions is not necessary. But, when a depositor with notice, or knowledge, or reason to suspect that a bank is insolvent, by collusion with the officers of a bank, receives payment of his check not in the usual course of business, and under such circumstances that payment to him gives him a preference over the other creditors, the depositor is guilty of a fraud upon the other creditors, and will be required to refund all of the amount so withdrawn by him, except what would be his proportion of the assets upon the winding up of the affairs of the bank. And especially would this be true in a case where the doors of a bank were closed and other depositors were not being paid and the depositor receiving his money was singled out as the sole depositor, or one of a select few, who were being paid, when the depositors, as a class, were not being paid in the order in which their checks were presented. It has been held that if a payment was made not in the ordinary course of business, when the bank was actually, though not avowedly, insolvent, the payee cannot hold the amount paid to him, though he was ignorant of the bank's condition. 2 Morse on Banks (4th Ed.) § 625. Payment made by an insolvent bank, or made in contemplation of insolvency, with the intent to give a preference to a particular creditor, is void, irrespective of whether the insolvency was open and notorious, or whether the payee knew of the insolvency or motive of the bank in making the payment. Boone on Banks, § 301. Under our statutes, however, it would seem that if the depositor, although paid not in the usual course of business, was ignorant of the insolvency and of the intent of the bank to prefer him, he would be protected, and not required to refund. However, it would seem, under some circumstances, that payment out of the usual course of business would be a circumstance to be given great weight in determining whether there was notice, as a payment made with a view of giving a preference to a particular creditor is rarely, if ever, made in the usual course of business. See, in this connection, Clarke v. Ingram, 107 Ga. 565, 33 S. E. 802.

3. There was no evidence whatever authorizing the instruction of the judge on the subject of special deposits. The instruction of the judge, that if the defendant placed his money on deposit, and such action was induced by the officers of the bank, and if the insolvency of the bank was unknown to him, he would have a right to withdraw the money when he learned of the insolvency, was also unauthorized by the evidence; there being no evidence whatever that there was any inducement held out to him to make the deposit which he himself claims was a mere general deposit. The errors thus committed are of such grave nature, under the facts of the case, as to require a reversal of the judgment. The assignment made by the president and cashier of the bank, without the authority of the board of directors, was admissible simply as a circumstance showing the insolvency of the bank; it being, in effect, an admission of both the president and the cashier that the bank was insolvent on the day of the transaction in question, but the rejection of this evidence probably would not have been alone sufficient reason for reversing the judgment.

RAGAN v. STANDARD SCALE CO.

SUBROGATION—PURCHASERS OF INCUMBERED PROPERTY.

Where one purchases a certain piece of property against which there are two recorded mortgages, and pays off the senior mortgage out of the purchase money, and it is canceled, equity will not, in the absence of an agreement between the parties to that effect, subrogate him to the rights of the senior mortgagee, as against the other incumbrancer, whose lien was subject to the senior mortgage, but prior to the purchase.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 44, Subrogation, § 38.]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Floyd County; Moses Wright, Judge.

Action by the Standard Scale Company against R. J. Ragan. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

The Standard Scale Company filed an equitable petition against Ragan, and alleged the following facts: On May 26, 1902, one Corley executed and delivered to the Exchange Bank of Rome certain promissory notes for the principal sum of $240, and secured the notes by a mortgage on one "De Loach paragon" planer, and the mortgage was recorded on May 27, 1902. Subsequently Corley executed to Ragan a mortgage covering the same property, which was recorded on October 8, 1902, and "some time during the month of November, 1902, petitioner bought said property from said Corley for the sum of $200, and out of said purchase price it [plaintiff] paid the Exchange Bank of Rome the sum of $160; said amount being the balance due said bank upon said note and mortgage held by it. Upon receipt of said sum, said bank canceled its said mortgage, and surrendered the same to Corley." Ragan obtained a judgment in the city court against Corley on Corley's note and mortgage to him, and the execution was levied on the property described in the mortgage; and to this levy the Standard Scale Company interposed a claim. Corley is insolvent and has left the state. It was prayed "that said Ragan be enjoined from proceeding further with said case in the city court until this cause can be heard and disposed of; that petitioner be subrogated to the rights of said bank as against said property; that said Ragan be required to pay * * * petitioner the sum of $160, with 8 per cent. interest thereon from November 6, 1902; and that upon failure to pay said amount, with interest, said property be found not subject to the mortgage fi. fa. held by said Ragan." The case was submitted to the presiding judge upon an agreed statement of facts, which accorded with the foregoing statement, and the court rendered judgment as follows: "That the property levied upon and claimed in said cause be, and the same is hereby, found not subject to the lien of plaintiff's fi. fa. unless plaintiff in fi. fa. (Ragan) pay over to claimant (Standard Scale Company) within thirty days from the date hereof the sum of $160, with 8 per cent. interest thereon from November 6, 1902." Ragan excepted.

C. E. Davis and J. W. & G. E. Maddox, for plaintiff in error. Dean & Dean, for defendant in error.

BECK, J. (after stating the facts). 1. The doctrine of subrogation was ably discussed by Justice Cobb in the case of Wilkins v. Gibson, 113 Ga. 31, 38 S. E. 374, 84 Am. St. Rep. 204, where the rule was announced (page 47 of 113 Ga., and page 381 of 38 S. E.) that "subrogation will arise only in those cases where the party claiming it advanced the money to pay a debt which, in the event of default by the debtor, he would be bound to pay, or where he has some interest to protect, or where he advanced the money under an agreement, expressed or implied, made either with the debtor or creditor, that he would be subrogated to the rights and remedies of the creditor." The case of Simpson v. Ennis, 114 Ga. 202, 39 S. E. 853, which is relied upon by the defendant in error to support the ruling of the court below, is not in point in the case at bar. In that case Simpson purchased certain lands from the heirs of a deceased person. At the time of the purchase it was represented to Simpson by the heirs and their attorney that there were no other debts against the estate, except one due the Georgia Loan & Trust Company and some state and county taxes, which it was agreed that the purchaser should pay out of the purchase money, and which he did so pay. There is nothing in the record to show that the purchaser had either actual or constructive notice of any other debts due by the decedent. Subsequently to this conveyance the defendant qualified as administrator of the estate of said deceased, and brought an action of ejectment against the grantees of Simpson to recover, as the property of the decedent, the lands thus sold in order to subject them to judgments which had been obtained against him as administrator. Simpson filed an equitable petition to enjoin the administrator from prosecuting the ejectment suits until he should have reimbursed the petitioner for the amounts paid by him in extinguishing the debt to the Georgia Loan & Trust Company; and this court very properly held that the plaintiff was subrogated to the rights of the creditor whose debts he had extinguished as against the plaintiff in the ejectment suits. In the present case, however, the plaintiff purchased a piece of property against which there were two recorded mortgages. He paid off the senior mortgage, and "the bank [the holder thereof] canceled its said mortgage and surrendered the same to Corley," the plaintiff's vendor; and the plaintiff now seeks to be subrogated to the rights of the bank as against the holder of the junior incumbrance.

The rule in such cases is thus stated in Sheldon on Subrogation (2d Ed.) 48: "Where the purchaser from a mortgagor pays off the mortgage and has it discharged without more, equity will not subrogate him to the rights of the mortgagee against an incumbrancer whose lien is subject to the mortgage, but prior to the purchase." And in 27 Am. & Eng. Enc. of L. (2d Ed.) 238, it is said: "A purchaser of property who has discharged an incumbrance thereon will be subrogated to the lien of such incumbrance as against the holders of other incumbrances of which he had no notice, but not as against the holders of other incumbrances of which he had notice, either actual or constructive."

See, also, Woodside v. Lippold, 118 Ga. 877, 39 S. E. 400, 84 Am. St. Rep. 267. When the Standard Scale Company purchased the property in controversy from Corley and paid off the mortgage to the bank, it did so with constructive, if not actual, notice that Ragan held another mortgage against the same property; and it is not contended that the scale company made any agreement with either the debtor or the creditor that it was to be subrogated to the rights and priorities of the bank. Under the rule above announced, it follows that the court erred in holding that the plaintiff was subrogated to the lien of the bank as against the mortgage held by Ragan.

WHITE et al. v. NORTH GEORGIA ELECTRIC CO. et al.

1. INJUNCTION — CONTEMPT — MULTIFARIOUS PETITION.

If a petition for injunction and other relief is multifarious, and an objection is properly made, urging multifariousness as a reason why the prayers should not be granted, it is erroneous for the court, upon such petition, to grant an injunction and render a judgment finding the defendants in contempt of court for violating a former injunction declared upon in the suit.

2. ACTION—JOINDER OF CAUSES OF ACTION—MULTIFARIOUS PETITION.

A petition which embraces two claims by separate and distinct parties against separate and distinct parties, where there is no common right to be established, is multifarious.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 1, Action, § 511.]

3. SAME.

The allegations of the petition in this case were of such character as to render the petition multifarious. Appropriate objection being taken thereto, it was erroneous for the court, irrespective of any other question involved, to grant the injunction and adjudge the defendants in contempt of court.

Brown & Randolph, J. J. Bowden, R. E. A. Hamby, and Spencer R. Atkinson, for plaintiffs in error. H. H. Dean, for defendants in error.

ATKINSON, J. 1, 2. As a general rule distinct and separate claims of or against different persons cannot be joined in the same action. Civ. Code 1895, §§ 4938, 4946. In equity, where there is a common right to be established by or against several, and one is asserting the right against many or many against one, equity will determine the whole matter in one action. Civ. Code 1895, § 4846. Equity is ancillary, but never antagonistic to the law. Civ. Code 1895, § 3923. The sections of the Code above referred to are entirely in harmony. The claims are not separate and distinct where there is a common right to be established by several against one or more. The contrary is true if no common right is involved, and if there is no community of interest between the parties suing. The common right referred to may consist of a joint interest in the cause of action declared upon, or of separate interests in the particular subject-matter of the suit. An example of the first class would be a suit upon a promissory note payable to several persons instituted by the several payees because each has an interest in the note and is entitled to collect it. An example of the second class would be a suit by several creditors having distinct and separate claims against an insolvent debtor, instituted for the purpose of marshaling assets of the debtor. In such case there is no joint ownership of the several claims asserted against the insolvent debtor, but all are interested in the disposition to be made of his property. It may be said that where several sue jointly, if there be not a joint interest in the claim declared upon or a common right in the object sought, the claims will be separate and distinct, and cannot be joined. With an improper joinder of causes of action the suit will be multifarious.

The doctrine of multifariousness is ably discussed by Mr. Justice Fish in Conley v. Buck, 100 Ga. 187, 28 S. E. 97, and the "common-right" test applied. There it is said: "An equitable petition by a judgment creditor against the defendant in execution and others alleged, in substance, that they had all entered into a conspiracy to defeat the collection of the debt upon which the judgment was founded, that the common object of all the conspirators was to 'hide' and 'cover up,' in the names of the conspirators other than the defendant in execution, property which really belonged to him, and that, in pursuance of this object, various deeds had been executed purporting to convey specified parcels of realty to these conspirators, which in fact belonged to the judgment debtor; the particulars in each instance being set forth. The petition prayed for the cancellation of the various conveyances which were, for the reasons stated, alleged to be fraudulent; and for a judgment subjecting all the property to the petitioner's execution. Held, that this petition was not demurrable as failing to set forth an equitable cause of action, nor as being multifarious, nor for want of sufficient fullness in stating wherein the alleged fraudulent acts of the several defendants consisted." So, also, in Van Dyke v. Van Dyke, 120 Ga. 984, 48 S. E. 380, the subject was considered. Mr. Justice Fish, again speaking for the court, said (page 988 of 120 Ga., and page 382 of 48 S. E.): "It is not true that since the passage of the uniform procedure act of 1887 multifariousness is no longer a ground of demurrer to an equitable petition. That act allows the joinder of equitable and legal causes of action in one suit, but an equitable petition that would have been demurrable for multifariousness in joining separate and distinct causes of action against different defendants, prior to the passage of that act, is still demurrable on such ground." Numerous other illustrations of the "common-right" test may be found in the decisions on the subject of multifariousness cited in 9 Michie's Dig. Ga. R. 472-474. If there is a common right and the court of equity takes jurisdiction, there is no limit to which the court will go in order to do complete justice, but, where there is no common right, equity will not, for any purpose, entertain a suit wherein separate and distinct parties with separate and distinct claims unite against one or more parties. The statutes simply prohibit the joining of such claims in one suit. If a suit be defective because of such multifariousness, it is demurrable, and, if objected to by appropriate demurrer, it is error to grant an injunction and adjudge certain of the defendants in contempt of court for a violation of an older injunction. See, in this connection, Webb v. Parks, 110 Ga. 639, 36 S. E. 70; Moore v. Hill, 59 Ga. 760.

3. The case before us furnishes an example of multifariousness. After amendment the plaintiffs are the North Georgia Electric Company and Crisson, Poore, and Lockeby. The defendants are White, Magid, Prentiss, and De More. The plaintiffs Crisson, Poore, and Lockeby are not interested in any relief against any of the defendants, except De More. The only relief sought against him by Crisson, Poore, and Lockeby is an injunction to stay the prosecution of a certain forcible detainer proceeding, regularly sued out under the statute and pending in the justice's court. There were no parties to that proceeding except Crisson, Poore, and Lockeby as defendants, and De More as plaintiff. The right of no other person was involved in that litigation, and the result obtained therein could not by any possibility have affected either the plaintiff the North Georgia Electric Company, or the defendants White, Magid, or Prentiss. If that proceeding could be enjoined, there were no other necessary or proper parties for the accomplishment of such a purpose than Crisson, Poore, and Lockeby as plaintiffs, and De More as defendant. With respect to that subject-matter the North Georgia Electric Company may have been stricken from the pleadings, and all allegations relating to matters between the North Georgia Electric Company on the one hand, and White, Magid, and Prentiss on the other, may have been stricken, and a complete case would have been left for determination by the court, to wit, the application for injunction by Crisson, Poore, and Lockeby against De More. This claim between these parties was separate and distinct, and could not be joined in the same suit with another claim between other parties concerning a different subject-matter. The North Georgia Electric Company was not concerned with the injunction sought against the prosecution of the forcible detainer proceeding instituted by De More. It was wholly immaterial whether in that case De More should win or lose. The judgment would not affect that company in the least. Its claim was against White, Magid, Prentiss, and De More with respect to entirely different matters. Concerning this claim, it was alleged that the North Georgia Electric Company held title to certain land under a chain of title extending back to Bleckley et al.; that while the land was owned by Bleckley a controversy arose over the title between Bleckley and White, which resulted in the recovery of the land by Bleckley and the grant of a permanent injunction against White, enjoining all future interference with Bleckley's possession; that, in order to avoid the effect of the injunction, White sold to Magid and Magid sold to Prentiss, and that they had all combined and confederated for the purpose of defeating the injunction, and, so combining, had employed De More as a mere agent to go and enter upon the possession of the property. The prayer was for injunction against White, Magid, Prentiss, and De More, seeking to enjoin them from interfering with the possession of the North Georgia Electric Company, and likewise for a cancellation of the deed from White to Magid and the deed from Magid to Prentiss as clouds upon the title of the North Georgia Electric Company, and likewise to punish all for a contempt of court in violating the first injunction obtained by Bleckley against White, to which reference has already been made.

In this claim there is no possibility by which Crisson, Poore, and Lockeby could have had any interest. Whatever be the relief to which the North Georgia Electric Company may be entitled against White, Magid, Prentiss, or De More with respect to the subject-matters alleged, it was wholly separate and distinct from the injunction sought by Crisson, Poore, and Lockeby, and was entirely independent of Crisson, Poore, and Lockeby. If all reference to the claim for injunction sought by Crisson, Poore, and Lockeby were eliminated from the case, it would still leave pending in court all of the essentials of a case between the other parties, upon which the court could proceed. There would be the North Georgia Electric Company as plaintiff, and White, Magid, Prentiss, and De More as defendants, with a proper subject-matter for adjudication by the court. In other words, there would be another separate and distinct claim. It is thus seen that in this one suit there are two separate and distinct claims by separate and distinct parties without any common right. The court not only granted the injunction, but also adjudged some of the defendants in contempt of court for a violation of the injunction described in the plaintiff's petition. We have already seen that, if a suit is multifarious and is properly objected to upon that ground, the court should not in such suit grant an injunction and enter a judgment absolute upon a rule as for a contempt of court declared upon in the suit. The suit in this case is multifarious, and the judgment of the court with respect to both matters should be reversed. Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

BALDWIN v. SEABOARD AIR LINE RY. CO.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 9, 1907.)

CARRIERS—CARRIAGE OF PASSENGERS—WRONGFUL EXPULSION.

A passenger on a railway train who had paid his fare to a given city, which was under quarantine regulations, and who, when near the end of his journey, left the train at a station on the railway line, in obedience to the order of a quarantine or health officer, who told him that he would not be allowed to ride on the train into the city, but must leave it at that station, has no cause of action against the railway company for a wrongful expulsion from its train, although the conductor pointed him out to the health officer, and, after knowledge of such officer's order to the passenger, did not interfere to prevent its execution.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Chattahoochee County; W. A. Little, Judge.

Action by Gale Scott Baldwin against the Seaboard Air Line Railway Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Gale Scott Baldwin brought an action against the Seaboard Air Line Railway Company to recover damages. The petition made the following allegations: In September, 1905, the plaintiff purchased from the defendant, in the city of Albany, Ga., a ticket entitling him to ride on its passenger train from that city to Columbus, Ga. He boarded defendant's train at Albany, and the conductor thereof accepted his ticket for his transportation to Columbus. When the train approached Sulphur Springs, in Chattahoochee county, an agent of the defendant, who was riding on the train, notified the plaintiff that he must leave the train at that station, and that he would not be allowed to ride the remainder of the distance into Columbus; and, when the train arrived at Sulphur Springs, this agent of the defendant ordered him to leave the train, "and in obedience to said order he did so, and was not allowed by the defendant to ride any further on said train." The conductor of the train "knew that said other agent of said defendant had ordered * * * petitioner to leave said train, and, in fact, pointed out [petitioner] to said agent as a person to be ejected from said train, and failed to interfere and prevent the said agent from ejecting" him. By reason of his ejection from the train, the petitioner was put to great inconvenience and trouble, and subjected to great personal annoyance, and was compelled to walk a long distance to another railroad for the purpose of getting to his destination. The expulsion of petitioner from the train was with the consent and approval of the conductor, who failed and refused to protect him, and such expulsion was without fault on the part of petitioner. When petitioner applied at the office of defendant in Albany for a ticket from that place to Columbus, Ga., he was notified by the ticket agent that, before purchasing a ticket, it would be necessary for him to have a health certificate. Petitioner thereupon "applied to the health officer in the city of Albany, and produced evidence to show that he was in good health, and had not been exposed during the 10 days preceding said date to the infection of yellow fever, and had not been in any infected or suspected locality for 10 days, and * * * procured from said health officer the certificate," which he alleges was in due form, and a copy of which he attaches to his petition. He exhibited this certificate to the ticket agent of defendant, and thereupon the agent sold him the ticket from Albany to Columbus. When he was approached "by the said officer who expelled him from said train, * * * and asked for a health certificate, he produced said certificate and exhibited the same to said officer and to said conductor," and "it was the duty of said conductor and said officer to have passed him on said certificate into the city of Columbus, and his expulsion from said train, as hereinbefore set forth, was wrongful and unjustifiable," and he has thereby been injured and damaged in the sum of $2,000. A copy of the health certificate in question was set forth in petition. The petition was demurred to upon various grounds, and the petitioner thereupon, with leave of the court, amended it. The amendment alleged: The person who notified petitioner that he must leave the train at Sulphur Springs and that he would not be allowed to ride thereon into the city of Columbus, and who, when the train arrived at Sulphur Springs, ordered him to leave it, claimed to act as a quarantine officer, but was unknown to petitioner, who "does not admit" that this person was a quarantine officer. The person "claiming to act as a quarantine officer" ordered petitioner to leave the train, "notwithstanding the fact that [he] exhibited to said person and to said conductor his health certificate as set out in full" in the original petition, "which entitled him to ride on said train into the city of Columbus." The "conductor negligently refused to interpose in any way to prevent * * * petitioner from being removed from said train by said person, but, on the contrary, pointed out * * * petitioner to said person and thereby assisted him in removing * * * petitioner from said train." The conductor "made no effort whatever to protect * * * petitioner, or to induce said person not to remove * * * petitioner from said train, as it was his duty to do under the circumstances, but allowed him to be ejected from the train, contrary to law." After the allowance of this amendment the defendant renewed its original demurrer, and demurred upon other grounds. One of the grounds of the demurrer was that the allegations of the petition were insufficient to set forth a cause of action. Other grounds (which were but amplifications of the general demurrer) were: "Because it is apparent from said petition that the alleged 'agent' or 'officer' ordering plaintiff from the train was a quarantine agent or officer of said state, or some duly constituted municipal authority thereof, and was not an officer or agent of defendant, nor subject to its control or direction. * * * It appears, by reasonable inference, that the person alleged to have ordered plaintiff off the train was an officer of said state or some duly constituted municipality thereof, acting within the scope of his authority or apparent authority and independently of defendant and its agents, and that defendant and its agents were without power or authority to control or interfere with said officer." The court sustained the demurrers and dismissed the petition, and the plaintiff excepted.

Goetchins & Chappell, for defendant in error.

FISH, C. J. (after stating the facts). We think the plaintiff's petition clearly indicates that at the time of the occurrence of which he complains quarantine regulations were in force with reference to travelers seeking to enter the city of Columbus, at least as to such travelers coming from Albany, Ga. The petition shows that, before the plaintiff purchased his ticket, he was put on notice of the existence of such regulations by the agent of the defendant to whom he applied to purchase the ticket, as the agent notified him "that, before purchasing the same, it would be necessary for him to have a health certificate." In order to procure such a certificate from the Albany health officer, the plaintiff had to produce evidence to show that he had not within the past 10 days been exposed to the infection of yellow fever, nor been in any infected or suspected locality. As the train upon which he was riding approached the city of Columbus, an officer, claiming to be a quarantine officer, approached him and asked him for a health certificate, and plaintiff exhibited the one which he had procured in Albany to such officer, who told plaintiff that he would not be allowed to ride on the train into Columbus, but must leave it at Sulphur Springs. These facts alleged in the petition clearly indicate the existence of quarantine regulations; and when to them are added the allegations that plaintiff's health certificate "entitled him to ride on said train into the city of Columbus," and that it was the duty of "said officer to have passed him on said certificate into the city of Columbus," it seems impossible to fairly construe this petition without reaching the conclusion that there were such regulations in force relative to persons traveling from Albany to Columbus, Ga. The petition shows that, before the plaintiff purchased his ticket, he had every reason to suspect that ere he reached his journey's end he would encounter a quarantine officer, and that he relied both on his railroad ticket and his health certificate for his entry into the city of his destination. While in the amendment to the petition the plaintiff was careful to allege that he did not admit that the person who ordered him to leave the train at Sulphur Springs was what such person claimed to be, a quarantine officer, yet not only do the circumstances alleged in the petition strongly tend to indicate that this was true, but, as we have seen, the plaintiff himself alleges that it was the duty of "said officer to have passed him on said certificate into the city of Columbus." The allegation that it was the duty of said officer to have passed the plaintiff into the city of Columbus on the health certificate which he exhibited for the officer's inspection is equivalent to an admission that such officer was a quarantine officer. Unless he was a quarantine officer, how could it have been his duty to pass the plaintiff into the city of Columbus upon the evidence as to his right to enter that city afforded by the health certificate? The allegation here referred to was a direct admission that the person who ordered the plaintiff to leave the train was an "officer" of some kind, and an indirect admission that he was a quarantine or health officer, else it could not have been his duty "to have passed" the plaintiff "into the city of Columbus" upon his health certificate. Against this clearly implied admission in the original petition, we have the allegation, in the amendment thereto, that plaintiff does not admit that the person who ordered him from the train was a quarantine officer; but he did not deny that such was the fact. The matter, then, stands thus: An officer, whose duty was such as to clearly indicate that he was a quarantine or health officer, ordered the plaintiff to leave the train, but the plaintiff neither expressly admits nor denies that such officer was a quarantine officer. As the rule is well established that pleadings are to be construed most strongly against the pleader and the allegation from which the admission is implied was not stricken from the original petition, the plaintiff could not escape its force and effect by merely alleging that he did not admit the natural and logical deduction from such allegation. While, by an amendment to the original petition, the plaintiff could have withdrawn an allegation previously made, he could not by an amendment place his own construction upon the facts which he had alleged.

After all, however, it does not really make any difference by what particular name the officer who ordered the plaintiff to leave the train be called, if his duty was such as the plaintiff alleges it to have been. He must have been a health officer, clothed with authority to pass upon the sufficiency of health certificates to entitle the holders thereof to enter the city of Columbus, otherwise it could not have been his duty to pass the plaintiff into that city upon the health certificate which he exhibited for inspection. If he was not clothed with such authority, he owed the plaintiff simply the negative duty of noninterference with his liberty, and could not have owed him the positive duty of passing him into the city of Columbus because he had exhibited a proper health certificate. A health officer who had authority to pass upon the sufficiency of plaintiff's health certificate to entitle him to enter Columbus had also, by necessary implication, authority to prevent him from entering such city, if the certificate, under the health regulations in force, was not such as to entitle him to do so. The case, then, resolves itself into this question: Was it the duty of the conductor to interfere to prevent a health officer, clothed with such authority, from compelling the plaintiff to leave the train before it reached the city of Columbus? Brunswick & Western Railroad Co. v. Ponder, 117 Ga. 63, 43 S. E. 430, 60 L. R. A. 713, 97 Am. St. Rep. 152, is a case which is directly in point here. There it was held: "A railroad company is bound to use extraordinary diligence to protect a passenger while in transit from violence or injury by third person; but, where the passenger is arrested by officers of the law, the company is under no duty to inquire into the legality of the arrest." In the present case the conductor was not bound to contest with the health officer the propriety or legality of the exercise of his power and authority in the particular instance; as the sufficiency of the health certificate was a question for the health officer, and not for the conductor. A railroad conductor is not required, for the protection of one of his passengers, to enter into a contest with, or put himself in opposition to, an officer of the law, who is apparently acting within the scope of his authority. Brunswick & Western R. Co. v. Ponder, supra; Duggan v. Baltimore & Ohio R. Co., 159 Pa. 248, 28 Atl. 182, 186, 39 Am. St. Rep. 672; Fetter on Carriers of Pas. § 101.

While the petition alleged that the conductor pointed the plaintiff out as a person to be ejected from the train, there is no averment that the conductor said why he pointed out the plaintiff to the health officer, or that he did anything whatever to indicate why he did so. As an allegation of fact, therefore, this statement simply amounts to an averment that the conductor pointed the plaintiff out to the officer who ordered him to leave the train; the alleged purpose of the conductor in pointing him out being a mere conclusion of the pleader. The conductor had a perfect right to point out to the health officer the passengers on the train who had boarded it at a given city or locality. For instance, if the health officer asked the conductor to indicate to him the passengers who had held tickets from Albany, and the conductor did so, he would not thereby render the railroad company responsible for the subsequent official conduct of such officer to such passengers, or any of them. He would be merely giving information to which the health officer, as a matter of public policy, was entitled. It was held in Owens v. Wilmington & Weldon Railroad Co., 126 N. C. 139, 35 S. E. 259, 78 Am. St. Rep. 642, that "a railroad company is not liable for the false arrest of a passenger on one of its trains where the conductor in charge of the train merely pointed out such passenger to a sheriff who had come to arrest him as a party suspected of a capital offense." In that case the court said: "The defendant was wholly ignorant of the occurrence, and its conductor did not originate the cause or instigate or participate in the arrest. It would be vain and unreasonable to require him to resist an officer of the law, or the law itself. Whether the officer had authority or probable cause for making the arrest is immaterial."

In the case with which we are dealing the court properly dismissed the petition upon demurrer, and the judgment is therefore affirmed. All the Justices concur.

SAVANNAH ELECTRIC CO. v. WHEELER et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 9, 1907.)

1. CORPORATIONS—LIABILITY FOR TORTS OF AGENT.

A street railway company is liable for a tort committed by its conductor in the prosecution and within the scope of its business, whether by negligence or willfully.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 12, Corporations, §§ 1899-1903.]

2. SAME.

Where a petition alleged that a conductor on the car of a street railway company, while engaged in the prosecution and within the scope of his business in collecting fares, failed and refused to give a passenger correct change, and, upon request therefor, drew a pistol and fired at the passenger, but that the ball missed the passenger and struck a woman passing on the public street through which the car was running, causing her death, and that the plaintiffs were the husband and children of the decedent, the allegations set out a cause of action against the company, and the petition was not demurrable.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 12, Corporations, §§ 1899-1904; vol. 34, Master and Servant, §§ 1230-1233.]

3. MASTER AND SERVANT—INJURIES TO THIRD PERSONS—LIABILITY OF MASTER.

Allegations that the company knowingly placed in charge of one of its passenger cars a conductor of bad character, who was drunk and armed with a pistol, and that a homicide occurred in the manner indicated in the preceding note, were not demurrable.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 34, Master and Servant, § 1209.]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Chatham County; Geo. T. Cann, Judge.

Action by Ferry F. Wheeler and another against the Savannah Electric Company. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Ferry F. Wheeler and Ferry F. Wheeler, Jr., a minor, appearing by his father as next friend, brought suit against the Savannah Electric Company. The petition contained three counts. The first alleged, in brief, as follows: The defendant, a corporation, operates, maintains, and controls a system of electric street railways, running in and through the streets of the city of Savannah, including a line of railway running through Broughton street, in the city of Savannah, and did so on October 26, 1905. It was a common carrier of passengers over said line. On the afternoon of that day one of its passenger cars was run and operated by two of its servants and agents; one of them being the motorman and the other the conductor. The conductor was the principal servant in charge of the car. He was drunk to such an extent that he was unable to properly perform his duties as conductor while collecting fares from the passengers. He was so unsteady upon his feet that he reeled from side to side of the car, and failed to make proper change for the passengers, in one instance giving pistol bullets for change. He failed and refused to give one of the passengers on the car the change that was due him, and, upon request to do so, with an oath, he drew his pistol from his pocket and tried to shoot the passenger. The latter grabbed the pistol barrel, and scuffled with the conductor in order to keep from being shot. During the scuffle the conductor fired the pistol three times at the passenger. One shot struck the passenger; the other two missing him. One of them passed through the window of the car, and struck Mrs. Wheeler, causing her death in a few minutes. At the time the bullet wound was received by her she was returning to her home on Broughton street, and was in the act of going up the steps of her house. At that time and place Broughton street was full of people passing and repassing, and any pistol shot fired in the car, as was done by the conductor, was very apt to do injury or cause death to some person upon the street. The shot was not actually intended for Mrs. Wheeler, and was not fired at her. It was intended to injure the passenger on the car or to kill him, and it would have done so had he not grabbed the pistol in time to change the course of the shot. The passenger had paid his fare, and had given no provocation whatever for the assault made upon him. There was no quarrel between him and the conductor and no enmity existed between them; but the assault upon him by the conductor was due to the drunken condition of the latter. The conductor was in a drunken condition at the time he took charge of the car as conductor, and had so been for some time prior thereto. On account of his condition he was totally unfit to be put in charge of the car, and the corporation knew of his unfitness to run the car on that day prior to the time of the shooting, and in time to have prevented him from taking charge of the car and continuing to act as conductor thereof. Yet the company negligently permitted him to act for it as conductor of the car from the time it put him in charge up to and including the time of the death of Mrs. Wheeler. One of the plaintiffs was her husband and the other was her only child. The homicide resulted from the negligence of the defendant in permitting the drunken conductor, who was also armed, to its knowledge, to act as conductor of said car, and from the negligence of the defendant, through its conductor, in violating the duty it owed to the passenger. The direct cause of the death of Mrs. Wheeler was the bullet fired by the conductor, and this was a tort, an act of negligence attributable to the defendant. The pistol was also fired at a place where the car was being operated and run in a public street of the city, and such firing at that place was a violation of the municipal laws of the city which prohibited the discharge of firearms within the limits of the city. Broughton street is about 80 feet wide, and the street car track runs down the middle of it. The distance between the conductor and Mrs.

Wheeler at the time the pistol shot was fired was about 45 feet. There were also allegations as to the value of her life and her capacity to earn money. The second count differed from the first mainly in alleging that the defendant negligently permitted the drunken conductor to act for it as conductor from the time it put him in charge of the car on the day of the homicide up to and including the time of the injury, knowing his condition and that he was armed, and that the homicide resulted from such negligence. It is also alleged that the defendant was negligent in failing to exercise ordinary care and diligence in the employment of the conductor to act for it; that he was an unfit and improper person for such employment by reason of being habitually addicted to alcoholic liquors when on duty and being, while under such influence, a dangerous character who was apt to use his pistol, which he always carried when on duty, to the knowledge of the defendant; and that he had borne a bad record for a long time previous to his employment by the defendant on account of his drinking habits. Several instances of his previous conduct were stated. It was further alleged that on the evening in question he was drinking heavily at a resort at the terminus of the company's line, and was in a drunken condition on the car within the knowledge of the conductor and motorman who then had charge of it; that he had been previously assigned to duty by the defendant to relieve said conductor and take charge of the car when it should arrive at the shed in the city of Savannah and start on a tour through the streets for the purpose of carrying passengers; that it was the rule and custom of the defendant to inspect at said "car shed" the conductors and motormen who were assigned to duty as a relief crew to take the place of other motormen and conductors who had to be relieved. At that place conductors were "checked up" and their accounts handed in just prior to being temporarily relieved from duty. The place of inspection is where the cars pass about half a mile from the station and headquarters. At that place the motorman and conductor who had brought in the car from the terminus turned it over to their successors, one of whom was the conductor who caused the injury. He was visibly so much under the influence of liquor that he was totally unfit to act as conductor. The company was also negligent in allowing him to take charge of the car at that time and place. It was also negligent in failing to have any inspection of him as to his fitness to run the car, and in failing to remove him from his position as conductor prior to the time of the injury. The third count briefly alleged that the car was being operated by two of the agents of the company, one of them being the conductor, who was the principal agent; that on the car was a passenger who had duly paid his fare; that without any provocation the conductor assaulted him with a pistol; and that while shooting at the passenger the conductor accidentally and negligently shot and killed Mrs. Wheeler, who was going up the steps of her home on Broughton street. The defendant filed a general demurrer, which was overruled, and it excepted.

Osborne & Lawrence, for plaintiff in error. R. R. Richards and R. G. Richards, for defendants in error.

LUMPKIN, J. (after stating the foregoing facts). The demurrer to the plaintiff's petition was overruled. It raised several questions.

1, 2. Was the act of its conductor in shooting at the passenger attributable to the company, or was this the individual act of the conductor, for which the company was not responsible? "Every person shall be liable for torts committed by his * * * servant by his command, or in the prosecution and within the scope of his business, whether the same be by negligence or voluntary." Civ. Code 1895, § 3817. "Every corporation acts through its officers, and is responsible for the acts of such officers in the sphere of their appropriate duties." Civ. Code 1895, § 1861. What was the master's business? Operating electric street cars as a common carrier of passengers. In its conduct of that business it was bound to use extraordinary diligence to protect the lives and persons of its passengers. Civ. Code 1895, § 2266. Who was discharging this duty for the master? The petition alleges the conductor was so engaged. He was taking up fares, not for himself, but for the company. In doing this he had to make change. He failed and refused to give proper change to a passenger, and, when it was asked for, assaulted the passenger with a pistol. The protection of the passenger, the collecting of fares, the giving of change, and dealing with passengers about these matters were all in the prosecution and within the scope of his employment. But it is said that when he conducted this dealing, not properly by giving change, but improperly by shooting at the passenger, that was his individual tort, and the company was not liable. Many authorities state the liability of a master for the tort of his servant substantially as it is codified in our Code. Expressions used in some reports and text-books, that a master is bound by the acts of his agent or servant in the scope of his agency and in furtherance of the master's business, or when the servant is acting for the benefit of the master, do not mean that the agent's act must be beneficial to the master or the latter is not bound. If any declare such a rule as that the master is bound by torts of the servant which benefit him, but not by any others, we cannot accept it as the rule in this state. In this matter, as in some others, there has been an evolution in the law, arising from the growth and change in corporate life and activity, and the better study of them. In Central Ry. Co. v. Brown, 113 Ga. 415, 38 S. E. 989, 84 Am. St. Rep. 250, it was held that: "A master is liable for the willful torts of his servant, committed in the course of the servant's employment, just as though the master had himself committed them. This rule applies as well where the master is a corporation as where he is a private individual. A railroad company is liable as a trespasser to a passenger for an unjustifiable assault made upon him by the conductor of the train; the conductor being engaged in the company's business and in the conduct thereof making such assault." And again: "Some of the courts seem at one time to have been inclined to hold that a master could not be held liable for the willful torts of his servant, because, it was said, if the servant through anger or malice committed an assault upon a person, he ceased for the time being to occupy the position of servant, and acted independently; that, inasmuch as he was not authorized to commit an assault, he did not represent the master in that act, but acted as an individual, the master therefore being not liable either in case or in trespass. This argument has long since been exploded. The theory that one may be a servant one minute, and the very next minute get angry, commit an assault, and in that act be not a servant, was too refined a distinction." In Western & Atlantic Railroad v. Turner, 72 Ga. 292, 53 Am. Rep. 842, it was held that, when a conductor maliciously assaulted one who was treating with him for passage, he was acting in the prosecution and scope of the company's business, and it was liable. And see Turner v. Atlantic Railroad, 69 Ga. 827. In Peebles v. Brunswick & Albany R. Co., 60 Ga. 232, where a declaration alleged that a conductor called a passenger out of the train of which he had charge and beat him, it was held to set out a cause of action, and was not subject to a general demurrer. In Craker v. Chicago & Northwestern Ry. Co., 36 Wis. 657, 17 Am. Rep. 510, it was said: "If one hire out his dog to guard sheep against wolves, and the dog sleeps while the wolf makes away with a sheep, the owner is liable; but, if the dog play wolf and devour the sheep himself, the owner is not liable. The bare statement of the proposition seems a reductio ad absurdum." In Gasway v. Atlanta & West Point R. Co., 58 Ga. 216, a railroad company was held liable for a willful tort of a baggage master and conductor committed upon one who was seeking to have his baggage checked. The trial judge charged to the effect that, unless the act of the defendant's agent tended to facilitate or promote the business for which the agent was employed, the company was not responsible, and refused to charge to the effect that the principal is responsible for the acts of its agents within the range of their employment. This court said: "Railroad companies are responsible to passengers for the torts of the conductors and other servants of the company employed in running trains when such torts are committed in connection with the business intrusted to such servants and spring from or grow immediately out of such business." This case has been often cited, but never reversed. In Haehl v. Wabash Ry. Co., 119 Mo. 325, 24 S. W. 737, where a bridge watchman willfully struck and shot a trespasser on the bridge, it was held to be an act in the scope of his employment, and that the company was liable. In Ramsden v. Boston & Albany R. Co., 104 Mass. 117, 6 Am. Rep. 200, it was held that a railroad corporation was responsible for an assault and battery by its conductor upon a passenger in seizing or attempting to seize his property to enforce payment of his fare. In the opinion, Gray, J., said: "If the act of the servant is within the general scope of his employment, the master is equally liable, whether the act is willful or merely negligent. The conductor of a railroad train, from the necessity of the case, represents the corporation in the control of the engine and cars, the regulation of the conduct of the passengers as well as of the subordinate servants of the corporation, and the collection of fares." In Barwick v. English Joint-Stock Bank, L. R. 2 Ex. 259, 266, Willes, J., though using at one place the expression, "in the course of his master's business and for his master's benefit," evidently meaning merely in the discharge of the business intrusted to him, said (page 266): "It is true he has not authorized the particular act, but he has put the agent in his place to do that class of acts, and he must be answerable for the manner in which the agent has conducted himself in doing the business which it was the act of the master to place him in." See, also, Daniel v. Petersburg R. Co., 117 N. C. 592, 23 S. E. 327, 4 L. R. A. (N. S.) 485; Texas & Pacific Ry. Co. v. Williams, 62 Fed. 440, 10 C. O. A. 463; Cole v. Atlanta & West Point R. Co., 102 Ga. 474, 31 S. E. 107; Savannah Street R. Co. v. Bryan, 86 Ga. 312, 12 S. E. 307, 22 Am. St. Rep. 464; Patterson's Ry. Ac. L. 105; Higgins v. Southern Ry. Co., 98 Ga. 751, 25 S. E. 837; Southern Ry. Co. v. Chambers, 126 Ga. 404, 55 S. E. 37; Georgia R. Co. v. Richmond, 98 Ga. 495, 25 S. E. 565.

It is contended that there is a difference between an assault on a passenger, to whom the company owes a duty of protection, and a willful assault upon a stranger or mere passer having no relation with the company, and that the company is not liable for the latter. Cases of willful assaults by an employé upon a mere stranger are not in point. The petition alleges that the conductor did not shoot at the woman killed. He shot at the passenger, and, missing him, hit the woman. Moreover, a railroad company's liability for the willful torts of its agents acting in the scope of their business is not limited to torts on passengers. Some of the cases cited above are based on torts to trespassers and persons not passengers. What we think we have demonstrated is that, under the allegations of the petition, the conductor in dealing with the passenger and shooting at him was acting in the prosecution and scope of the business entrusted to him, within the meaning of the law. If he had hit the passenger, there could be no doubt that the shooting would have been within the rule. If he missed the passenger, did the shooting cease to be within the scope of his business? Shooting at another does not fall within or without the scope of the agent's employment according as his aim is good or bad. Bad marksmanship does not alter the status of the agent doing the shooting. If, then, the conduct of the conductor within the car was in law the conduct of the company, why was not the result of that same conduct, taking effect outside the car, also the result of the conduct of the company? It is not easy to see. But it is contended that, although there was an unlawful or negligent act relatively to the passenger, there was no violation of duty toward a passer on the street, and therefore no liability, although she was struck. It is a mistake to say that there was no duty to passers on a public highway not to do wrongful or negligent acts which would naturally tend to injure them. In Fletcher v. Baltimore & Potomac Railroad, 168 U. S. 135, 18 Sup. Ct. 35, 42 L. Ed. 411, it was said: "A railroad company owes a duty to the general public, and to individuals who may be in the streets of a town through which its tracks are laid, to use reasonable diligence to see to it that those who are on its trains shall not be guilty of any act which might reasonably be called dangerous and liable to result in injuries to persons on the street, where such act could have been prevented by the exercise of reasonable diligence on the part of the company." In that case wood was thrown from a repair train by hands returning from work, and caused injury to one on the highway. The hands were not then engaged in the performance of their duties, but it was shown that the practice by the men of collecting refuse timber for firewood and throwing it off along the line near their homes had been going on for some time, and that the company was charged with notice of it, and acquiesced in it, or at least it was a question for the jury, and that it was also for them to say whether the company exercised due care to prohibit the custom and prevent the performance of the act. A single act of this kind by a passenger, or an employé outside the scope of his business, would not suffice to charge the company, unless it had reason to anticipate the dangerous act and failed to use proper diligence to prevent it. But where the act is done by the agent of the company in the scope of his employment, and while prosecuting it for the company, the single act is the company's act. Again, it has been held that if in the performance of its business the company, through its agents, negligently sets in motion a force which naturally and proximately causes an injury, it is liable. In Fraser v. Charleston & Savannah R. Co., 75 Ga. 222, where wood negligently fell or was thrown from an engine and injured a person on a highway, the case was held to be one for the jury. See, also, Savannah Florida & Western Ry. Co. v. Slater, 92 Ga. 391, 17 S. E. 350. In Western & Atlantic R. Co. v. Bailey, 105 Ga. 100, 31 S. E. 547, a petition alleged that an engineer, while running a train, saw a trespasser in time to stop before striking him, but nevertheless "carelessly, negligently, recklessly, and wrongfully allowed and permitted" the train to run at a reckless and dangerous rate of speed, without any bell or whistle being sounded and without any effort to stop the train; that the engine struck the trespasser and hurled his body against an employé of the company, who was in his proper place performing his duties, and who was thus injured. It was held that a cause of action on behalf of the injured employé was set out. The ruling was put on the ground that "the negligence of the defendant put in motion the destructive agency, and the injury sustained by the plaintiff was directly attributable thereto," and did not rest on any duty arising from the relation of master and employé. Apparently the fact of employment was mentioned rather to show that the employé was rightfully at the place where he was. The principle involved in the case just cited was impliedly recognized in Georgia R. Co. v. Wood, 94 Ga. 124, 21 S. E. 288, 47 Am. St. Rep. 146. In that case a boy who, with others, had previously been in the habit of swinging on trains, attempted to do so on the occasion in question. He desisted, however, and ran off from the train into a private yard, where he was attempting to conceal himself. The brakeman on the train threw a stone at him. The stone, by accident, having missed the boy, hit and injured another person who was then on the same premises. It was held that no presumption arose that at the time of the throwing of the stone the servant was acting in behalf of the company or within the scope of his employment as to anything then done or attempted to be done with a view to injure or affect the boy; and "consequently the company is not liable for the injury thus done to the third person." Assuming that the employé had authority to keep trespassers off the train, the implication is that, if he had been acting within the scope of his business at the time he threw at the boy, the company would have been liable to the third person. In Alabama Great Southern R. Co. v. Chapman, 80 Ala. 615, 2 South. 738, the plaintiff, while walking on the track of the defendant's road, observed an approaching train, and got down on the edge of the embankment just before the train came along. A cow came up on the other side of the embankment, and was thrown from the track by the engineer, and bounced down, hit and injured the plaintiff. The plaintiff was not seen by the engineer, owing to the embankment. There was some evidence tending to show that the engineer was negligent. It was held that, if the animal was thrown from the track by the negligence of those in charge of the train, the injury to the plaintiff could not be regarded as a purely accidental occurrence, for which no action would lie, but must be deemed to have been proximately caused by the negligence. In Quill v. New York Central R. Co. (Sup.) 11 N. Y. Supp. 80, a person was standing on a highway at a railroad crossing when a passing train collided with a coal cart, which was thrown forward upon him, inflicting injuries which caused his death. It was claimed that the collision between the train and the coal cart was due to negligence on the part of its servant in not giving proper and timely warning of the approaching train. A recovery in favor of the administrator of the decedent was sustained. In Jackson v. Galveston Ry. Co., 90 Tex. 372, 38 S. W. 745, a declaration alleged that the plaintiff was repairing the track of the defendant railroad company; that the foreman sent an employé back to signal an approaching train; that the signal was given, but the train was not stopped, owing to the engineer's negligence or the insufficiency of the brakes; that, as the train approached, plaintiff stood aside to escape it; that as it neared plaintiff the fireman, to avoid danger which he properly apprehended, jumped from the engine against the plaintiff, and injured him. It was held that the negligence of the defendant was the proximate cause of the injury. The fact that the plaintiff was an employé appears, from the opinion, to have been stated in order to show that he was rightfully on the ground near the track. Denman, J., in speaking of the act of the fireman in leaping to escape danger caused by the negligence of the defendant or its engineer, said: "His acts, under the circumstances, are in law regarded as would be the movements of an inanimate object set in motion by such negligence." In Osborne v. Van Dyke, 113 Iowa, 557, 85 N. W. 784, 54 L. R. A. 367, an employé was holding a horse while the master applied some medicine to its neck. The horse jumped, and defendant began beating it with a heavy stick with a nail drawn through it, and, by reason of defendant's foot slipping, he unintentionally hit the plaintiff on the nose, causing injury. It was held that an instruction that the defendant would not be liable if in beating the horse he exercised reasonable care to avoid striking the plaintiff, and the blow which inflicted the injury was caused by an accidental slip, was erroneous, since the slipping of defendant's foot, being the consequence of his own wrongful act, was not an excuse for the injury. In 1 Addison on Torts (Wood's Ed.) 4, it was said: "If the damage done is the immediate result of force exercised by the defendant in a place where the probable and natural result of misdirected force would be to cause injury to others, the defendant will be responsible for the damage done, though it happened accidentally, or by misfortune, unless the force was used strictly in self-defense." In James v. Campbell, 5 Car. & P. 373, Mr. Justice Bosanquet instructed the jury that, if one of two persons fighting unintentionally struck a third, he was answerable in an action for assault, and the absence of intention could only be urged in mitigation of damages. In the celebrated case of Scott v. Shepherd, 2 W. Bl. 892, 1 Smith's Leading Cases (9th Ed.) 737, it was held that an action for damages would lie for originally throwing a squib which after having been thrown about in self-defense by other persons, at last put out the plaintiff's eye. There was some difference of opinion among the judges as to whether the proper form of action was in trespass or on the case.

Was the killing of Mrs. Wheeler the proximate result of the conduct of the company and its conductor? The definitions of proximate cause and proximate result in the textbooks and reports vary very much in expression, and sometimes in idea. Prof. Jaggard says that, in determining what is a proximate and what is a remote consequence, the English courts incline to accept the measure of damages in cases of contracts, and to hold such damages as (a) directly and necessarily result from the wrong complained of; (b) such further damages as should have been foreseen by the wrongdoer, in view of his knowledge, actual or constructive, of the special circumstances of the case. He asserts that the American courts do not seem to have determined very definitely whether the test is (a) what a reasonably prudent man should have foreseen under the circumstances, (b) what follows as a natural result in the ordinary course and constitution of nature. 1 Jaggard, Torts, 372. These two tests applied by the American courts may not be so far apart as they at first appear, since it would seem that what follows as a natural result in the ordinary course and constitution of nature ought to be foreseen by a reasonably prudent man. Section 3913 of the Civil Code of 1895, above quoted, in stating the rule, uses the expression, "damages which are the legal and natural result of the act done," though contingent to some extent; but states that damages traceable to the act, but not its legal or "material" consequence, are too remote. The word "material" seems to be inapt, and, as in the first part of the section the language is "legal and natural," it would appear to the writer that probably the word "material" originally found its way into the section by inadvertence or misprint, and that the same expression, "legal and natural," was intended to be used. This, however, is merely conjectural. In Atchison, T. & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Parry, 67 Kan. 515, 73 Pac. 105, it was held that "negligence, to be the proximate cause of an injury, must be such that a person of ordinary caution and prudence would have foreseen that some injury would likely result therefrom, not that the specific injury would result." This is quoted approvingly in Western & Atlantic R. Co. v. Bryant, 123 Ga. 77-83, 51 S. E. 20, 23. In Mayor & Council of Macon v. Dykes, 103 Ga. 847, 848, 31 S. E. 443, it was said that "the rule is that, in order to recover for an injury alleged to have resulted from the negligence of another, the injury must be the natural and probable consequence of the negligence; or, as otherwise stated, the wrong and resulting damage must be known, by common experience, to be naturally and usually in sequence. The damage, according to the usual course of events, must follow from the wrong. The principle in this state seems to be substantially the same." In 1 Shearman & Redfield on Negligence (5th Ed.) § 29, it is said: "The practical solution of this question appears to us to be that a person guilty of negligence should be held responsible for all the consequences which a prudent and experienced man, fully acquainted with all the circumstances which in fact existed (whether they could have been ascertained by reasonable diligence or not), would, at the time of the negligent act, have thought reasonably possible to follow, if they had occurred to his mind." In Insurance Co. v. Boon, 95 U. S. 117, 130, 24 L. Ed. 395, it is said: "The proximate cause is the efficient cause, the one that necessarily sets the other causes in operation. The causes that are merely incidental or instruments of a superior or controlling agency are not the proximate causes and the responsible ones, though they may be nearer in time to the result. It is only when the causes are independent of each other that the nearest is, of course, to be charged with the disaster." See, also, Southern Ry. Co. v. Webb, 116 Ga. 152, 42 S. E. 395, 59 L. R. A. 109; Thompson on Negligence, § 59; St. Louis Ry. Co. v. McKinsey, 78 Tex. 298, 14 S. W. 645, 22 Am. St. Rep. 54.

3. It requires no argument to show that it was negligent to knowingly place a drunken conductor armed with a pistol and of bad habits in charge of a passenger car, traversing the streets of a city, or at least that it should be left to the jury to determine whether this was not negligent. As matter of law, on demurrer, we cannot say that this was not an act of negligence. It was contended that the homicide was not the natural and probable result of such act on the part of the company. But we know nothing more apt to endanger life and safety than to place in control of a passenger street car the combination of a dangerous character, a conductor loaded with whisky, and a pistol loaded with powder and ball. In Christian v. Columbus & Rome Ry. Co., 79 Ga. 460, 7 S. E. 216, it was held that if a railroad company employed an agent and assigned him to duty with knowledge that he was insane, or of his being subject to sudden fits of insanity, it would not be excused from responsibility for a homicide committed by him while engaged in its business. See, also, Central Ry. Co. v. Hall, 124 Ga. 322, 52 S. E. 679, 4 L. R. A. (N. S.) 898, 110 Am. St. Rep. 170; Kerlin v. Chicago R. Co. (C. C.) 50 Fed. 185; Williams v. Missouri Pacific Ry. Co., 109 Mo. 475, 18 S. W. 1098. If the company negligently assigned the conductor to take charge of the car, and, while acting in the general scope of the business entrusted to him, he wrongfully shot at a passenger, and as a proximate consequence thereof a person passing on the highway was killed, the company would be liable.

It is urged that the decision in Belding v. Johnson, 83 Ga. 177, 12 S. E. 304, 11 L. R. A. 53, is controlling as to liability not resulting from the placing of the drunken conductor in charge of the car. In that case it was alleged that a saloon keeper sold and continued to furnish liquor to a person who was drunk, knowing that such person, when under the influence of liquor, was dangerous. The person so furnished shot and killed another while thus drunk. On demurrer it was held that the homicide was not the proximate result of the sale of the liquor. This differs materially from the present case. A mere sale of liquor to a drunken customer is not at all the same as knowingly to place a drunken employé, armed with a pistol, in charge of a car, with the duty of controlling it, dealing with passengers and conducting a part of its business. In Brazil v. Peterson, 44 Minn. 212, 46 N. W. 331, where a barkeeper assaulted a person who was in the saloon in an intoxicated and helpless condition, the court held that the proprietor of the saloon was liable.

What facts may be developed by the evidence we cannot, of course, foresee, but the court properly overruled the demurrer and retained the case for submission to the jury on the evidence.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 14, 1907.)

1. INJUNCTION—VIOLATION—CONTEMPT.

Where the defendant in an injunction proceeding is informed by the attorney for the plaintiff that a temporary restraining order has been issued against him, and is also shown a copy of the order, which information clearly and plainly indicates what is the act from which he must abstain, he is bound to obey the order of the court, whether he is served with the writ or not; and a refusal or failure to comply with the order, under such circumstances, is as much a contempt as if the defendant had been personally served by the sheriff with the writ. Murphey v. Harker, 41 S. E. 585, 115 Ga. 77.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 27, Injunction, § 446.]

2. SAME—NOTICE OF INJUNCTION.

The evidence was sufficient to authorize the court below to find and hold that the defendant had been notified of the contents of the restraining order by the attorney for the plaintiff, and actually read a copy thereof which was exhibited to him by said attorney, and that, after being thus notified, the defendant violated the terms of the order; and the judgment holding the defendant in contempt for said violation should be allowed to stand.

CENTRAL OF GEORGIA RY. CO. v. FOREHAND.

1. CARRIERS—CARRIAGE OF PASSENGERS—ACTIONS FOR INJURIES—QUESTION FOR JURY.

Whether the act of a passenger on a railroad train in leaving his seat and going to the door or upon the platform of the coach, while the train is in motion, and before it comes to a full stop, is such negligence as would defeat a recovery for an injury resulting from the negligence of the company in operating its train, is a question for the jury to determine from all the facts and circumstances of the particular case under consideration; and, in the determination of this question, the jury are authorized to take into consideration the age and physical condition of the passenger, the speed of the train, the reason of the passenger for leaving his seat and going to the door or upon the platform, the purpose to be accomplished, and all other attendant facts and circumstances as disclosed by the evidence. Augusta Southern R. Co. v. Snider, 44 S. E. 1005, 118 Ga. 146, and cases cited; Cotchett v. Savannah Ry. Co., 11 S. E. 553, 84 Ga. 687. See, also, Parris v. A., K. & N. Ry. Co. (decided May 20, 1907) 57 S. E. 692.

2. DAMAGES—EXCESSIVE.

The petition set forth a cause of action, the evidence authorized the verdict, the amount found as damages was not excessive, and no sufficient reason appears for reversing the judgment.

Action by S. R. Forehand against the Central of Georgia Railway Company for personal injuries. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

W. D. Kiddos, for plaintiff in error. Hoke Smith and Smith, Berner, Smith & Hastings, for defendant in error.

ATKINSON, J. In addition to what is stated in the headnotes, we do not deem it necessary to make any statement with reference to the case, further than a brief reference to the amount of the verdict. There was testimony from which the jury could have found that the plaintiff was 38 years of age, of robust health, and of active business habits. For five years immediately preceding the injury he had earned an average of from $1,200 to $1,700 per annum. He was riding on the train of the defendant as a passenger, and was approaching the station to which he was destined. The station was a flag station, at which trains stopped for a very short time, and it was customary for passengers intending to leave the train at that station to leave their seats while the cars were still in motion and go to the platform, so as to alight immediately upon the stopping of the train. On this occasion the train was running 35 or 40 miles an hour, but, upon approaching the station, commenced to slack speed, as usually done preparatory to stopping, whereupon the defendant left his seat and proceeded to the platform in order to leave the train. Upon reaching the door, he perceived that the car was passing his station, and thereupon turned to call to the conductor or other servants operating the train, at which time the train, without stopping, gave a sudden jerk forward and threw him out of the door onto the platform, thence to the ground, dragging him a short distance, bruising his head and face, and finally running over his leg above the ankle. Amputations were necessary and were performed at two different times. The wound did not heal for eight months. He was unconscious for several days after the injury, and suffered great pain. He was unable to do any kind of work up to the time of the trial, and his earning capacity was permanently impaired. The jury returned a verdict in his favor for $15,000. The evidence being such as to authorize the jury in finding all of the foregoing to be true, we cannot say that the verdict for $15,000 in favor of the plaintiff was excessive.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

1. INFANTS—ACTIONS—WRIT OF ERROR—BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—SERVICE.

Where a minor sues by prochein ami, and prevails at the trial, the prochein ami is the proper person upon whom the bill of exceptions sued out by the defendant should be served.

2. TAXATION—COLLECTION—TAX EXECUTION—VALIDITY—MISPELLING OF OFFICIAL'S NAME.

The misspelling of an official's name to a process does not invalidate it, if it is made to appear that the official authorized another to sign it in his presence, or actually adopted the signature and acted upon it.

3. SAME.

The addition of the letters "T. C." to the signature to a tax execution sufficiently indicates the official who issued it did so in his capacity as tax collector.

4. SAME.

A tax fi. fa. in the following words: "Georgia, Worth County. To the Sheriff of Worth County, to Execute and Return, to Advertise and Sell According to Law: You are hereby commanded that on unreturned wild land number 211, in the 14th district of Worth county, you cause to be made the sum of $3.28, it being the amount of state and county taxes for the year 1888, and the further sum of 50 cents for the costs of this fi. fa. and make due return thereof to me according to law. Herein fail not. Given under my hand and seal, this 20th day of Dec., 1888. [Signed] W. J. Stoy, T. C."—recites the necessary jurisdictional facts required by the statute.

5. SAME.

Under the law in force in the year 1888, a tax execution against unreturned wild land was properly issued by the tax collector.

6. SAME.

The levy of an execution should be signed by the levying officer. If another sign the levying officer's name, the levying officer may adopt the signature as his own. Where the undisputed evidence is that the levying officer caused the property to be advertised for sale pursuant to the levy, personally cried it at the sale, executed a deed to the purchaser, and made an entry of the sale on the fi. fa., it is sufficient to authorize an inference that the levying officer adopted the signature as his own.

7. EVIDENCE—DOCUMENTARY EVIDENCE—PRELIMINARY PROOF—DETERMINATION.

The Civil Code of 1895, § 3628, relating to a filing of an affidavit of forgery to a deed, and having a special issue made up and tried as to the genuineness of a deed attacked for forgery, is inapplicable to a fi. fa. and entry of levy thereon offered in connection with a sheriff's deed, which is also attacked for forgery.

8. TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—PROVINCE OF COURT AND JURY.

A request to charge that "the law presumes that an officer does his duty, and an entry made on an official document, purporting to be an entry by the officer whose duty it is to make it, is presumed to be the act of such officer, and such presumption is not overcome except by the strongest proof," was properly refused. The vice of the request is an intimation of opinion as to the quantum of proof necessary to overcome a rebuttable presumption.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Worth County; W. N. Spence, Judge.

Action by Herbert Hawkins, by next friend, against E. L. Vickers. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Plaintiff sued out a cross-bill. Judgment on the main bill reversed and on the cross-bill affirmed.

Fulwood & Murray, J. J. Forehand, and Z. D. Harrison, for plaintiff in error. T. R.

Perry, J. H. Tipton, and Hall & Hall, for defendant in error.

EVANS, J. The action was complaint for land, and has been twice tried. On a review of the first trial the verdict was set aside and the case remanded to the superior court. See 111 Ga. 119, 38 S. E. 463. On the second trial the plaintiff introduced a grant from the state, and mesne conveyances from the state's grantee to herself. The defendant proffered in evidence a tax fi. fa. and the sheriff's deed to one Dixon (under whom he claimed title), whereupon the plaintiff filed an affidavit of forgery, averring that the sheriff's deed, the tax fi. fa., and the entry of levy on the fi. fa. were forgeries. Upon the preliminary proof submitted by the defendant, the court allowed in evidence the sheriff's deed and the tax fi. fa. over the plaintiff's objection. The plaintiff excepted pendente lite to the admission of the deed and fi. fa. The court ruled that the filing of the affidavit of forgery devolved upon the defendant the burden of proving the genuineness of the tax fi. fa. and levy, and to show that any alteration appearing in the entry of levy was made prior to the sheriff's sale, and instructed the jury to this effect. No separate issue of forgery was made, but the issues of the genuineness of the tax fi. fa. and entry of levy were submitted along with the other issues in the case. The defendant also introduced a deed to himself from the purchaser at the tax sale, and proof that he had been in possession of the land since that time, and had made thereon permanent and substantial improvements. The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff, the court refused a new trial, and the defendant excepted. The plaintiff sued out a cross-bill of exceptions, assigning error on her pendente lite exceptions.

1. On the call of the case in this court the defendant in error moved to dismiss the bill of exceptions because the only service thereof was an acknowledgment of service by the next friend, Herbert Hawkins; that he is only a formal party, and that A. H. Hawkins is the real party in the case, and service should have been made upon her. The purpose of having a guardian ad litem, or next friend, to represent a minor, is to furnish a person sui juris to carry on the litigation for the minor's benefit. Service of notice or other process pertaining to the case prosecuted by a prochein ami should be made upon him. He represents the minor in the particular litigation, and, if service cannot be had upon him, his connection with the case would be without practical value. We therefore hold that the next friend was the proper person upon whom to serve the bill of exceptions, and the motion to dismiss is denied.

2. As between the litigants according to the proof made at the trial, the ownership of the land in controversy depends upon the validity of the tax sale. We will therefore first examine the objections to the admissibility of the tax fi. fa. upon which error is assigned in the cross-bill of exceptions. The tax fi. fa. was as follows: "Georgia, Worth County. To the Sheriff of Worth County to Execute and Return, to Advertise and Sell According to Law: You are hereby commanded that of unreturned wild land number 211, in the 14th district of Worth County, you cause to be made the sum of $3.26, it being the amount of state and county tax for the year 1888, and the further sum of 50 cents for the costs of this fi. fa. and make due return thereof to me according to law. Herein fail not. Given under my hand and seal, this the 20th day of Dec. 1888. [Signed] W. J. Stoy, T. C. [L. S.]" Indorsed upon the fi. fa. was the following entry of levy: "I have this day levied the within fi. fa. upon lot of land number 211 in the 14th district of said county, for state and county tax for the year 1888. January 30th, 1889. [Signed] S. M. Cox, Sheriff." The plaintiff objected to the tax fi. fa. and entry of levy indorsed thereon being received in evidence because the tax fi. fa. was signed, "W. J. Stoy, T. C." when it was admitted in open court by the defendant that the tax collector in the year 1888 was W. J. Story; that the letters "T. C." following the name of W. J. Stoy did not show that the execution was issued by the tax collector of the county. Objection was further made to the introduction of the fi. fa., on the ground that one of the defendant's witnesses had already testified that the execution was not signed and issued by the tax collector of Worth county, but was signed by witness at the request of the tax collector, plaintiff contending that the tax collector could not delegate any verbal authority to sign the execution, witness not testifying that he had been appointed to collect taxes in Worth county in 1888. It appeared that the tax collector was dead at the time of the trial. While the testimony did not directly establish that the tax collector's name was signed by the witness in the tax collector's presence, it does appear that it was done at the special instance and request of the tax collector at his house, and under such circumstances as might afford an inference that it was done in his presence. It is the duty of the tax collector to sign a tax execution. It is not essential, however, that he should actually do the manual act of signing his name in every instance. In Hitchcock v. Latham, 97 Ga. 253, 22 S. E. 997, objection was made to the introduction in evidence of an execution on the ground that the name thereto purporting to be that of the tax collector "was in printing as it came from the printing office," and that, therefore, the execution did not bear the genuine signature of the tax collector, and there was nothing to show when, how, or where the name of the tax collector had been affixed to the execution. But this court held that the objection was not good where it affirmatively appeared that the fi. fa. came into the sheriff's hands, who had acted upon it as a legal execution, and in so doing had levied upon, advertised, and sold land; that, in the absence of further proof on the subject, it will be presumed that the printed signature was authorized by the tax collector; and that he issued the execution as his official act. It appeared from the record in this case that the sheriff had acted upon this fi. fa., advertised the land levied on to satisfy it, and sold the land thereunder, and made a deed to the purchaser at the sale. As a general rule, when the law declares that a process shall be signed by a particular official, his name cannot be affixed to it by another, not in his presence, under a previous general authority. Biggers v. Winkles, 124 Ga. 990, 53 S. E. 397. However, we are not in opposition to this general proposition when we hold that the facts of this case bring it within the principle of the Hitchcock Case, supra.

The misspelling of the tax collector's name of itself furnished no ground to hold the fi. fa. illegal. It is clear that if the tax collector, signing his name, had inadvertently omitted a letter, and the proof showed that he actually signed it, the signature would be valid.

3. Nor was the objection good that the letters "T. C." following his signature were insufficient to show that he had signed the execution in his official character. Under the law existing at that time, such a fi. fa. must have been issued by the tax collector, and it is to be presumed that the abbreviation "T. C." represents the officer's official character.

4, 5. The fi. fa. was further objected to, because it did not show on its face the necessary jurisdictional allegations that the taxes for the year 1888 were due and unpaid; that it did not show that the lot of land in question had not been returned and had been double taxed, as required by law; and that the tax collector had no authority under the law to issue a tax execution against unreturned wild land, but that at that time such authority was in the tax receiver. We think the necessary jurisdictional facts appear on the face of the fi. fa. It is not to be presumed that the tax collector will issue a fi. fa. for taxes that have been paid. The fi. fa. recited that it was for state and county taxes for the year 1888, and that the land had not been returned for taxes; and it issued for an amount alleged to be due against this particular land, which it is to be presumed was the proper amount. The tax collector, by virtue of the act of December 13, 1882 (Acts 1882, p. 47), in force at the time of the issuance of this execution, had authority to issue the fi. fa. for unpaid taxes due upon unreturned wild land.

6. Objection was also made to the entry of levy appearing on the fi. fa. Prior to tendering the deed and fi. fa. in evidence, one of the witnesses for the defendant had testified that the entry of levy on the fi. fa., although purporting to have been made and signed by S. M. Cox, sheriff, was not signed by S. M. Cox, but by another person; that for that reason it did not appear to be an official entry, because it had been shown that it was not made by the sheriff of the county, or by any one authorized by the sheriff. The testimony disclosed that the sheriff was dead when the case was tried, and that one W. J. Ford wrote the entry of levy and signed the sheriff's name to it. Ford did not hold any office. There also appeared the following entry upon the fi. fa.: "The within lot of land number 211 in the 14th district, sold this day to J. A. Dixon, for one hundred and fifteen dollars, this 7th day of May, 1889. [Signed] S. M. Cox, Sheriff." There was testimony that this entry of sale was in the handwriting of Cox, the sheriff. The statute declares that the officer making the levy shall enter the same on the process by virtue of which the levy is made. Civ. Code 1895, § 5421. In order that the entry of levy may be authenticated as the official act of the officer, it should be signed. Jones v. Easley, 53 Ga. 454. An entry of levy may be made and the levying officer's name signed thereto by a scrivener, if done in the immediate presence and by the direction of the levying officer. In such a case, notwithstanding the officer's name may be signed by the scrivener, it will be upheld as the entry of the officer. Ellis v. Francis, 9 Ga. 325; Cox v. Montford, 66 Ga. 62; Weaver v. Wood, 103 Ga. 89, 29 S. E. 594. There is no evidence in the record authorizing a conclusion that the entry of levy, and the signing of the sheriff's name thereto by Ford took place in the immediate presence of the sheriff. The undisputed evidence, however, discloses that the sheriff advertised the land by virtue of this particular levy, personally cried the same at the sale, and made an entry of the sale on the fi. fa. There was also evidence by one of the subscribing witnesses to the deed that he saw the sheriff sign the deed, and that he and the other witness attested it as witnesses. This evidence authorizes an inference that the sheriff adopted, as his own act, the entry of levy made by Ford, and acted on it, caused the property to be advertised, sold it, and made a deed to the purchaser. Even if the entry of levy was not made in the immediate presence of the sheriff, he immediately ratified it, and adopted it as his own act, when he advertised the property and sold it by virtue of this particular levy. The adoption by the sheriff of the entry, relatively to a bidder at the sale, made it the sheriff's own act and deed just as effectually as if Ford had signed it in his presence, or the sheriff himself had signed the entry.

7. Several of the grounds of the motion for new trial complain that the court erroneously extended the Civil Code of 1895, § 3623, to embrace a fi. fa. and entry of levy thereon, when tendered in evidence along with the sheriff's deed. This section provides that "a registered deed shall be admitted in any court in this State without further proof, unless the maker of the deed, or one of his heirs, or the opposite party in the cause, will file an affidavit that the said deed is a forgery, to the best of his knowledge and belief, when the court shall arrest the cause and require an issue to be made and tried as to the genuineness of the alleged deed." Its provisions are applicable only to registered deeds. Hill v. Nisbet, 58 Ga. 586; Sibley v. Haslam, 75 Ga. 490; Holland v. Carter, 79 Ga. 139, 3 S. E. 690; Bentley v. McCall, 119 Ga. 530, 46 S. E. 645; Chatman v. Hodnett, 127 Ga. 380, 56 S. E. 439. It has been held that the proceeding is purely statutory, and is to be strictly construed, and will not be extended to a will. Smith v. Stone, 127 Ga. 485, 56 S. E. 640. It is limited to the one issue of genuineness of the deed, and there is no authority of law for drawing into the trial of that issue questions foreign to the factum of the execution of the deed. Roberts v. Roberts, 101 Ga. 768, 29 S. E. 271. The provisions of the Code section providing for a separate issue upon the affidavit of forgery cannot be extended to the genuineness of the execution or entry of levy thereon. It is true that a sheriff's deed, even though registered, is not admissible as a muniment of title without the fi. fa. under which the sale was made accompanies it, or its loss is shown. But the law does not require that the fi. fa. shall be recorded along with the deed before it will be admissible in evidence. The Civil Code of 1895, § 3625, permits the record of the fi. fa. in connection with the deed, and provides that when this is done, and the fi. fa. is lost, a certified copy of the record of the fi. fa. is admissible in evidence. An attack on the fi. fa. or entry of levy, because it was not signed by the proper officials and is therefore void, is directed against the authority of the officer to make the sale. It is not a direct attack on the deed. The burden is upon him who is asserting that the official signature is not genuine to show that fact. The ruling of the trial court, that the Civil Code of 1895, § 3623, was applicable to the tax fi. fa. and the entry of levy, and that the burden was on the defendant to show their genuineness, and to explain any alteration that might appear in the levy, improperly cast a burden upon the defendant which the law does not place upon him. This error necessitates a new trial, inasmuch as we are unable to say that the jury were not influenced by this instruction in deciding the issues of fact respecting the validity of the different official entries.

8. The defendant complains, in his motion for a new trial, that the court erred in refusing to charge, though requested in writing so to do, that "the law presumes that an officer does his duty, and an entry made on an official document purporting to be an entry by the officer whose duty it is to make it is presumed to be the act of such officer, and such presumption is not overcome except by the strongest proof." There is a presumption that every officer does his duty, and every official entry is supposed to be the act of such officer, yet this is a rebuttable presumption and may be overcome by proof; and, while it is true that an officer's return should not be lightly set aside, yet it would be improper for the court to instruct the jury that the presumption of verity which the entry imported should prevail unless overcome by the strongest proof. Such an instruction is equivalent to an expression by the court as to quantum of evidence necessary to overcome a rebuttable presumption. For this reason the request was properly refused.

Judgment on the main bill of exceptions reversed, on the cross-bill affirmed. All the Justices concur.

NICK v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 9, 1907.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW—CONTINUANCES—DISCRETION OF COURT.

Applications for continuances are in all cases addressed to the sound legal discretion of the court, and a judgment refusing to continue a case will not be reversed unless it is made to appear that this discretion has been abused. No abuse of discretion has been made to appear in the present case.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 14, Criminal Law, § 1311; vol. 15, Criminal Law, § 3045.]

2. MURDER—EVIDENCE.

The evidence authorized the verdict, and no sufficient reason has been shown for reversing the judgment.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Washington County; B. T. Rawlings, Judge.

Will Nick was convicted of murder, and brings error. Affirmed.

The accused was charged with the offense of murder. He made a motion to continue the case. The showing for the continuance was made in the name of counsel appointed by the court to defend the accused. In the motion it was stated that Messrs. G. H. Howard and J. L. Kent had been appointed as counsel for the accused late Monday afternoon; that the case was called for trial Tuesday, and that they had not had sufficient time to prepare the case for trial or to confer with the witnesses; that the indictment was not returned until Monday afternoon, and that the accused was not arrested until Saturday morning preceding the convening of the court; that from investigation made the evidence would develop that the deceased was killed at a negro party, where more than 75 persons had assembled; that the killing occurred at night, outside the house, and that many shots were fired by different parties, and that counsel did not know, and could not, during the present session of court, interview those who were present, to ascertain who saw the shooting; that many saw it, and, while all of the witnesses were not known, they will swear, if time is given to confer with them to ascertain who they are, that the accused did not fire the fatal shot; that it was impossible for them, under the circumstances, to do justice to their client, or to see that he had a fair trial, such as is guaranteed under the Constitution; that many of the witnesses the accused did not know, but according to the best of his information some of them were living in the county adjoining that in which the indictment was pending; that, when counsel were appointed, they at once issued subpoenas for a large number of witnesses, the names of whom were furnished by the accused, some of whom lived in other counties, and it would be impossible for the officers to summon these witnesses during the present term of court; that, if such witnesses were produced, the accused would be able to prove that the killing was not done by him, but by another; that counsel used all diligence possible under the circumstances; and that the motion was not made for delay, but in order to secure the testimony of these witnesses at the next term. The court overruled the motion to continue, appointed a bailiff to assist counsel in procuring the witnesses desired, and passed the case until Thursday afternoon at 2 o'clock. Error is assigned upon this ruling. When the case was called on Thursday afternoon, another motion was made to continue the case, upon the grounds stated in the former motion, and upon the additional facts appearing in the statement made to the court by Mr. Kent, of counsel for the accused. The substance of Mr. Kent's statement was that the bailiff had been endeavoring to find the witnesses, but was unable to do so; that they had not been able to obtain the witnesses for him; that the court had also appointed other counsel besides himself and Mr. Howard, and these had been excused by the court, and that the case should not be pressed to trial until other counsel were appointed in their place; that a number of the witnesses to the transaction lived in Johnson, Jefferson, and Washington counties, and possibly other counties in the state; that counsel had been unable to obtain these witnesses so as to interview them; that some of the witnesses for whom subpoenas had been issued the officer had not been able to find; that the bailiff made every effort to get these witnesses, but now gave the information that they were not there; that counsel had learned that one of the witnesses possibly did not get the subpoena, and that one lived in Jefferson county very near to the scene of the occurrence; and the accused informed counsel that he could prove by this witness that another man fired the fatal shot; that counsel did not know whether this witness could be brought at that term of the court, but that he had not been brought. The court overruled the motion to continue, and this ruling is assigned as error. The trial resulted

In a verdict finding the accused guilty, and he was sentenced to death. The accused filed a motion for a new trial, which was overruled, and the accused excepted.

G. H. Howard and J. L. Kent, for plaintiff in error. Alfred Herrington, Sol. Gen., and John C. Hart, Atty. Gen., for the State.

COBB, P. J. (after stating the facts). 1. Motions for continuance are addressed to the sound legal discretion of the court. This is the rule in all cases, including those where the accused is charged with a capital felony. The Constitution guarantees to every one charged with a crime the privilege and benefit of counsel. This constitutional guaranty amounts to nothing, unless the counsel selected by the accused or appointed by the court are given a reasonable time to ascertain what is the character of the case that the accused is called upon to defend. There is no rule fixing what is a reasonable time for such preparation. What is a reasonable time depends upon the general character of the case and the questions of law and fact involved therein. In the present case it appears from the showing made for a continuance that the only question involved was: Who fired the fatal shot? That there was a homicide, and that this homicide was murder, seems not to have been an open question. The accused was present at the scene of the killing. It is true that there was a large number present. It does not appear that the accused was among strangers. It is manifest, from the terms of the showing, that he knew a number of those present, if not all of them. He furnished to his counsel the names of a number of those who were present, and subpoenas were issued for them, but, notwithstanding this, there does not appear in the showing for a continuance the name of a single witness whose presence at the trial was desired. The showing upon which it is based is very loose and irregular, being, in substance, that there were a number of persons present, and that counsel were not in a position to do the accused justice until they could have an opportunity to find out who of those present were witnesses to the homicide. In one portion of the showing it is stated that there was a witness living in another county who would testify that the accused did not fire the fatal shot; but the name of this witness was not disclosed to the court. If it had been, the court would probably have exercised its discretion and postponed the trial until a later date in the term, in order to have this witness brought into court. While it appears from the showing that counsel were not in a position to know who were the witnesses by whom the accused could establish that the homicide was committed by another, there is nothing in the showing to indicate why it was that the accused himself could not have given to counsel the names of those persons who actually witnessed the homicide. When the showing is considered in its entirety, there was no abuse of discretion shown. See, in this connection, Hardy v. State, 117 Ga. 40, 43 S. E. 434; Thompson v. State, 24 Ga. 297; Bradley v. State, 128 Ga. —, 57 S. E. 237. That portion of the showing which complains that other counsel who had been appointed to assist in the defense of the accused were excused, and no others had been appointed to take their place, is not referred to in the brief of counsel, and this point will be treated as abandoned.

2. The motion for a new trial contains no other special grounds than the ones dealt with in the preceding portion of this opinion. The evidence amply authorized the verdict, and we see no reason for reversing the judgment.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

THRELKELD v. STATE.

1. CRIMINAL LAW — WRIT OF ERROR—ESTOPPEL TO ALLEGE ERROR.

When, in the trial of a murder case, the judge requests counsel to define their positions as to the issues involved, and both counsel for the state and for the accused reply that the only issue is the question as to whether the accused is guilty of murder or not guilty of any offense, and that voluntary manslaughter is not involved, if the court submits the issue to the jury as thus stated, the accused cannot, after conviction of murder, founded upon sufficient evidence, complain that the court erred in failing to charge the law of voluntary manslaughter.

2. HOMICIDE—TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS.

The extracts from the charge of the court, upon which error is assigned, are not erroneous for any reason assigned.

3. WRIT OF ERROR—REVIEW—NEW TRIAL—NEWLY DISCOVERED EVIDENCE.

The evidence authorized the verdict. The newly discovered evidence is not of such character as would probably produce a different result; and the discretion of the judge, exercised in overruling the motion for new trial, will not be interfered with.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Grady County; T. A. Parker, Judge.

Newton Threlkeld was convicted of murder, and he brings error. Affirmed.

W. M. Hammond and J. W. Walters, for plaintiff in error. W. E. Thomas, Sol. Gen., John C. Hart, Atty. Gen., and S. A. Roddenberg, for the State.

ATKINSON, J. Newton Threlkeld was indicted for murder, and convicted. In his motion for new trial complaint is made that the court omitted to instruct the jury upon the law of voluntary manslaughter, although the evidence showed that offense to be involved. In his order approving the grounds of the motion the judge certifies that: "During the progress of said case, at the opening of the argument, the court requested counsel to define their positions as to the issues involved in said case. Whereupon counsel for the defendant and also counsel for the state stated in open court that the only issue was the question as to whether the defendant was guilty of murder or not guilty of any offense; that voluntary manslaughter was not involved in the case. The court agreed with counsel in this position, and for this reason the law of voluntary manslaughter was not given in charge." This certificate is conclusive as to what transpired at the time. If voluntary manslaughter was involved, it was the duty of the court to charge with respect thereto; but, if the court's omission so to charge was brought about by the conduct of the defendant, it would not lie in the mouth of the defendant afterwards to complain. The maxim, "Consensus tollit errorem," applies in criminal cases as well as in civil cases. Howard v. State, 115 Ga. 244, 41 S. E. 654. See, also, Caesar v. State, 127 Ga. 711, 57 S. E. 66; Steed v. State, 123 Ga. 569, and citations, 51 S. E. 627; Coney v. State, 90 Ga. 140, 15 S. E. 746; Griffin v. State, 113 Ga. 279, 38 S. E. 844. While a judge is not bound to commit an error simply because he is so requested, yet, if an error is committed as the result of a request on the part of the accused, he cannot thereafter complain. Able counsel for the defense no doubt believed that it was to the interest of their client that the law of voluntary manslaughter should not be given in charge to the jury, and thereupon took the bold position that the defendant was guilty of murder or of no offense. By taking that position in responding to the inquiry by the court they waived whatever right they may have had to a charge upon the law of voluntary manslaughter. After making such a waiver, if the evidence authorizes a verdict for murder and the defendant is convicted of that offense, a new trial should not be ordered simply because the court did not instruct the jury upon the law governing the less offense of voluntary manslaughter.

We do not deem it necessary to elaborate upon the rulings expressed in the second and third headnotes.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

(128 Ga. 510)

PAYTON et al. v. McPHAUL.

1. MORTGAGES—DESCRIPTION—SUFFICIENCY.

A mortgage which describes the property mortgaged as "100 acres in the southeast corner" of a given lot of land, which contains 490 acres and is in the form of a square, is sufficient as a description. The corner of the lot is to be taken as a base point from which two sides of the tract of land conveyed shall extend an equal distance; so as to inclose by parallel lines the quantity conveyed.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 35, Mortgages, §§ 125-132.]

2. SAME—PLACE OF SALE.

The power of sale in a mortgage authorized a sale "before the courthouse door in the town of Isabella, Ga." Subsequently to the execution of the mortgage the county site of the county was removed from the town of Isabella to Sylvester. Held, that a sale before the courthouse door in Sylvester was a valid execution of the power.

3. SAME—FORECLOSURE UNDER POWER OF SALE—CONVEYANCE TO PURCHASER.

A deed by a mortgagee, signed in his own name, but purporting to be in the execution of the power of sale in the mortgage, is a good execution of the power, when the recitals of the deed are sufficient to indicate that it was the intention of the grantor to convey in behalf of the mortgagor, and not in his own behalf.

4. SAME—PURCHASE BY MORTGAGEE—VALIDITY.

The general rule is that the mortgagee cannot be a purchaser at his own sale under the power in the mortgage, but a purchase by him is not absolutely void, but voidable only at the instance of the mortgagor or the owner of the equity of redemption. A purchaser at an execution sale, had subsequently to the sale under the power, the execution being based on a judgment rendered after the execution and record of the mortgage, will not be allowed to impeach the purchase by the mortgagee at his own sale.

5. USURY—EFFECT OF POWER OF SALE IN MORTGAGE.

The power of sale in a mortgage is not rendered void by reason of the fact that the debt sought to be secured is infected with usury. A sale under the power may be had for the purpose of collecting the principal and lawful interest on the debt.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 47, Usury, §§ 158-160.]

6. SAME.

No sufficient reason has been shown for reversing the judgment complained of.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Worth County; W. N. Spence, Judge.

Action by John G. McPhaul against Claude Payton and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Affirmed.

John G. McPhaul filed a petition against Claude Payton, C. E. Hay, and J. D. Bridges, alleging that on July 7, 1904, W. D. Collier executed and delivered to the Bank of Poulan a mortgage to secure a debt of $490.20, due October 15, 1904, upon property described as follows: "100 acres in the southeast corner of lot No. 307 in the 7th district of Worth county, Ga." The mortgage contained the following provision: "Should this debt not be paid at maturity the said Bank of Poulan, Poulan, Ga., or their assigns are hereby authorized to advertise and sell the real property hereby mortgaged, before the court-house door in the town of Isabella, Ga., four weeks' notice of such sale being made by the publication in a newspaper published in the town of Sylvester; and the said Bank of Poulan, Poulan, Ga., or their assigns are hereby authorized and empowered to make purchaser at such sale fee simple titles to the property sold. The proceeds arising from the sale of the property to be applied to the payment of the debt and the expenses of advertising and selling the same, and the balance, if any, paid over to the undersigned." Collier failed and refused to pay the debt at maturity, and the Bank of Poulan, after advertising the property for four weeks in a newspaper published in Sylvester, exposed the property for sale, within the legal hours of sale, before the courthouse door of Worth county, in the city of Sylvester, and the plaintiff became the purchaser of the property for $1,000. On September 4, 1906, in pursuance of this sale, the Bank of Poulan executed and delivered a deed to the plaintiff conveying the property. At the June term, 1904, of the city court of Sylvester, Hornic & Co. recovered certain common-law judgments against Collier, and on July 30th executions issued thereon were levied on the property, and on the same date that the sale under the power took place, but after that sale, the sheriff exposed the land described in the mortgage to sale under the executions above referred to. Payton became the purchaser of the same for $83. The sheriff executed and delivered a deed to Payton & Hay, who afterwards conveyed a half interest to Perry by a quitclaim deed, upon a consideration of $37.50, and Perry subsequently conveyed his half interest to Bridges upon the same consideration. On September 4, 1906, McPhaul entered into possession of the property he had purchased at the sale under the power, and posted notices in three or more conspicuous places on the land that he was the owner thereof. On September 13th the sheriff undertook to put Payton & Hay in possession, accompanying Payton to the land; McPhaul being at that time in possession of the land. The notices posted by McPhaul were destroyed by Payton, and notices were posted by him, claiming the property for himself and Hay, and forbidding trespassing thereon. As soon as McPhaul learned of these acts, he removed such notices, and reposted the land in the manner in which he had posted it at the time he took possession. It is distinctly alleged that he is now in possession. He alleges that he is informed and believes that the defendants intend to re-enter and continue to interfere with his possession by attempting to rent his land and place tenants in possession thereof, and other acts interfering with his right of possession and enjoyment of the property. The prayer of the petition is for an injunction to restrain the defendants from interfering with the right of possession and the use of the property; that the sheriff's deed to Payton & Hay, as well as the deed from Perry to Bridges, be delivered up and canceled, and for process. The judge sanctioned the petition, granted a temporary restraining order, and set the case down for a hearing. At the hearing the defendants showed as cause against the granting of the injunction a demurrer and an answer. The demurrer set up that the allegations of the petition were not sufficient to authorize any of the relief prayed for; that it did not appear from the petition that there was any sum due on the mortgage at the time the power of sale was exercised, such sale taking place nearly two years after the maturity of the debt; that it appears from the facts stated in the petition that the legal title to the property is in the defendants; that the deed to the plaintiff was not in harmony with the power; that it appears from the copy of the deed from the Bank of Poulan to McPhaul, attached to the petition as an exhibit, that McPhaul is the president of the Bank of Poulan, and that, therefore, he was acquainted with all of the facts in reference to the deed, and it was incumbent upon him to show that the debt was unpaid and that there was no usury in it; and that the description of the land in the mortgage is so indefinite that no lien was created by the execution thereof. In the answer it was averred that the description in the mortgage was too indefinite, and that McPhaul was active manager of the Bank of Poulan and the largest stockholder, and he was not authorized to purchase at a sale had by the bank, and that the bank had no authority to sell the property at Sylvester, the power only authorizing a sale at Isabella; that McPhaul has not complied with his bid and paid the amount thereof; that the debt which the mortgage was given to secure was infected with usury, and the power of sale in the mortgage was therefore void; that the judgments in favor of Hornic & Co. were the only valid liens on the property, and the title to the property is therefore in the defendants. The answer denied that McPhaul was in possession, and set up that the defendants were in possession, and that Anglin, who was the tenant of Collier, had attorned to them as landlord. It is admitted that it was the intention of the defendants to erect a dwelling house upon the land at an early date, and that, as soon as the injunction is dissolved, it is their desire to continue to improve the land which is theirs. The answer concludes with a prayer that the plaintiff be enjoined from interfering with the right of possession of the defendants and their enjoyment of the property, and that the deed to the plaintiff be delivered up and canceled. The judge, after hearing the evidence, passed an order granting the injunction prayed for by the plaintiff, and the defendants excepted.

Payton & Hay and T. R. Perry, for plaintiffs in error. J. B. Williamson and Polhill & Foy, for defendant in error.

COBB, P. J. (after stating the facts). 1. The court will take judicial notice of the fact that land lot No. 307, in the Seventh district of Worth county, Ga., contains 490 acres and is in the form of a square. Huxford v. Sou. Pine Co., 124 Ga. 182 (3), 52 S. E. 439. It is claimed that the description of the property mortgaged is so indefinite that no lien was created by the execution of the mortgage. The description is: "100 acres in the southeast corner of land lot No. 307 in the 7th district of Worth county, Ga." A deed or mortgage will not be held void for an insufficient description of the property if, by any reasonable construction of the terms of the instrument, the description therein used can be held to inclose or embrace a tract of land. If three sides of a tract are given, and there is nothing to indicate that the line not given is otherwise than a straight line, the description will be completed by supplying a straight line, and thus inclosing a tract; this being presumed to be the intention of the parties. Ray v. Pease, 95 Ga. 153 (1), 22 S. E. 190. Persons do not execute deeds and mortgages except for the purpose of conveying or creating a lien upon the property, and the intention to convey or create a lien will never be held to have been futile on account of the description of the property, when, by any reasonable construction, the instrument may be upheld. If two sides of a tract of land at right angles to each other are given, and it is clear from the instrument that it was the intention of the parties that the land conveyed should be in the shape of a square, the other two sides will be supplied by construction by drawing lines parallel with those which are given. In Walsh v. Ringer, 2 Ohio, 327, 15 Am. Dec. 555, the deed described the land as "70 acres of land being and lying in the southwest corner of the southwest quarter section of section 14." In the opinion it was said: "The general position of the land conveyed is given with sufficient certainty. It is in the southwest corner. According to the rules of decision, both in this state and in Kentucky, that corner is a base point from which two sides of the land conveyed shall extend an equal distance, so as to include by parallel lines the quantity conveyed. From this point the section lines extend north and east so as to fix the boundary west and south, the east and north boundaries only are to be established by construction, and the rule referred to gives them with sufficient certainty." See, also, 2 Devlin on Deeds (2d Ed.) § 1013. The lot out of which the mortgage is to be taken is a square. The property intended to be mortgaged is in the corner of the square, and contains 100 acres. The number of acres intended to be mortgaged cannot be more nearly or accurately described to be in the corner of the lot than by taking the lines of the lot forming the corner referred to, and drawing parallel lines from each of such lines at such a point that the four lines would embrace a square containing 100 acres. It can be reasonably inferred that this was the intention of the parties, and this construction will be placed upon the terms used.

2. At the time the mortgage was executed the county site of Worth county was the town of Isabella. At the time that the power of sale was exercised the county site was at the city of Sylvester. The power of sale in a mortgage must be construed like other parts of the contract, so as to effectuate the intention of the parties; and this is true as to the place of sale, as well as in regard to the other stipulations in the power. There are numerous cases dealing with the question as to the validity of sales where, for some reason, the place of sale, as indicated by the strict terms of the power, was not chosen as the place of sale on account of events transpiring between the date of the execution of the instrument and the date that the power was exercised. When the power provides that the sale shall be at the courthouse door, the rebuilding, removal, destruction, or temporary abandonment of the building raises a doubt as to where the sale should be had under the power. The general rule is that, where the door of the courthouse is designated as the place of sale, the building is referred to in its character as an official and public building, and that, therefore, the place of sale is the courthouse at the time of the foreclosure, rather than the place used for that purpose at the time the mortgage is executed. This has been held even where the courthouse was temporarily abandoned, as well as in cases where the building was destroyed or permanently abandoned. The decisions, however, are by no means in harmony. No general rule seems to have been laid down fixing the place of sale when there has been a new location of the courthouse. In some cases the sale at the old situs has been held good, and in others a sale at the door of the new structure has been upheld. 28 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law (2d Ed.) 804; 2 Jones on Mort. (6th Ed.) § 1848. In Napton v. Hurt, 70 Mo. 497, the power was to sell at the courthouse in Kansas City, and after the execution of the mortgage the courthouse was, by law, removed to and established in a different place in the same city; and it was held that the sale must be had at the new place, and not at the old. In Williams v. Pouns, 48 Tex. 141, it was held that a trust deed requiring the sale to be made at the courthouse of the county is properly executed by a sale at the courthouse of a newly organized county which includes the land sold. It will be seen, from an examination of these authorities, that the court is in each instance endeavoring to ascertain the intention of the parties and carry it into effect as to the place of sale, and that wherever there has been a change of the location of the courthouse between the date of the execution of the mortgage and the date of the sale the sale has been upheld, even though at the new place, if it was fairly conducted, and no injury was shown to have resulted from conducting it at such place. The power in the mortgage under consideration declares that the sale shall be "before the courthouse door in the town of Isabella, Ga." The question is whether it was the intention of the parties that the sale should be held at the place for legal sales for Worth county, or whether it was the intention that the sale should be at the town of Isabella, without reference to whether legal sales were conducted at that place. A sale could never be had in strict compliance with the power; for the reason that at the date of the sale there was no courthouse door in the town of Isabella. It may be that the old building formerly used was still there, but it was no longer the courthouse of the county. It does not appear that the land was situated in the town of Isabella, nor is there anything to indicate whether it was nearer the town of Isabella than to the city of Sylvester. It would be a reasonable construction of the terms of the power that it was the intention of the parties that the sale should be held at the county site, rather than at the place which was no longer the place of holding sales for the county. The use of the word "courthouse" is significant. Isabella can be considered as simply descriptive of the place where the courthouse was situated, and not as the place designated for the sale. But the courthouse door is the place. The courthouse door of Worth county was at the date of the sale in Sylvester. We think the power was properly executed by the sale at the courthouse door of Worth county; that is, in the city of Sylvester.

3. The deed made in pursuance of the sale under the power was signed by the Bank of Poulan through its president, vice president, and a director. Objection is made that this was not a good execution of the power, for the reason that it should have been signed in the name of Collier. It distinctly appears, from the recitals in the deed, that it was the intention of the grantor to convey the property in behalf of Collier, and not in its own behalf. Under the ruling in Tenant v. Blacker, 27 Ga. 418, this was a good execution of the power. See also Terry v. Rodahan, 79 Ga. 278, 5 S. E. 38, 11 Am. St. Rep. 420. If there is anything in the cases of Compton v. Cassada, 32 Ga. 423, and Moseley v. Rambo, 106 Ga. 597, 32 S. E. 638, in conflict with the ruling just referred to, what is said therein must yield to the older ruling. While it appears from the headnote in Tenant v. Blacker that the statement therein was the opinion of only Benning, J., an examination of the case shows that the point was directly involved and absolutely necessary to be decided.

4. It is said, though, that McPhaul was the president of the Bank of Poulan and the owner of a large majority of the stock therein, and that the purchase by him at the sale was really a purchase by the Bank of Poulan. The general rule is that a mortgagee selling under a power of sale cannot buy at his own sale, either directly or indirectly. 28 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 818; 2 Jones on Mortgages (6th Ed.) § 1876. But a purchase by the mortgagee is not absolutely void. It is merely voidable, and only voidable at the instance of the mortgagor or the owner of the equity of redemption at the time of the sale. Palmer v. Young, 96 Ga. 246, 22 S. E. 928, 51 Am. St. Rep. 136; 28 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 819; 2 Jones on Mortgages (6th Ed.) § 1876a. Neither a judgment creditor of the mortgagor whose judgment is rendered subsequently to the execution and record of the mortgage, nor a purchaser at the sale under such a judgment subsequently to a sale under the power, is allowed to impeach a purchase by the mortgagee at his own sale. Williams v. Williams, 122 Ga. 178, 50 S. E. 52, 106 Am. St. Rep. 100; Martinez v. Lindsey, 8 South. 787, 91 Ala. 334.

5. The Code declares that all titles made as a part of a usurious contract are void. Civ. Code 1895, § 2892. But we know of no law which says that a mortgage shall be invalid when the debt sought to be secured thereby is infected with usury. The debtor may plead the usury and reduce the amount to be recovered in the foreclosure suit, but the lien of the mortgage may be asserted for the principal and lawful interest due on the debt. If the mortgagee is thus allowed to foreclose at law for the principal and lawful interest on the debt, we see no reason why he should not be allowed to exercise the power of sale to this extent. While the case of Moseley v. Rambo, 106 Ga. 597, 32 S. E. 638, may not be said to be a direct ruling on this question, the reasoning of the court tends to that end. In that case the mortgagor acquiesced in the sale under the power, and it was held that he could not thereafter impeach the sale on the ground of usury.

6. It is said that it does not appear from the allegations of the petition that the debt of Collier was unpaid at the time that the sale under the power was had. It does distinctly appear that the debt was not paid at maturity, and we do not think it is incumbent upon the plaintiff to negative the fact that payment had been made after maturity and before the execution of the power. The evidence was conflicting as to who was in possession of the land. Both plaintiff and defendants claimed to be in possession. The person in actual possession of the land seems to have been Anglin, and both of the parties claim him as a tenant. There was evidence that Anglin had attorned to each. The plaintiff was proceeding against him as a tenant by distress warrant to collect rent. Anglin had given a note to the defendants for rent.

The judge resolved this issue of fact by holding that the plaintiff was in possession, and we will not disturb his finding on that question. If the plaintiff was in possession, he was entitled to the undisturbed possession. The defendants were interfering with him. They had committed an actual trespass. It is alleged in the petition that they were threatening to commit other acts of trespass, and the answer practically admits that, but for the injunction, the defendants would have continued to deal with the land as their own. Such conduct on their part would amount to a trespass if the plaintiff was the holder of the legal title and in possession. We do not think that the judge abused his discretion in granting a temporary injunction until these issues of fact could be decided by a jury.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. April 25, 1907.)

1. JUDGMENT—SETTING ASIDE—VERDICT.

Until the end of the term at which rendered, judgments are "in the breast of the court," and may be set aside or modified at the judge's discretion; but to set aside a final judgment based on a verdict, except for defects appearing on the face of the record, the verdict must also be set aside, and the verdict is not "within the breast of the court" in the sense that the judgment is. Ayer v. James, 48 S. E. 154, 120 Ga. 580; Jordan v. Tarver, 17 S. E. 351, 92 Ga. 379; Clark's Cove Guano Co. v. Steed, 17 S. E. 967, 92 Ga. 440; Regopoulos v. State, 42 S. 2. TRIAL—SETTING ASIDE VERDICT.

Any motion to set aside a verdict, based on matters not appearing on the face of the record, is in effect a motion for a new trial, and is subject to all the rules of law governing such motions. Lucas v. Lucas, 30 Ga. 191, 206, 76 Am. Dec. 642; Prescott v. Bennett, 50 Ga. 272; Hyfield v. Sims, 13 S. E. 554, 87 Ga. 282; McCrary v. Gano, 41 S. E. 580, 115 Ga. 296.

3. NEW TRIAL—BRIEF OF EVIDENCE.

A brief of the evidence is an indispensable statutory requisite to a valid motion for a new trial. This is true, even though the verdict be directed by the court, and even though the motion be based on grounds which do not require a consideration of the evidence. Moxley v. Georgia Ry. & Elec. Co., 50 S. E. 339, 122 Ga. 493; Mize v. Americus Mfg. & Imp. Co., 32 S. E. 22, 106 Ga. 140; Baker v. Johnson, 27 S. E. 706, 99 Ga. 374.

1. PLEADING—MATTERS OF EVIDENCE—COPIES OF BANKRUPTCY PROCEEDINGS—NECESSITY—JUDICIAL NOTICE.

To a suit on a promissory note in a justice's court the defendant filed under oath the following plea: "That on the 22d day of October, 1903, defendant filed his voluntary petition in bankruptcy in the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of Georgia, and was duly adjudged a bankrupt by said court, and now has application for discharge pending before said court; that the indebtedness sued upon was contracted and became due before the filing of said petition and said adjudication in bankruptcy; that the plaintiff was duly scheduled in said petition in bankruptcy as one of the unsecured creditors of said bankrupt, was given notice and had actual knowledge of said proceedings in bankruptcy, and appeared before the court having jurisdiction of said matter and filed proofs of claim; that said adjudication in bankruptcy and said discharge, when granted unto defendant, will release defendant from all liability upon the indebtedness sued upon in this case. Wherefore defendant prays that said suit be suspended and stayed until after said adjudication or the dismissal of defendant's said petition in bankruptcy, and until the question of his final discharge is determined, and that, upon the granting of such discharge, judgment in his favor be rendered in the case." This plea was stricken by the court, upon the ground that it did not have attached thereto certified copies of the bankruptcy proceedings referred to. Held, that this judgment was error: (a) Because this plea was in the exact language of section 11 of the bankrupt act of 1898. Act July 1, 1898, 30 Stat. 549, c. 541 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3426]. (b) Because it was not necessary to attach to said plea "certified copies of bankruptcy proceeding" relied upon for a stay of said suit. This was a matter of proof and not pleading. (c) The state court in which the application for stay was properly made could not know or take judicial notice of the proceedings in bankruptcy, but the plea in this case brought before it in an appropriate manner such proceedings, and the defendant should have been given an opportunity to prove this plea; and upon such proof it is the duty of the court to stay the suit "to await the determination of the court in bankruptcy on the question of discharge," unless there is unreasonable delay on the part of the bankrupt in endeavoring to obtain his discharge.

2. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE—CERTIORARI—VERIFICATION—SUFFICIENCY.

The answer of the magistrate to the writ of certiorari was as follows: "The facts set forth in the defendant's petition for certiorari are substantially true and correct, in so far as came under the knowledge of respondent." Held a sufficient verification of the allegations of the petition for certiorari.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Glynn County; Parker, Judge.

Action in justice's court by J. J. Lissner against R. E. Hunter on a promissory note, carried by certiorari to the superior court to review a judgment for plaintiff. From a judgment of the superior court dismissing the petition for certiorari, defendant brings error. Reversed.

A. D. Gale and Brantley & Butts, for plaintiff in error. Max Isaac, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. J. J. Lissner sued R. E. Hunter on a promissory note for $50, in the justice's court for the 26th district, G. M. The defendant at the first term filed a plea under oath, asking that the suit be suspended and stayed, because of bankruptcy proceedings then pending against him, until his application for a discharge in bankruptcy, then pending in the United States District Court for the Southern District of Georgia, should be passed upon and determined. This plea is fully set out in the first headnote. Counsel for plaintiff moved to strike this plea, on the ground that it did not have attached thereto certified copies of the proceedings in the bankruptcy court referred to in said plea. The court sustained this motion, dismissed the plea, and entered up judgment against the defendant. This judgment of the justice's court was carried by certiorari to the superior court, and, upon a hearing of the same, the superior court dismissed the petition. This judgment is assigned as error.

1. The judgment of the justice's court, striking and dismissing the plea, was error. If the plea was defective, because certified copies of the bankruptcy proceedings were not attached, it could have been amended on special demurrer thereto. But we do not think it was necessary to have certified copies of the bankruptcy proceedings attached to or made a part of the plea. The plea set out fully section 11 of the bankrupt act of 1898 (Act July 1, 1898, 30 Stat. 549, c. 541 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3426]), and was sufficient and appropriate pleading to put the state court on notice of the pendency of bankruptcy proceedings and to permit proof of the averments of the plea. This proof would be the bankruptcy proceedings referred to in the plea, properly authenticated. Bankr. Act 1898, § 21, subsec. "d." The production of a certified copy of the petition in bankruptcy or of the adjudication will be enough to establish the fact that such bankruptcy proceedings are pending; and, while the state court must be informed by proper pleading of the facts, we know of no law requiring that proof of the facts must be made a part of such pleading. United States District Judge Shiras in the well-considered case of In re Geister (D. C.) 97 Fed. 322, states the following rule as applicable to section 11 of the act of 1898, and points out the course to be pursued in cases like that now under consideration. "The bankrupt who is the defendant in the state court should file in court a proper pleading setting forth the pendency of the proceedings in bankruptcy, and, based thereon, should ask a stay as provided for in section 11; and, upon being thus informed of the pendency of the proceedings in bankruptcy, it will be the duty of the state court to grant the stay prayed for." In Boynnton v. Ball, 121 U. S. 457, 7 Sup. Ct. 981, 30 L. Ed. 985, it is said: "The state court could not know or take judicial notice of the proceedings in bankruptcy, unless they were brought before it in some appropriate manner. The state court does not thereupon lose jurisdiction of the case; but the proceedings may, upon the application of the bankrupt, be stayed to await the determination of the court in bankruptcy on the question of his discharge." The same rule is laid down by the Supreme Court of Georgia in Rutherford v. Rountree, 68 Ga. 722; Howell v. Glover, 65 Ga. 466; Cohen v. Duncan, 64 Ga. 341; Steadman v. Lee, 61 Ga. 58.

The plea being sufficient to authorize the proof of the facts therein set forth, the state court should have sustained the plea, and, upon the proof of such facts, the law required that the suit be stayed to await the determination of the court in bankruptcy on the question of the discharge. If the bankrupt is discharged, the certificate of the discharge would be a bar to any further prosecution of the suit. If the application for discharge is denied, the stay is at an end, and the suit proceeds to judgment. The suit in the state court being for the collection of a debt from which a discharge would be a release, there can be no doubt that the law required that the stay asked for should have been granted until the determination of the application for discharge. Bankr. Act, § 11; In re Geister (D. C.) 97 Fed. 322; Hill v. Harding, 107 U. S. 631, 2 Sup. Ct. 404, 27 L. Ed. 493; Collier on Bankruptcy (4th Ed.) 121, 123, 127. This result follows whether the suit in the state court was brought before, or after, the filing of bankruptcy proceedings. Collier on Bankruptcy, 131; In re Basch (D. C.) 3 Am. Bankr. Rep. 237, 97 Fed. 761.

It is insisted that the judgment of the justice's court striking the plea and dismissing the motion to stay was right, because at the time of the motion more than 12 months had elapsed since the adjudication. It does not appear when the adjudication was made, and we cannot assume that it was as of the date of the filing of the petition in bankruptcy or immediately thereafter. This limitation of the continuance of the stay of suits "until twelve months after the date of such adjudication" applies to suits "pending against the person" of the bankrupt before or when the petition in bankruptcy is filed and the adjudication had. It cannot reasonably apply to suits brought against the bankrupt after the petition and adjudication. Besides, the act provides that if, within the 12 months after the adjudication, the bankrupt makes an application for discharge, the suit shall be stayed until the question of such discharge is determined; and the allegation in this case is that an application for discharge was pending when the request to stay the suit was made to the justice's court. The object of the bankrupt law is to have an exclusive administration of a bankrupt's estate fairly and equally between all unsecured creditors. It does not permit the harassment of bankrupts, by suits for the collection of simple debts from which a discharge would be a release, until reasonable time has been given for the determination of the question of discharge. Especially is this true when the creditor has gone into the bankrupt court and proved his debt. In proper cases it allows suits for the purpose of liquidation.

2. Attack is made in this court on the verification by the magistrate of the allegations in the petition for certiorari. This verification is in the following language: "The facts set forth in the defendant's petition for certiorari are substantially true and correct, in so far as came within the knowledge of respondent." The criticism made is that it verifies the facts only "in so far as they came within the knowledge of respondent." We are not able to see how he could be expected to verify facts that did not come within his knowledge. In our opinion, the verification is sufficient; and, if the judge below dismissed the certiorari on the ground that it was not sufficient, this was error.

JOHNSON et al. v. WAXELBAUM CO.
(No. 140.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. March 28, 1907.)

1. BANKRUPTCY—ACTION AGAINST BANKRUPT—STAY.

A plea to a suit in the state court, setting up the pendency of bankruptcy proceedings and asking for a stay of the suit, must show that the debt sued on is one from which a discharge would be a release, and that application for a discharge had been made, or that the time for such application had not elapsed.

2. SAME.

The suit in the state court will not be stayed on the application of a co-debtor with the defendant, against whom no bankruptcy proceedings are pending.

3. CORPORATIONS—AUTHORITY OF OFFICERS.

Where a corporation holds out a person as its officer, it is bound by acts apparently within the scope of his authority, notwithstanding a by-law or other limitation upon the power of the officer, not known to a party dealing with him as such officer.

4. PLEADING—DECLARATION—OBJECTIONS—WAIVER—BILLS AND NOTES—JOINT MAKER—SURETY.

One who writes his name upon the back of an otherwise complete note, merely for the purpose of guaranteeing the payment, is apparently a surety only, and not liable as an indorser. Where he is sued on the note as joint maker, and makes no objection by demurrer or plea to the form of the suit, he is bound by the judgment.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Sylvester; Park, Judge.

Action by the Waxelbaum Company against W. A. Johnson and the Pate-Smith Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Affirmed.

Payton & Hay, for plaintiffs in error.
Hardeman & Jones and Polhill & Foy, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. The Waxelbaum Company brought suit on a note in the city court of Sylvester against the Pate-Smith Company and W. A. Johnson as makers. The defendants filed pleas and answers substantially as follows: (1) That the Pate-Smith Company, on August 16, 1904, had been adjudged a bankrupt; that the plaintiff had proved its claim in the bankruptcy case in the bankrupt court at Thomasville, Ga.; that the trustee had in hand $2,700 to be distributed to creditors; that the Pate-Smith Company had not been discharged, and that this suit should therefore abate, to await the action of the bankrupt court, to ascertain what amount, if any, the Pate-Smith Company is indebted over and above the amount realized from the assets of the said defunct company; and that the plaintiff should be remanded to its rights in the bankruptcy court. (2) That the note sued on was never made by the Pate-Smith Company, because it was not signed by the president of the company, but appears to have been made, and the stamp thereto attached of the name of Pate-Smith Company and signed, by W. B. Williams as secretary, while the charter and by-laws of the company required notes to be signed in the name of the Pate-Smith Company by the president of the company, and countersigned by the secretary and treasurer. The defendants deny that the Pate-Smith Company, or any one else properly authorized by it, did make and execute the note sued on. The plaintiff demurred to these pleas and answers, and the court struck them, directed a verdict, and entered judgment against both of the defendants. To the order of the court striking the pleas and answers, both of the defendants excepted; and to the judgment against the defendants jointly the defendant Johnson excepted, because, under the plaintiff's pleadings, the verdict should have been against the Pate-Smith Company as maker and W. A. Johnson as indorser only.

1. The plea setting up the pendency of bankruptcy proceedings against the Pate-Smith Company was properly stricken. It did not come up to the requirements of such a plea (Bankr. Act July 1, 1898, § 11, c. 541, 30 Stat. 549 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3426]). It did not allege that the Pate-Smith Company had applied for a discharge, or intended to apply for a discharge, or was entitled to a discharge, or that the debt sued on was one from which a discharge would be a release. Hunter v. Lissner, 1 Ga. App. 1, 52

S. E. 54. What we have said above applies to the plea of bankruptcy proceedings made by the defendant the Pate-Smith Company. The other defendant, W. A. Johnson, whether as indorser, surety, or joint maker, could not plead in discharge of his liability on the note the bankruptcy of the maker. Section 16 of the bankrupt act provides: "The liability of a person who is a co-debtor with, or guarantor or in any manner a surety for, a bankrupt shall not be altered by the discharge of such bankrupt."

2. The plea of non est factum was properly not allowed as a defense against the note in question. This note was signed in the corporate name by the secretary and treasurer, and was indorsed by the person who was president of the corporation. (See affidavit of W. A. Johnson to the plea.) We do not think the by-law requiring notes of this company to be signed by the president and countersigned by the secretary and treasurer would be binding upon third persons who had no knowledge of such requirements. We do not think that an officer of a corporation would be permitted to make a corporate contract, and then, without denying (as in the case of the execution of a note) that it was for a valid consideration received and enjoyed by the corporation, be allowed to defend a suit on the note because of a by-law limitation unknown to the party dealing with the corporation. 10 Cyc. 942. "Every corporation acts through its officers, and is responsible for the acts of such officers in the sphere of their appropriate duty; and no corporation can be relieved of its liability to third persons for the acts of its officers by reason of any by-law or other limitation upon the power of the officer, not known to such third person." Civ. Code 1895, § 1861. Where a corporation holds out another as its officer, it is bound by acts within the apparent scope of his authority, notwithstanding by-laws limiting such authority, unknown to a person dealing with him as such officer. Raleigh R. Co. v. Pullman Co., 122 Ga. 705, 50 S. E. 1008. The plea in this case did not allege that the Waxelbaum Company had any knowledge or notice of the by-law in question.

3. The defendant Johnson was sued as joint maker, and he did not, either by demurrer or plea, make any objection to the form of the suit, or allege that he was other than joint maker. He cannot now be heard to object on the ground that the suit did not describe him as indorser, and that a judgment was not entered up against him as such. As a matter of fact he seems not to have been an indorser, but was either a joint maker or a surety. The fact that he wrote his name across the back of the note did not necessarily make him an indorser. Ridley v. Hightower, 112 Ga. 476, 37 S. E. 733.

The judgment of the court in striking the pleas and answers, and in directing a verdict for the plaintiff is affirmed.

FERGUSON v. STATE. (No. 890.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. May 16, 1907.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

To authorize a conviction of crime, the state must prove every material allegation necessary to constitute the offense charged; and, when a given act may be done under certain circumstances without guilt (unless the statute contains provisos and exceptions in distinct clauses), the proof for the state must take such act out of the exceptions provided by the statute.

2. WEAPONS—SHOOTING ON HIGHWAY.

To sustain a conviction for a violation of Pen. Code 1895, § 508, it must not only be shown that the accused shot a gun or pistol between dark and daylight, as charged, and that such shooting was not in defense of person or property, but it is further incumbent on the state (unless the proof shows that such firing was done on a public highway) to prove that such shooting or firing within 50 yards of the public highway was not on the defendant's land.

3. SAME—EVIDENCE.

The evidence sustains the verdict, and there was no error in refusing a new trial.

4. CRIMINAL LAW—NEW TRIAL.

The newly discovered evidence presented would not require a different result on another trial.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 15, Criminal Law, § 2336.]

5. SAME—APPEAL.

This court gathers the facts of the case from the brief of evidence as approved by the trial judge.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Americus; Crisp, Judge.

One Ferguson was convicted of shooting on the highway, and brings error. Affirmed.

Blalock & Cobb, for plaintiff in error.
Zach. Childers, Sol., for the State.

RUSSELL, J. In the city court of Americus the defendant was convicted of the offense of shooting on a public highway. His motion for a new trial was overruled, and he excepts to that judgment. The motion is upon the statutory grounds and also upon the extraordinary ground of newly discovered evidence.

The plaintiff in error contends that it is necessary for the state to prove all of the material allegations before the jury would be authorized to convict, and insists that the state failed in this case to establish his guilt, because, under Pen. Code 1895, § 508, guilt is not established by proving alone that the defendant shot on a public highway between dark and daylight, but it is also incumbent upon the state to prove to the jury beyond a reasonable doubt that the shooting was done willfully and wantonly, and not in self-defense, nor on the premises of the defendant. We willingly agree that the contention of plaintiff in error is sound, and it is sustained by authority. In construing the section now under consideration the Supreme Court has expressly held that as it is not an offense to shoot on or near a public highway, when it is done in defense of person or property or on one's own premises, it is incumbent upon the state to negative each one of these things by proof, in order to make out the offense. In delivering the opinion of the court in Rumph v. State, 119 Ga. 123, 45 S. E. 1003, Justice Cobb says: "The line is sometimes very closely marked between what exceptions need be proved and what need not. It is safe to say, however, that whenever the exception constitutes a part of the offense itself, and not merely an exception to a general offense previously defined, it is necessary to allege and prove that the case is not within the exception; or, to state it differently, whenever a statute makes penal an act when committed by a particular class of persons, or when committed under particular circumstances, it must appear that the person accused was within the particular class or committed the act under the particular circumstances." The precise rule which is applicable to accusations under section 508 is laid down in Elkins v. State, 13 Ga. 435: "Where a statute contains provisos and exceptions in distinct clauses, it is not necessary to state in the indictment that the defendant does not come within the exceptions or to negative the provisos which it contains; but, on the contrary, if the exceptions themselves are stated in the enacting clause, it will be necessary to negative them, in order that a description of the crime may, in all respects, correspond with the statute." The decisions in Conyers v. State, 50 Ga. 105, 15 Am. Rep. 686; Newman v. State, 63 Ga. 533; and Isom v. State, 83 Ga. 379, 9 S. E. 1051, are to the same effect. So that we think that the position assumed by the plaintiff in error is correct as a matter of law.

On the other hand, we think that the allegations and evidence fully sustain the conviction of the plaintiff in error when applied to the rule we have stated. The state was obliged to show that the defendant shot a pistol or gun, as charged, within 50 yards of the public highway named in the indictment, between dark and daylight; and in order to show that it was willfully and wantonly done the state was further obliged to prove that such shooting was not in defense of person or property, and that it was not on the defendant's land. There were a number of witnesses introduced, and the testimony of several of them is confused, unsatisfactory, and insufficient. But the jury was authorized to convict, if they had had no other testimony, if they believed the evidence of Alonzo Bivins; and they had the right to disregard all other witnesses and rest their verdict on his testimony alone. He testified that he saw the defendant shoot five times at John Coleman's house. The defendant stood in the public road and shot five times just as fast as he could load and unload his breech-loader. It was between dark and daylight, in Sumter county, Ga. The witness swore, further, that the moon was shining, and that he could see the defendant plainly, and knew that it was he who did the shooting. The witness says, further, that the only thing that was going on at that time was some fussing and loud talking in Coleman's house, where the dancing was going on. The state proved by this testimony that the shooting was not on the defendant's land, by proving that Ferguson fired in the public road; and, of course, the public road is not his land. It proved that the shooting was not in self-defense or in defense of his property at the time of the shooting, by proving that nothing was being done to Ferguson at the time of the shooting. This showed conclusively that, whether there had been pistol shots there that night or not, Ferguson's shooting was not necessary for his defense. According to Bivins' testimony, when taken with the testimony of some of the other witnesses, the defendant willfully and wantonly fired his gun on land belonging to the public, and without any necessity for defending himself, his brother, or his belongings.

The plaintiff in error insists that a number of witnesses swore that Bivins was in a house and could not see, and therefore his testimony was false. This was a matter entirely for the jury. It is for them to say whether Bivins or the witnesses who contradicted him were impeached, and by their verdict they sustain Bivins. In the brief of state's counsel it is insisted that there was an error in the approved brief of evidence. Of course we cannot consider this statement. The brief of evidence as approved by the trial judge is taken to be true to its very letter.

The plaintiff in error further insists that he is entitled to a new trial upon the ground of newly discovered evidence. We have often marveled at the power of a verdict of guilty in quickening the thirst for an investigation and the faculty of discovery. But, even if the newly discovered evidence submitted in this case were produced before a jury, it could not produce a different result. The testimony of one of the witnesses is to the effect that he heard some unknown man say to the Mancy boys that he tried his best to get one of the Fergusons; and the affidavit of Simpkins is simply cumulative of testimony, already adduced, that there were pistol shots, both preceding and following the report of the shotgun. If there is anything in this testimony it would tend only to set up the fact that the defendant fired in his own defense. And this testimony would be impeaching, not only the state's witnesses, but his own witnesses as well; and it does seem to us that if a new trial is not to be granted upon extraordinary grounds when the newly discovered evidence merely impeaches the witnesses of the opposite party, it should much the less be granted when the newly discovered evidence would impeach one's own witnesses, for whose veracity he vouches. The only purpose of the newly discovered evidence is to establish self-defense in firing the gun. The defendant and his witnesses say he did not fire at all.

Motions for new trial upon the extraordinary ground of newly discovered evidence are not favored. If not regarded with suspicion, they should at least be granted with great caution. They should only be granted to avoid palpable injustice, and in order that the judgment set aside may perhaps be replaced by a different finding. We think there was no error in refusing to set aside the verdict and judgment in this case.

Judgment affirmed.

SOUTHERN RY. CO. v. SCHLITTLER.

(No. 10.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Jan. 11, 1907.)

1. COURTS—COURT OF APPEALS—CONSTITUTIONAL QUESTIONS—CERTIFICATION TO SUPREME COURT.

Where, in a pending case, a question is raised as to the constitutionality of an act of the General Assembly of this state, this court will examine the record and ascertain whether a decision of the constitutional question is necessary to the determination of the case. If we find that the decision of such a question is necessary to the determination of the case, we will so certify to the Supreme Court and abide their instruction in the matter; but, where the contrary appears, we will proceed to decide the case without so certifying.

2. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—VALIDITY OF STATUTE—NECESSITY OF DETERMINATION.

Where suit is brought for the recovery of an amount for which the defendant would be liable, even in the absence of the statute which he seeks to set aside as being contrary to the Constitution of the United States, as well as for an additional amount as the penalty authorized by such statute, and the trial court awards judgment in favor of the plaintiff only for the sum which he would be authorized to recover in the absence of such a statute, upon a bill of exceptions brought to this court by the defendant, complaining of the judgment and attacking the constitutionality of such a statute, a determination of such constitutional question is neither necessary nor proper.

3. CARRIERS—CARRIAGE OF FREIGHT—OVERCHARGE—LIABILITY.

Independently of the statute of 1889, embodied in Civ. Code 1895, § 2316, a carrier is liable to suit by a shipper for the recovery of an overcharge of freight which such shipper has paid under protest in order to obtain his goods, and which the carrier refused to repay on demand.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 9, Carriers, § 915.]

4. SAME—PERSONS ENTITLED TO RECOVER.

The recovery in this case is authorized by the evidence.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Baxley; Thomas, Judge.

Action by one Schlittler against the Southern Railway Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant brings error. Affirmed.

De Lacy & Bishop, for plaintiff in error.

POWELL, J. Schlittler brought suit against the railway company for the recovery of an overcharge of freight which he had paid to it, under protest, upon the shipment of a car load of horses from Louisville, Ky., to Baxley, Ga.; the shipment not being made by Schlittler personally, but by one Baxley, who, it was alleged and proved, was the agent of Schlittler. He also alleged the demand required by Civ. Code 1895, § 2316, and prayed judgment for the penalty provided by that statute for the failure of the carrier to repay the overcharge. By both plea and demurrer the defendant set up that the section of the Code referred to, as applied to this interstate shipment, is violative of the commerce clause of the Constitution of the United States. The demurrer, which was oral and general, and which went to the whole petition, was overruled by the court; but upon the conclusion of the testimony the judge, who heard the case without the intervention of a jury, rendered a finding that the plaintiff was entitled to recover $30.95 overcharge and the interest thereon, but that he was not entitled to recover the statutory penalty. The defendant excepted, and insists here, in addition to the general ground that the verdict is contrary to the law and the evidence, upon a reversal of the judgment on the ground that the Code section (2316) is unconstitutional, and asks this court to certify the question of the unconstitutionality of the statute to the Supreme Court for their instructions.

1. The constitutional amendment by which this court came into existence provides: "Where, in a case pending in the Court of Appeals, a question is raised as to the construction of a provision of the Constitution of this state, or of the United States, or as to the constitutionality of an act of the General Assembly of this state, and a decision of the question is necessary to the determination of the case, the Court of Appeals shall so certify to the Supreme Court; and thereupon a transcript of the record shall be transmitted to the Supreme Court, which after having afforded the parties an opportunity to be heard thereon, shall instruct the Court of Appeals on the question so certified, and the Court of Appeals shall be bound by the instruction so given." Acts 1906, p. 28. Since the duty of certifying that the decision of the constitutional question is necessary to the determination of the case is placed upon the Court of Appeals, the jurisdiction to decide when such a necessity exists obviously rests with this court. Hence, when such a question is raised, we will examine the record, and, if we find that a decision of a constitutional question is necessarily involved, we will so certify to the Supreme Court; otherwise, we will not. This doctrine is in keeping with the general rule, obtaining in the courts, that it is not proper to examine into the constitutionality of an act of the General Assembly unless it is found necessary to do so in order to determine the case as made.

POWELL, J. Prince, as sheriff of the city court of Dublin, levied a common-law fi. fa. in favor of Walker upon certain crops of the defendant in fi. fa. Subsequently, upon the sheriff's neglecting to sell the property, Walker brought rule, alleging that the crops levied on were amply sufficient to pay the fi. fa. in full, and that by the sheriff's failure to proceed with the levy he had been damaged in the amount of his debt. The sheriff answered, admitting the levy, but denying that the crops levied on were sufficient to have paid the fi. fa., and setting up additionally that after the levy the crops were removed from the field by the landlord of the defendant in fi. fa. and appropriated to pay the rent due the landlord for the use of the land on which the crops were raised, that it took all of said crops so levied on to pay the lien for rent, and that the landlord's lien was superior to plaintiff's fi. fa. The court struck the entire answer as being wholly insufficient in law, and gave rule absolute for the amount of plaintiff's fi. fa. The sheriff excepts.

So far as the answer of the sheriff denied that the crops were sufficient to pay the fi. fa., it presented a good defense. "Two things are necessary to fix the sheriff's liability by rule—contempt of court in not executing its process, and injury to the plaintiff." Wheeler v. Thomas, 57 Ga. 163. See, also, Wilkin v. Am. Freehold Mortgage Co., 106 Ga. 182, 32 S. E. 135. It seems plain, therefore, that this portion of the answer should not have been stricken.

There is more difficulty as to the other excuse set up by the sheriff for not making the money—that after the levy the landlord took the crops and applied them to his superior lien. The sheriff contends that by showing this fact he demonstrates that no injury has resulted to the plaintiff in fi. fa.; and we must confess that the proposition strikes us with considerable force. However, after an examination of the authorities, we have concluded that this does not present any sufficient answer. The levying officer may show outstanding title in a third person to escape liability for not selling property levied on; but the landlord has no title. His only remedy by which he could protect his lien after the levy by the sheriff was to sue out a distress warrant and to place it in the hands of the sheriff for the purpose of claiming the proceeds upon rule to distribute. Mulherin v. Porter, 1 Ga. App. 153, 58 S. E. 60. Upon such a rule the plaintiff in fi. fa. could have contested with the landlord upon equitable principles, and probably upon more favorable terms than he could have resisted the defense set up by the sheriff under the landlord's rights; since in the latter case the matter has been so brought about that the sheriff and the landlord, whose interests would naturally be in line with those of the sheriff, are probably enabled to claim a monopoly upon the direct proof as to the value of the crops. Justice Samuel Lumpkin, in Duncan v. Clark, 96 Ga. 266, 22 S. E. 923, in discussing the reasons why it is necessary for the landlord to foreclose in order to assert his lien, adverts to this question as follows: "It covered the entire crop of the tenant, and it is obvious that in such a case the landlord and tenant, by collusion between themselves, could easily defraud judgment creditors of the latter, if he were allowed, by merely delivering the crops, or a portion thereof, to the landlord, to vest in him a title which would be superior to the lien of existing judgments against the tenant. The tenant, by delivering to the landlord more than enough of the crops to satisfy the landlord's lien, could, with the latter's connivance, cover up property really subject to judgments held by other creditors. Hence, in such cases, as was suggested in Stallings v. Harrold, Johnson & Co., 60 Ga. 478, the necessity that the property be legally administered and the proceeds paid out according to due priority, thus giving to all persons interested the assurance of obtaining their exact rights." If the sheriff had maintained his levy, the landlord might have found other means of obtaining the sum due him. We therefore hold that the portion of the answer relating to the seizure of the crops by the landlord and the appropriation of them to the rent lien was properly stricken.

The sheriff's remedy in the matter is to sue the landlord for the violation of the levy. To such a suit the landlord would not be permitted to set up as a defense his wrongful seizure of the property from the sheriff's possession. The sheriff's title acquired by the levy is superior to the landlord's unforeclosed rent claim. Let there be a new trial, solely on the ground indicated in the head-note.

Judgment reversed.

DAVIS v. JOINER. (No. 48.)

DURDEN v. MUTUAL FERTILIZER CO. (No. 49.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Jan. 29, 1907.)

1. WRIT OF ERROR—BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—SUFFICIENCY—STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

A bill of exceptions which recites that a motion to dismiss a certiorari was made upon various grounds, and that the motion to dismiss was sustained on all the said grounds (said grounds being specifically set out in the bill of exceptions), "to each and all of which rulings the plaintiff excepted, now excepts, and assigns the same as error," specifies "plainly the decision complained of and the alleged error," and "specifically sets forth the errors alleged to have been committed," within the meaning of Civ. Code 1895, §§ 5527, 5528.

2. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE—REVIEW—CERTIORARI—PAYMENT OF COSTS—CERTIFICATE.

Section 4639, Civ. Code 1895, requires, among other things, that, "before any writ of certiorari shall issue, the party applying for the same, his agent or attorney, shall * * * produce a certificate from the officer whose decision or judgment is the subject-matter of complaint that all costs which may have accrued on the trial below have been paid." Where such certificate was not made by the "officer whose decision or judgment is the subject-matter of complaint," but by the clerk of the court, this was not a compliance with the positive requirements of this section of the Code, and a motion to dismiss the certiorari on this ground, made in the superior court, was properly sustained. Fuller v. Arnold, 64 Ga. 600 (3); Osborn v. Osborn, 70 Ga. 716; Cole v. Thurman, 45 S. E. 718, 119 Ga. 55; Dixon v. State, 49 S. E. 311, 121 Ga. 346; Miller v. State, 55 S. E. 405, 128 Ga. 558. The statute on this point, being free from ambiguity, must be construed according to its plain terms. Nowell v. Haire, 42 S. E. 719, 116 Ga. 388. For the reasons stated in this headnote, the judgment dismissing the certiorari is affirmed in both cases.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

MOORE v. CENTRAL OF GEORGIA RY. CO. (No. 214.)

1. CARRIERS—EXPULSION OF PASSENGER—DAMAGES.

The forcible expulsion of a passenger from a railway train, where he presents the conductor a ticket from which coupons have been improperly detached by another conductor of the company on an earlier portion of the passage, is a tort by breach of duty, for which the passenger is entitled to recover any damage he may have sustained, as determined by the jury from the evidence; and it is error to award a nonsuit, where the plaintiff has proved such case, as laid in the petition.

2. TRIAL—NONSUIT—OPENING CASE.

Whether a case shall be opened after a motion to nonsuit has been made is in the discretion of the trial court; and, where (as in this case) the trial judge did not in terms refuse to open the case as a matter of discretion, his consent to open the case is implied.

3. EVIDENCE—DOCUMENTS IN POSSESSION OF ADVERSE PARTY—PRODUCTION.

As a general rule (subject to exceptions for privilege), where it is shown that a paper which would be evidence material to the issue is in the court, it is the duty of the judge to require the production of such documentary evidence instant; and it is the duty of the court, where the alleged holder of such paper is there present, to grant a proper request for an investigation to determine whether such paper is in fact in court, and whether its production shall be required.

4. SAME.

A railroad ticket is evidence of the purchaser's right to ride a certain distance. When honestly obtained by purchase and payment therefor, it is the property of the purchaser. It is his property until delivered by him in exchange for transportation. If it be a coupon ticket, and any of the coupons be negligently, improperly, or wrongfully detached by the carrier, the purchaser has, none the less, a property right in such detached coupon, for purposes of evidence.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Atlanta; Reid, Judge.

Action by one Moore against the Central of Georgia Railway Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

Edgar Latham, for plaintiff in error. Dorsey, Brewster, Howell & Heyman, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. The plaintiff was nonsuited, and he excepted. He objects to the process of legal mechanics by which his case was chopped off. As this mechanical treatment can only be applied in a case so clear as to leave it beyond question that the plaintiff has nothing which it would be to his advantage to submit to the jury, and as the plaintiff in this case had proved the allegations of his petition, the question before us really becomes one as to whether the plaintiff selected the proper form of action; that is, whether he should have sued, as he did, because he was ejected from the train, or whether he should have based his cause of action (if he has any) on the wrongful tearing of his ticket. We think the plaintiff's case is controlled by the decision in Head v. Ga. Pacific R. Co., 79 Ga. 358, 7 S. E. 217, 11 Am. St. Rep. 434.

Counsel for the defendant insists that the plaintiff did not present a complete ticket to the conductor; that what he did present was a part of a contract, which was absolutely worthless without the ticket part of the same attached thereto. It is a further contention of the defendant in error that in the Head Case, in Morse v. Southern Ry. Co., 102 Ga. 302, 29 S. E. 865, and in Southern Ry. Co. v. McKenzie, 102 Ga. 313, 29 S. E. 869, and other similar cases, the plaintiff, in each case, had a ticket and made an effort to comply fully with the requirements of the railroad company. We can see no real difference between those cases and the present case. In the Head Case, as in this, the plaintiff did not have a ticket, in the strict sense of that term. It lacked validation; and this lack of validation, according to one of the express stipulations of the contract, voided it, so far as return passage was concerned. In this case the plaintiff had a ticket; but the coupon was detached, without any fault on his part. If he had objected to the conductor detaching the return coupon (instead, as appears from the evi-

there is still no question raised as to the construction of a clause of the Constitution. The excerpt from the constitutional amendment creating this court, quoted above, is also to be construed in pari materia with another provision in the same law that "the decisions of the Supreme Court shall bind the Court of Appeals as precedents." Therefore, if the identical question of construction has been before the Supreme Court, and that court has judicially given a construction to the clause in question, it is unnecessary to certify and to continue to certify such a question to the Supreme Court every time a party may seek to raise it. In this case the able and earnest counsel for the defendant raises no question as to the construction of the clause of the Constitution under which he attempted to assert his defense; he merely contends that under the well-known, well-recognized, and unquestioned construction of that fundamental law his defense was good. In his argument in this court he contended that under the recognized construction of that provision of the Constitution the "same-transaction test" should be applied to his plea of former jeopardy; and counsel for the state agreed with him. The trial court heard evidence for the express purpose of determining whether the transaction for which the defendant had been convicted already was the same transaction for which he was about to be put on trial in the second case. The finding of the court, that the transactions were not the same, in no sense involved any construction of the constitutional provision; and by determining, as we now do, that the trial court committed no error in that finding, we have not decided any constitutional question.

2. The defendant shot two separate and distinct men. The assault upon each of them was separate. They had made no joint attack upon him. The intent to kill was directed against them individually. The fact that the interval between the two shootings was slight does not make the transactions identical. Therefore there was no lawful reason why he should not be tried and convicted in both cases. Crocker v. State, 47 Ga. 568.

3. The only other assignment of error not already disposed of is that the court erred in not charging the jury, in the case relating to the assault upon Solomon, the law of shooting at another and the law of simple assault. Under the evidence in the case these offenses were not involved.

Judgment affirmed on each bill of exceptions.

HAMMOCK v. STATE. (No. 157.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Feb. 4, 1907.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW—APPEAL—QUESTIONS REVIEWABLE.

No question as to the construction of a provision of the Constitution is necessary to the determination of this case.

2. SAME—EVIDENCE UNLAWFULLY EXTORTED.

When by an unlawful search and seizure, under an illegal arrest, a person is compelled by an officer of the law to furnish incriminating evidence against himself, such evidence is not admissible against him in a criminal prosecution.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 14, Criminal Law, § 874.]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Macon; Hodges, Judge.

One Hammock was convicted of carrying a concealed weapon, and brings error. Reversed.

Charles H. Hall, Jr., for plaintiff in error.
William Brunson, Sol. Gen., for the State.

POWELL, J. The defendant was tried and convicted upon an accusation charging him with the offense of carrying a concealed pistol. The only testimony offered in the case was that of the prosecutor, as follows: "I am a deputy sheriff of this county. Upon information I arrested the defendant. I had no warrant for him. After I arrested him I searched him, and found a pistol in his right hip pocket. The pistol was concealed. The defendant was doing nothing at the time I arrested him. I took the pistol from his pocket myself. I had not seen the defendant commit any crime. The defendant wore a coat which covered pocket in which pistol was found. I arrested him in Dan O'Connell's bar, in Bibb county, Macon, Ga. This was on September 8, 1906." To the introduction of this evidence the defendant objected on the following grounds: "Because the evidence of the said witness Jones was acquired by the unlawful and illegal arrest of the defendant by the witness Jones, such unlawful and illegal arrest of the defendant being forcible, being without the consent and against the will of defendant; that by means of such unlawful and illegal arrest of defendant, he, the defendant, was by said witness Jones compelled to furnish the incriminating evidence against himself, in violation of the Constitution and laws of this state, which provide that no person shall be compelled to give testimony tending in any manner to criminate himself." The court overruled the objection, and the defendant brings up the ruling for review.

1. In his argument in this court defendant's counsel asked us to certify to the Supreme Court the question made by him as to the admissibility of the testimony complained of. Since the ruling made by this court in the case of Fews v. State, 1 Ga. App. 122, 58 S. E. 64, seems to cover this point, we deem further discussion of it unnecessary.

2. Under the Constitution persons are protected against unlawful searches and seizures, and also against being compelled to give testimony tending in any manner to incriminate themselves. A violation of the former right does not necessarily render evidence, incidentally disclosed thereby, inadmissible. A violation of the latter right does. When the act in question is a concurrent violation of both rights, the person is none the less to be protected. By an application of this test the decisions by the Supreme Court in the cases of Franklin v. State, 69 Ga. 36, 47 Am. Rep. 748 (3), Woolfolk v. State, 81 Ga. 562, 8 S. E. 724 (6), Williams v. State, 100 Ga. 511, 28 S. E. 624, 39 L. R. A. 269, Dozier v. State, 107 Ga. 708, 33 S. E. 418, Springer v. State, 121 Ga. 155, 48 S. E. 907, and Duren v. City, 125 Ga. 1, 53 S. E. 814, may be distinguished from and reconciled with the decisions in the cases of Day v. State, 63 Ga. 667, Blackwell v. State, 67 Ga. 76, 44 Am. Rep. 717, Rusher v. State, 94 Ga. 363, 21 S. E. 593, 47 Am. St. Rep. 175, and Evans v. State, 106 Ga. 519, 32 S. E. 659, 71 Am. St. Rep. 276. These decisions are not in absolute harmony, if we regard all that is said by way of argument and obiter, but are not irreconcilable when only the points actually decided are considered. If we were untrammelled by some of these decisions, our own views of the sacred character of these constitutional rights of the private citizen might induce us to extend the rule further than we do. After giving recognition to the limitations imposed by the precedents, we hold that, when a person is subjected to an illegal arrest accompanied by an unlawful search of his person, whereby he is involuntarily compelled to disclose evidence of a crime which, in the absence of his volition being destroyed, he would not otherwise have disclosed, the evidence so obtained shall not be received against him on a prosecution for the crime. Nothing in this ruling conflicts with the decisions cited above. In Franklin v. State, Dozier v. State, and Springer v. State, the evidence was disclosed by a lawful search pending lawful arrest. In Duren v. City, no arrest was made and no evidence was obtained from the accused, nor from what was on his person. In Williams v. State the objection was not made to the testimony on the ground that the defendant had been compelled to furnish testimony tending to incriminate herself, but merely on the ground that the search and seizure, by which the testimony was disclosed, was unlawful, and the decision of the court was upon this point alone.

That the evidence offered in this case was obtained by an officer of the law as a result of an unwarranted act of violence committed by such officer upon the person of the accused, who was not under lawful arrest, is too plain to admit of question. The crime committed by the officer was far more serious than that committed by the accused. The law recognizes no offset of crimes in such cases, but it does recognize that there is a public policy which would rather see the guilty go unpunished than have the guilt of the accused established by violently and unlawfully compelling him to furnish evidence against himself. To say, in a case such as this, that the officer furnishes the testimony, and that the defendant, therefore, has not been compelled to give evidence tending to incriminate himself, can be justified only by skimming the surface and neglecting to consider the pene-tralia of the transaction. Boyd v. United States, 116 U. S. 616, 6 Sup. Ct. 524, 29 L. Ed. 746. Although the remarks of Chief Justice Blackley in Rusher v. State may have been obiter, they are too good to be untrue. He says (94 Ga. 366, 21 S. E. 594, 47 Am. St. Rep. 175): "The law ought to hold out no encouragement to violent and lawless men to commit crime for the sake of detecting a previous crime and bringing the offender to punishment. The law should never suffer itself to become an enemy or antagonist to its own reign. The multiplication of crimes as a remedy for crime would be a very absurd and disastrous public policy, and we think courts should not lend themselves to the advancement of any such policy, unless they are compelled to do so by statute or some authority equally obligatory." The statement in the first headnote in that case, "The well-established rule that independent facts discovered in consequence of a constrained confession made by a prisoner are admissible in evidence against him is of force in this state, unless it appears that criminal violence was used in procuring the confession or making the discovery," coincides very closely with what we are here ruling.

Judgment reversed.

SOUTHERN EXPRESS CO. v. STATE. (No. 160.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. May 3, 1907.)

1. CORPORATIONS—LIABILITY FOR VIOLATION OF PENAL LAWS.

The responsibility of corporations for violation of penal laws, though developed by gradual evolution, is well-settled and necessary.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 12, Corporations, § 2133.]

2. SAME.

A corporation can be guilty of the offense of furnishing liquors to a minor, if such liquors be delivered to a minor by the agent of the corporation in the course of its business, or if such agent knowingly permits such delivery by another.

3. INTOXICATING LIQUORS—INDICTMENT—VARIANCE.

Proof of sale to one minor will sustain a conviction under an indictment charging that the defendant sold and furnished to three. The word "furnish," as used in Pen. Code 1895, § 444, has the same meaning as the word "deliver."

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 29, Intoxicating Liquors, § 274.]

4. SAME.

Where an indictment charges the accused with selling or furnishing three or more kinds of liquors, the evidence is sufficient to support a conviction if it shows the sale or furnishing of any one of the liquors charged. "The indictment may allege, in a single count, that the defendant did as many of the forbidden things as the pleader chooses, employing the conjunction 'and,' where the statute has 'or,' and it will not be double, and it will be established at the trial by proof of any one of them." 1 Bish. New Cr. Proc. § 436.

5. CRIMINAL LAW—TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—ASSUMPTION OF FACTS.

To assume in a criminal case that the testimony for the state is the truth, though such testimony be not contradicted by evidence for the defendant, and to charge the jury that such testimony is the truth and that there is no contention to the contrary, is violative of section 4334 of the Civil Code of 1895, and demands a new trial. The plea of not guilty, filed by the defendant, is a contention on his part as to every material and essential fact necessary to establish his guilt, and implies a denial of every such fact.

6. INTOXICATING LIQUORS—PROSECUTION—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

A conviction of a corporation for violation of section 444 of the Penal Code of 1895 cannot be sustained, where the evidence fails to show that the delivery of the liquors was made by an agent of the company, unless it appears that such agent knowingly permitted such unlawful furnishing; and a verdict, unsupported by proof of either of these facts, is, for lack of evidence, contrary to law.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Gordon County; Fite, Judge.

The Southern Express Company was convicted of furnishing liquor to a minor, and it brings error. Reversed.

F. G. Du Bignon, McDaniel, Alston & Black, and G. A. Coffee, for plaintiff in error. Sam. P. Maddox, Sol. Gen., for the State.

RUSSELL, J. The Southern Express Company was presented for the offense of furnishing spirituous, malt, and intoxicating liquors to three certain minors, named in the presentment. The express company is a corporation under the laws of Georgia, and was presented as a corporation. Before arraignment the company demurred to the presentment, on the ground that the charge is set out in such a way as to word the same in the alternative, in that the charge is that the defendant did sell, give, and furnish to Wofford Cox, Cleveland Wofford, and Charlie Gresham, minors, spirituous, malt, and intoxicating liquors. It also demurred because the description of the liquor is not sufficiently definite to put the defendant on notice of the kind of liquor which the state expects to prove was given, sold, or furnished by the defendant. It also demurred upon the ground that the defendant, as a corporation, cannot be indicted under section 444 of the Penal Code of 1895, and, further because there was no statement in the presentment as to where the defendant was incorporated. This demurrer was overruled, and exceptions pendente lite were properly allowed, and are presented in the bill of exceptions.

The evidence developed the following state of facts: One of the three minors, in behalf of all of them, ordered some whisky from a liquor dealer in Chattanooga, Tenn. It came by express, consigned to Wofford Cox, one of the three. Cleve Wofford paid the express charges and Wofford Cox received it. The three minors were each about 18 years of age. These minors, after its delivery, took the whisky to a pine thicket, "opened it up," and drank it. Each of them testified that the fluid was corn whisky. This whisky was not ordered at or from the express office in Calhoun. It was ordered at Ballew's, in Calhoun, Ga. The whisky was delivered by a boy, whom the testimony showed to be from 12 to 15 years old, and who was referred to by the witnesses as "George Gardner's little boy." It was uncontradicted that he was not employed by the defendant. He was employed by the Western Union Telegraph Company, which had an office in the same place as the express company. The agent for the Western Union Telegraph Company was also agent for the Western & Atlantic Railroad Company and for the Southern Express Company. There is conflict in the evidence as to whether the agent, Mr. Parrott, was in the office at the time of the delivery. Some witnesses testified that they did not know whether he was present, and others, including Parrott himself, swore positively that he was not present; but the only witness who testified that Parrott, the agent of the express company, was present, also testified that he (Parrott), so far as the witness knew, had no knowledge of the delivery of the whisky. This witness (Cleveland Wofford) testified: "I seen Mr. Parrott in there then. I am sure about that. I don't think Mr. Parrott was up town then. At that time he was looking over some boxes and looking around for some express for somebody else. I don't know whether he [Parrott] was engaged with the express company's business at the time I was there or not. He was attending to some business around there in the office. I don't know what it was; looking around for some boxes, or something or another, hunting some express for somebody else, I think." It was further in evidence that the young boy who delivered the whisky was not employed by the express company and received no compensation from it; and the agent testified that he was not authorized by the express company to employ him or to delegate any authority to him. There was evidence that Cleveland Wofford, who paid the express charges, had scattering beard on his face. He could not recollect whether he was the one who asked for the whisky or not. There was no evidence showing that the company had knowledge of the contents of the jug, or knowledge of the fact that it contained intoxicating liq-

nor. Upon conviction the defendant made a motion for new trial, based on various exceptions to the charge of the court and refusals to charge as requested. The motion was overruled, and the writ of error presents for consideration the overruling of the demurrer, excepted to pendente lite, and the refusal of the new trial.

We think the demurrer was properly overruled. It is well settled that the offense defined in section 444 of the Penal Code of 1895, may be properly set out by an allegation of sale to more than one minor, and sustained by proof as to any one of them. Dukes v. State, 79 Ga. 795, 4 S. E. 876. The word "give" may be treated as synonymous with "deliver," which is the meaning of the word "furnish," in this section; and it may, therefore, be regarded as surplusage. And it is well settled that a corporation is included in the word "person," used in the criminal statute. Pen. Code 1895, § 2. It is true that the doctrine of holding corporations responsible for violation of penal laws is one developed by gradual evolution; but it is none the less the law, and is of healthful necessity and utility. Mr. Thompson, in his work on Corporations (section 6285), uses the following language: "The rule that laws are to be construed with such strictness as to restrain the real purpose of the Legislature where they are penal is believed to have no just principle upon which to rest, as there is no reason why a corporation should be included in the word 'person' for the purpose of jurisdiction, and be excluded from it for the purpose of being exempted from liability to penal actions for the commission of wrongs for which the statute law makes individuals so liable. On the contrary, such an interpretation gives to an aggregate body of wrongdoers an immunity from punishment which individuals do not enjoy. The sound rule is that corporations are to be construed as persons, when the circumstances in which they are placed are identical with those of a natural person expressly included in a statute, and where the statute can be as aptly applied to them as to corporations." Wales v. Muscatine, 4 Iowa, 302; Stewart v. Waterloo Turn Verein, 71 Iowa, 226, 32 N. W. 275, 60 Am. Rep. 786. In South Carolina R. Co. v. McDonald, 5 Ga. 531, it is held that corporations are embraced in the word "person." A corporation "is a person under the law—an artificial person, created by the Legislature. It has a name—a local habitation, too. It is not a citizen in every sense of the word, but it is an inhabitant. It dwells where by law it is located. Louisville, C. & C. R. Co. v. Letson, 2 How. (U. S.) 497, 11 L. Ed. 353. A corporation is a 'judicial person'—a legal entity. * * * Where the lawmaking power uses the word 'person'—where it is found in the statute book—it is to be presumed that the legal meaning is intended, and not the social or ordinary meaning. * * * The General Assembly * * * intended to guard against the very construction * * * that the act applies only to natural persons." There can be no question that while, at an early period, it was supposed that a corporation could not even commit a tort, for the reason that, being created for lawful purposes and having no power to do acts unlawful, whenever its agents or servants exceeded the charter authority they necessarily committed the act as individuals, and not as representatives of the corporation, still that view was found to be untenable, and it was found necessary to hold the corporation responsible for the torts of its servants; and for the same reason while the corporation has no arm or hands by which itself to commit a penal offense, still it can employ servants and agents whose acts are the acts of the corporation, and who can and do, in its behalf and at its behest, violate the criminal law. It is well known that freight trains are frequently run on the Sabbath day; the physical operation being the charge of the conductor and engineer and their assistants, but the actual running of the train being ordered and directed by those higher in authority and having the company's business directly in charge. The servants who operate the train might greatly prefer to observe the Sabbath as a day of rest, but to retain their situation and the good will of their employers they have no option but to obey their orders. The case of Southern Express Co. v. State, 107 Ga. 670, 33 S. E. 637, 46 L. R. A. 417, 73 Am. St. Rep. 146, cited by counsel for plaintiff in error, has no bearing on a case of furnishing liquor to minors. In fact, in that case the court refers to the case of Burnett v. State, 92 Ga. 474, 17 S. E. 858, and expressly distinguishes section 444, supra, from the local statute for Bartow county, then under consideration. The selling and furnishing of intoxicating liquors to minors is considered an exception to general rules in reference to sales.

It is unlawful, without the written authority of the guardian or parent of the minor, to be the medium in any way whatsoever by which the minor may obtain intoxicants. An express company, where the delivery is not "C. O. D.," can deliver intoxicating liquor to the consignee, because the sale was complete and is supposed to have been lawful when such liquors were delivered by the consignor to the carrier. The consignee, when of lawful age, has the right to the possession. The consignee, when a minor, has no right to buy, or by any means be supplied or furnished with, intoxicating liquors without the written authority of his parent or guardian. "It has been repeatedly held that a saloon keeper who allows an adult to buy intoxicating liquor and give it to a minor to drink in his saloon is guilty of the violation of the statute against furnishing liquor to minors." People v. Neumann, 48 N. W. 290, 85 Mich. 98; State v. Munson, 25 Ohio St.

381; State v. Best, 12 S. E. 907, 108 N. C. 747. The word "furnish," in Pen. Code 1895, § 444, has the same meaning as "deliver." The General Assembly, in the "passage of this statute, intended to make it penal for any person in any way to enable minors to have access to intoxicating liquors; and that this was the construction placed upon it by the Supreme Court is clearly shown by the decisions in Blodgett v. State, 97 Ga. 351, 23 S. E. 830, and Dixon v. State, 89 Ga. 785, 15 S. E. 684, as well as by a number of others. There is no merit in the complaint that the state failed to show that the minors did not have written authority. Where intoxicating liquors are shown to have been delivered to a minor, it is incumbent upon the defendant to make proof that he had written authority from the parent or guardian of such minor authorizing such sale or delivery.

In view of what we have said above, there is no merit in the exceptions to the judge's charge, as taken in the first, second, and third grounds of the amended motion; nor did the judge err in charging the jury in his recharge, as follows: "It is the duty of the express company to ship liquor or anything else delivered to it to the point of destination. It is not the duty of the company to deliver liquor to minors. If the company does it through its agent, employes, or any person that they have in their employ about the building to deliver packages, if it is done by the agent or any person acting under the agent, by his direction or with his consent, delivering packages generally, if in doing that they deliver liquor to minors, then that is a violation of the law." The errors assigned as to this instruction are that the word "delivered" is there used as synonymous with the word "furnished"; that it charges that if the delivery is by the agent, or by any person acting under the agent and by his direction or consent, and is a delivery of liquor to minors, then it is a violation of the law; and, further, that it leaves out of consideration the fact that the company must have known the character of the liquor, or the facts must have been such as to reasonably put the company upon notice of the contents of the package; and, further, that the company was presented for the offense described in the first paragraph of section 444, for itself selling and furnishing the liquor, whereas the charge of the court is such as to make the defendant guilty under either the first or the second clause of that section. So far as the first three objections to the charge are concerned, it is a sound presentation of the law. The fourth exception appears to us to be well taken. Section 444 of the Penal Code of 1895 "makes it an offense for one to sell or furnish spirituous liquors to a minor by himself or another. That is the act of the party himself. But where the liquor is sold or furnished to a minor by a person other than the defendant, and not by his order or direction, if he permit it to be done, this is a different offense under the Code. If the liquor was furnished or sold to a minor by a person other than the accused, and not under his order and direction, it was his duty to prevent it from being done. His failing to do so makes him liable as permitting it to be done, and he should be so charged in the indictment; but he was not so charged in this case." Johnson v. State, 83 Ga. 555, 10 S. E. 208.

The exception contained in the fifth ground of the amended motion for new trial is well taken, and demands the grant of a new trial. The portion of the charge excepted to is as follows: "Now, there is no contention here that the party who delivered the liquor did not know it was liquor. Therefore it is not necessary to charge on this point. The state contends that the liquor was delivered, and there is no contention here that the party who delivered it didn't know it was whisky." This was a manifest expression on the part of the court that it had been proved that the article delivered was whisky, and that the party who delivered it knew it was whisky. Such a statement on the part of the court is forbidden by law and is reversible error. It is true that the evidence of three witnesses for the state was to the effect that it was whisky; and there is no evidence to the contrary. But the defendant's plea of not guilty put the state on proof of every material allegation in the indictment, and submitted to the jury, not only the facts testified to by witnesses, but also the credibility of each and every witness. Further, there was no evidence as to whether the party who delivered it knew or did not know that it was whisky. There was certainly no evidence that he knew it to be whisky. And, while the defendant had the right to put the state on proof of every material fact necessary to establish his guilt, it was not only illegal, but manifestly prejudicial, to state that there was no contention "that the party who delivered it didn't know it was whisky." The state was obliged to show that it was whisky, or some like intoxicating liquor, and submitted testimony upon that subject for the consideration of the jury. The defendant had the right, under his plea of not guilty, to have the jury, and not the court, pass upon the issues of fact in the case.

This court is bitterly opposed to the furnishing of liquor to minors by any means or device whatsoever, but even in trials for that offense the "dumb act" (Civ. Code 1895, § 4334) is of force. The court should have granted a new trial, not because the corporation could not be indicted, or because its delivery of whisky would not amount to furnishing, nor upon the other grounds which have been referred to, but because of the intimation and expression of opinion on the evidence above quoted, and because the verdict is contrary to law, for lack of evidence to support it. The corporation can be guilty of furnishing liquor to a minor, but it can only be guilty because it is held responsible for the acts of its agents, and, in case of furnishing liquor to a minor, for permission given by its agent, for the sale or furnishing of the liquors in question. There was no evidence introduced by the state in this case which showed that the agent knew of the delivery, consented to it, or permitted it. The only witness who testified that the agent was present (taking his testimony to be the truth) also testified that there was nothing to attract the attention of the agent to the delivery. None of the parties interested in the whisky spoke to him, and, if present, he was absorbed in the consideration of other business. The proof was uncontradicted that the boy who delivered the whisky was not employed by the express company. If the state had shown that the agent was looking at the boy, or told the boy to deliver the whisky, or was silently standing by and made no protest when he saw the boy delivering the same, the jury might have been authorized to consider the act of the boy as the act of the agent, and then the act of the agent would have been the act of the company. But the state's own testimony negatives the idea that the agent either knew of, consented to, or permitted the delivery in this case.

Judgment reversed.

(1 Ga. App. 790)

NEWSOME v. STATE. (No. 426.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. May 9, 1907.)

1. INTOXICATING LIQUORS—FURNISHING LIQUOR TO MINOR.

A liquor dealer, who in one county receives by mail an order for intoxicating liquor from a minor in another county, and who fills the order by shipping the liquor by express to the latter county, where it is delivered to the minor, may be indicted and punished in either of the counties named, for a violation of Pen. Code 1895, § 444.

2. SAME—EVIDENCE.

A liquor dealer who ships whisky to a customer not personally known to him does so at his peril; for, if the customer prove to be a minor or other person to whom the furnishing of intoxicating liquors is forbidden, the dealer's ignorance of that fact will not excuse him from criminal responsibility.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 29, Intoxicating Liquors, § 172.]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Berrien County; Mitchell, Judge.

W. D. Newsome was convicted of furnishing intoxicating liquors to a minor, and bring error. Affirmed.

The plaintiff in error was indicted for causing intoxicating liquors to be furnished to a minor. He pleaded not guilty, and his case was tried before the court without the intervention of a jury upon the following agreed statement of facts: "On January 31, 1907, one Joe Davis, at Nashville, Ga., sent by mail to W. D. Newsome, at Valdosta, Ga., a letter, signed by himself, stating as follows: 'Enclosed find money order for $3.50, for which please send me two quarts of Montreal malt and two quarts of your best 75 cent rye.' The said Joe Davis was then and there at Nashville, Berrien county, Ga. W. D. Newsome was then and there a licensed liquor dealer in the city of Valdosta, Lowndes county, Ga. The said W. D. Newsome, upon receipt of said order, immediately sent by express, via Southern Express Company, to the said Joe Davis, at Nashville, Ga., the whiskies and liquors ordered, and the Southern Express Company received the same at Valdosta, in Lowndes county Ga., and transported the same to Nashville, Ga., in Berrien county, where R. L. Ferguson, as the agent of the Southern Express Company at Nashville, Ga., Berrien county, delivered the same then and there to the said Joe Davis. The said Joe Davis was a minor under 21 years of age. The liquors as aforesaid, as stated, were delivered to the Southern Express Company in Lowndes county, Ga., by the said W. D. Newsome, and the Southern Express Company, a common carrier, conveyed the same, as stated, to Nashville, Ga., the express being paid by the minor, who was the consignee (Joe Davis), at Nashville, Ga.; the said W. D. Newsome not having first obtained the written authority, from either a parent or guardian of the said Joe Davis, to sell or furnish any liquors to the said Joe Davis. That said W. D. Newsome, after receiving the order signed by Joe Davis as aforesaid, without inquiry as to whether the said Joe Davis was or was not a minor, shipped the liquor as stated. The particular whisky shipped had not, at the time the order was received, been separated from the general stock of the said W. D. Newsome in his saloon, at Valdosta, Lowndes county, Ga., but was separated therefrom after the receipt of said order and its acceptance, and delivered to the carrier, the Southern Express Company, as aforesaid. The liquors furnished were intoxicating. The delivery to the carrier, as stated, was for the purpose of shipment under the usual contract specifying its conveyance and delivery to the consignee at Nashville, Berrien county, Ga. It was contemplated by the parties, at the time the order was sent and received and accepted, that the whisky was to be sent by express, as stated." He was adjudged guilty, and excepted.

Cranford & Wilcox, for plaintiff in error.
W. E. Thomas, Sol. Gen., for the State.

POWELL, J. (after stating the foregoing facts). Pen. Code 1895, § 444, makes it criminal for "any person, by himself or another," to "sell, or cause to be sold, or furnished," to any minor, any spirituous, malt, or intoxicating liquors, unless such person shall first obtain the written consent of the minor's parent or guardian. In this state, as in most of the states, this statute has been broadly and liberally construed in favor of the protection thus afforded against the obtaining of intoxicating liquors by minors. The word "sell," appearing in the statute, is, of course, not to be taken in the strict technical sense of the word. One of the elements contained in the definition of a "sale," as this term is ordinarily used in laws and court language, is competent parties. A minor not being a competent party to obtain liquor, there can be no sale to him in the technical sense. The statute, therefore, makes punishable those acts which would amount to a sale of the liquors if the minor were a competent contracting party. If a liquor dealer in county A receive an order for whisky from a lawful customer in county B, and from his store in county A ship the whisky by a common carrier to the purchaser in county B, a sale has taken place in county A. If, under the same circumstances, the order be sent by an unlawful customer—a minor—and the goods be shipped, no sale, in the strict sense of the word, has taken place, but the quasi sale contemplated by Pen. Code 1895, § 444, has been consummated at the place where the delivery was made to the carrier; hence the liquor dealer may be indicted in that county.

But the sale or quasi sale is not the only offense under this statute. To furnish liquors or cause them to be furnished is also criminal. This offense is not complete until the minor receives possession of the liquors. If a minor in De Kalb county send a private person into Fulton county to buy liquor for him, and this private person disclose to the dealer the fact that he desires the liquor for a minor, and the dealer send the liquor by this private person, who delivers it to the minor in De Kalb county, the dealer may be indicted in Fulton county for the quasi sale. Both the dealer and the private person through whom the delivery was effectuated may be indicted in De Kalb county for furnishing the liquor and causing it to be furnished. Likewise where delivery is made through a common carrier. The purpose, the unbroken judicial construction, in fact, the very language, of this statute, distinguishes the case at bar from the line of cases holding that in ordinary sales of intoxicating liquors, as well as of other commodities, the sale is complete at the place where delivery is made to the carrier. Those cases (e. g., Dunn v. State, 82 Ga. 27, 8 S. E. 806, 3 L. R. A. 199; Southern Express Co. v. State, 107 Ga. 670, 33 S. E. 637, 46 L. R. A. 417, 73 Am. St. Rep. 146, and cases cited therein) all proceed upon the theory that the common carrier is the agent of the consignee to receive for him the goods and transport them, and therefore delivery to the carrier is delivery to the consignee. Watkins v. Paine, 57 Ga. 50.

If the sale be lawful at the place where the goods are tendered to the carrier, it cannot refuse them. It is a public agent for such purposes. But the carrier is not a public agent for unlawful purposes. If it accepts for transportation liquor consigned from a dealer to a minor, it carries it, not as the minor's property, for the law will not let the title pass, but as the dealer's. Burnett v. State, 92 Ga. 474, 17 S. E. 858; So. Ex. Co. v. State, 107 Ga. 674, 33 S. E. 637, 46 L. R. A. 417, 73 Am. St. Rep. 146. The carrier cannot by contract, express or implied, nor by virtue of any public duty, become or agree to become the minor's agent to accept for him delivery of a thing which the law forbids that he should receive. This principle existing in the law of agency is too universally recognized to require citation of authority. The two cases just cited above make it plain that there is no legal duty on the carrier to receive and transport the liquor in such cases; that, on the contrary, the law forbids it; and, if the carrier delivers the liquor to the minor, he and the dealer are both principals in the crime of furnishing and causing to be furnished liquor to a minor. So. Ex. Co. v. State, 1 Ga. App. 700, 58 S. E. 67. Since the crime of furnishing becomes complete in the county where the minor actually obtains personal possession of the liquor, venue may be laid there.

2. That a defendant who furnishes liquor to a minor happens to be ignorant of the minority is no excuse. Most states recognize no exceptions to this rule. 17 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 335. Georgia is somewhat more liberal, and allows the accused to show, in defense, that after honest inquiry and the exercise of due diligence he bona fide believed, and was justified in believing, that the person to whom the liquor was furnished was at the time of full age. Certainly a dealer who fills an order without inquiry is not within the protection of this exception. Loeb v. State, 75 Ga. 258; Harkey v. State, 89 Ga. 478, 15 S. E. 552; Burnett v. State, 92 Ga. 474, 17 S. E. 858; Blodgett v. State, 97 Ga. 351, 23 S. E. 830.

Judgment affirmed.

(1 Ga. App. 582)

WRIGHT v. FLOYD COUNTY. (Nos. 219, 252.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. April 11, 1907.)

1. COUNTIES—OFFICERS AND AGENTS—POWERS—IMPLIED POWERS.

Where, by statute, jurisdiction over a subject-matter is conferred upon county authorities, and therein the power to do certain things is expressed, the further power to contract in regard to that subject-matter is to be implied; and a part of this implicit power is the authority to use discretion as to the details of such contracts, subject only to the limitations imposed by the statutes or public policy of the state.

2. BRIDGES—ESTABLISHMENT BY PUBLIC AUTHORITIES.

There is nothing in the statutes or public policy of this state which prohibits the proper county authorities from making a contract with the owner of a mill site, near which a public highway, including a bridge, is to be erected, whereby the mill owner deeds to the county the right of way for the highway and contributes to the erection of the bridge on condition that he shall have the right to join his milldam to the piers of the bridge and use them as bulkheads, unless such an arrangement would manifestly endanger the safety or convenience of the public.

3. SAME.

The jurisdiction of determining whether such an arrangement will be detrimental to the good of the public, or of the county in its corporate capacity, is primarily vested in the county authorities having in charge the subject-matter of roads and bridges.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Floyd County; Hamilton, Judge.

Action by Floyd county against one Wright. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error, and plaintiff files a cross-bill. Affirmed on main bill, and cross-bill dismissed.

Seaborn & Barry Wright and W. M. Henry, for plaintiff in error. Junius F. Hillyer, for defendant in error.

POWELL, J. On May 16, 1905, by a written contract made between Wright and Floyd county, through its county commissioners, and reciting that said Wright is the owner of the lands on both sides of the Armuchee creek at the old Jones mill in said county, including the mill and water rights, and the county is the owner of a bridge across the creek, at or near said mill, on the Dalton public road; that, it being necessary to repair said bridge by substituting two stone or concrete piers for the wooden bents now in use, one pier to be located at the north end and the other at the south end of said bridge, and Wright desiring to build his milldam and race anew at or near said bridge and to use said bridge for bulkheads or stays for the same—it was agreed that Wright, at his expense, would build one of the piers, and the county, at its expense, the other, and that Wright should also build, at his expense, any additional concrete or stone pier or work which might in the discretion of either party be required to properly adjust the contemplated dam and race to the piers and to their use as safe and permanent supports to the bridge; all the work to be done according to the county's plans and specifications and subject to its approval. As a further consideration it is recited that the said Wright "hereby sells and forever quitclaims to [the county] the right to keep and maintain said bridge where now located, and to rebuild or replace the same as often as may be necessary in the future; also the right of way for a public road 30 feet wide on both sides of said creek, and along the line of the road leading through his land to and from said bridge." On the county's part, the contract states that it "agrees to allow Wright the privilege to construct his milldam at or near said bridge, and to make use of the piers before mentioned, as bulkheads or stays to his dam, the work to be done, as before stated, under the direction and subject to the approval of the county authorities," and that "this instrument shall operate as a deed of conveyance as far as applicable." With the consent of Wright, and at his instance, the county, after building the pier which they were to build, also constructed the one which Wright was to erect. The cost of building the second pier was $517.10; and for this sum the county brought suit against Wright. The latter defended the suit on the ground that the county did not have the power to convey, or to grant to him the right to use, the portion of the bridge or public highway for the purpose set out in the contract, and that, therefore, there was no consideration for the agreement on his part to pay for building a portion of the work; it being necessary for the county to do the same in order to build the bridge. The court awarded judgment in favor of the county, and Wright excepts.

1. The whole case turns upon the one question as to whether the agreement between the parties is within the contractual capacity of the county commissioners. Wright is perfectly willing to pay the amount sued for if the county can grant him the benefits contemplated in the contract, and is unwilling to pay it unless he can get them. In fact, we gather from the argument that the suit has been brought and maintained for the purpose of settling this legal question before further money is spent by Wright in pursuance of the contemplated work necessary to the completion of the dam. The county, in the brief of its able counsel, thus presents its contentions: "That the board of commissioners had jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the contract; that its discretion was practically unlimited; that such a broad discretion includes the right to agree upon price, when to be paid, how and with what to be paid, whether with draft on the treasurer or by transfer of property, or, as in this case, by the granting of a special license; that there is no prohibition against the board granting licenses on public easements, but that it is consistent with the broad discretion granted them, and agrees with the rights of individuals, as well as the rights of the public, and is in accord with the spirit of the law, as well as the rulings of our courts; that this right applies incontestibly when the grant of a license is to the owner of the fee; further, that the record discloses that the conveyance of the right and easement specified in the contract, from the plaintiff in error to the defendant in error, was necessary to secure the public right thereto, and that this fact gives to the transaction a different character from that insisted on by the plaintiff in error." On the other hand, the distinguished ex-judge of the superior courts who appeared for Mr. Wright asserts the propositions that county authorities have no contractual powers, except such as are expressly conferred by law; that their powers are enumerated, and are limited by the enumeration; that nowhere has any law, either general or special, ever given the board of county commissioners of Floyd county any power to make such a contract as that sued on; that the result of the contract is to create a relation in the nature of a partnership between the public and a private individual, and to grant to the latter, for purely private purposes, a use and an easement in a public bridge such as is not enjoyed by other individuals; that the use and easement would, by operation of universally known natural laws, inevitably and constantly tend to injure and destroy the bridge and to impair its usefulness for public travel, and thereby to create a public nuisance.

By the state Constitution (article 11, § 1, par. 1; Civ. Code 1895, § 5924) "each county shall be a body corporate, with such powers and limitations as may be prescribed by law"; and by article 6, § 19, par. 1 (Civ. Code 1895, § 5879), "the General Assembly shall have power to provide for the creation of county commissioners in such counties as may require them, and to define their duties." The Constitution of 1868 contained a similar provision as to county commissioners. It has been held, under these sections, that neither counties nor county commissioners possess any powers unless expressly conferred by, or fairly to be implied from, such statutes as may be passed in relation thereto. Albany Bottling Co. v. Watson, 103 Ga. 503, 30 S. E. 270. It is therefore necessary to consider what statutes have been passed upon this subject. By act of December 13, 1871 (Laws Ga. 1871-72, p. 225), the board of county commissioners of Floyd county was established. By the fourth section (page 226) of this act it is provided: "That said board shall have exclusive jurisdiction, when sitting for county purposes, over the following subject-matters: In governing and controlling all property of the county, as they may deem expedient, according to law; * * * in establishing, altering, and abolishing all roads, bridges, and ferries, in conformity to law." The fifth section of the same act confers upon them all the powers possessed by the justices of the inferior court prior to the adoption of the Constitution of 1868, so far as related to county matters; and this, by reference, gave them the jurisdiction "to appoint the places for the erection of public bridges, county ferries, turnpikes, and causeways, and to make suitable provision for their erection and repairs, by letting them out to the lowest bidder, hiring hands, or in any other way that may be for the public good and agreeable to law" (Code 1868, § 710; and see Pol. Code 1895, § 602); also "to sit at any time as a court for county purposes and for the exercise of any power they possess as a quasi corporation contradistinguished from their power as a court"; and also "to exercise such other powers as are granted by law or are indispensable to their jurisdiction" (Code 1868, § 347; and see Pol. Code 1895, § 4240). At the time this contract was made the alternative road law was in effect in Floyd county, and therefore section 576, subds. 3, 4, of the Political Code of 1895, may be applicable, as follows: "They [referring to the county commissioners] may have said roads worked, improved, or repaired, by contracting for the same in such manner as they may deem fit, with private parties or corporations; provided, that if the work is done by contract, the contractors shall be required to employ the chain-gang, if established, and the labor of those who do not pay the commutation tax, and to pay for the same. They may employ or combine any or all of said three above-mentioned methods, or may use any other method or system that may be desired for accomplishing the work necessary to put and keep the public roads in good condition." It should be remembered, in this connection, that by Pol. Code 1895, § 5, the word "road" wherever it appears in a statute, includes all bridges thereon, unless the context requires a different construction.

These statutes manifestly purport to confer upon the county commissioners a jurisdiction, coupled with some considerable degree of discretion, over all road matters, including bridges, and the erection and maintenance thereof. Dillon on Municipal Corporations (section 445), taking up the contractual powers of counties, cities, towns, etc., in regard to those matters over which they are given jurisdiction by statute, asserts: "Public corporations may by their officers and properly authorized agents make contracts the same as individuals and other corporations, in matters that necessarily appertain to the corporation. Being artificial persons, they cannot contract in any other way." And, further (section 447): "The authority to enter into contracts necessary and proper to carry into effect their powers and discharge their duties is impliedly given to every such corporation." Tiedeman on Municipal Corporations, § 163, speaking on the same subject, says they "may, unless restricted by charter or state statute, enter into any contract which may be necessary to the execution of the powers and functions conferred. * * * The general power to contract in furtherance of corporate purposes is inherent in all classes of corporations, both public and private. * * * Municipal corporations have all the powers of ordinary persons in regard to the contracts they are authorized to make, except when specially restricted." We will not be unmindful, in this connection, that counties, although they are corporations, are not for many purposes to be considered as standing upon the same footing with ordinary municipal corporations, such as cities and towns (Millwood v. DeKalb County, 106 Ga. 743, 32 S. E. 577, and cases cited), yet we believe that the measure of their contractual capacity, in relation to any subject-matter expressly conferred by statute, is not different from that of other public corporations. The fact that counties, which have had corporate entity thrust upon them by compulsory enactment, are not held to the same degree of liability for neglecting to perform their corporate duties as are those public corporations which have in a sense sought charters, with concurrent privileges and responsibilities, does not abridge the power of the former to execute, through contract or otherwise, the powers actually conferred, in as full and ample a manner as might the latter class of corporations under similar circumstances. We conclude, therefore, that the statements quoted above from the eminent text-writers may be relied upon as correctly declaring the contractual powers of counties in this state.

In Justices v. Plank Road Co., 9 Ga. 485, our Supreme Court, speaking of the inferior court, which at that time was exercising the powers of the present county commissioners, said: "They are the agents of the county for many purposes. They are authorized by law to lay out and open roads. * * * They are the supervisors and managers of the property of the county—its courthouse, jail, and public bridges, for example. They impose the county taxes, etc. These powers characterize them as agents; and for the purpose of their agency they are collectively a corporation with limited powers. The right to sue, etc., is incidental to their agency." In Justices v. Smith, 13 Ga. 504, it is said: "The justices of the inferior court are the agents and trustees for the control and management of various public interests in the county of which they are officers. Among these are the funds for the education of the poor. For the purposes of this agency, as this court has held in the case of Justices v. Plank Road Company, they are collectively, a corporation with limited powers. As such, it would seem a fair and legitimate inference that in managing these funds, which they are required by law to receive and disburse by their agents, they have authority to require a bond from any one, as a condition on which they intrust him, as their agent, with the management and disbursement of the fund; and also that as such agent, in their quasi corporate character, they have the right to bring suit upon such bond, in case of breach thereof." These early cases give recognition to the implied contractual power of the county authorities as to matters within their jurisdiction. In Pennington v. Gammon, 67 Ga. 456, the doctrine of implied powers is given even more explicit recognition. In that case the court held: "Any county may organize a chain gang, to be composed of convicts, who may be employed in working on the roads, streets, or other public works. The power to make provision for their safe-keeping and for their constant and diligent employment was vested originally in the ordinaries, and is now vested, in some counties, in county commissioners. Such powers include the right to use those means and incur those expenses which may be reasonably necessary for their execution, not exceeding the constitutional limit. Hence county commissioners may incur a debt * * * for the purchase of necessary tools or implements, not exceeding the limit set by the Constitution." In the opinion in that case the following language appears: "It is not contended that the amount to be borrowed exceeds the constitutional limit. But it is insisted that $1,500 of this money is to be used in the purchase of a rock crusher and engine, and that no law has been passed authorizing such an increase of debt, and that no election has been held for that purpose. It is true that no law has been passed authorizing the commissioners to purchase the specific articles named; but there is a law authorizing the employment of the chain gang on the public roads, and the right to provide the necessary implements with which to do the work must of necessity follow. There is no law authorizing the purchase of spades, shovels, hoes, axes, or anything else needed, yet it would hardly be insisted that the right to purchase them did not exist. And if the commissioners should consider that the best and most economical method of working the public roads was to macadamize them, no legal reason has been given to us why they might not purchase such implements as would be needed and employ the chain gang in that way. We cannot see that the cost of the article to be purchased can affect the right to buy, so long as it does not exceed the limit of the amount they may have the power to levy, or the amount they are authorized to borrow to supply deficiencies in the revenues; and in this limitation lies the protection to the taxpayer." In Carruth v. Wagener, 114 Ga. 740, 40 S. E. 700, it was held that, under the legislative grant of authority to build a courthouse, the county commissioners might let a contract for the erection of the foundations only, "regardless of whether the county has or has not made a complete contract for the erection of the entire structure." Thus, step by step, we trace in our decisions recognition of the doctrine that, where the power is given to the county authorities to effect a given end, the power to contract for the means whereby the end is to be effected is implicit, and also that the details of such contracts, except so far as the law or public policy prescribes or prohibits some particular form, are left to their discretion. Therefore the county commissioners of Floyd county, being vested by statute with the jurisdiction of building and repairing bridges, and therefore with the implicit power to build them and repair them in such manner and under such form of contract as their discretion might might be presented; but, as we construe it merely to give Wright the privilege to join his dam to the piers so long as the bridge is maintained, no such proposition is before us.

We cannot, in light of the record, hold that the contract is contrary to public policy, for that the erection of the dam would tend to injure, and impair the usefulness and safety of the bridge for public travel, because evidence was submitted on this issue, and the trial court found to the contrary. While we do not think that public policy would allow the county authorities to barter away the safety of the highway, still, in the nature of things, much must be left to the discretion of the local authorities in determining what will or what will not be safe. We hardly think that the mere fact that the public convenience might be slightly discommoded in times of freshets and unduly high water would be sufficient ground for declaring the contract void. The inconvenience must be substantial. Nor is the fact that the dam may cause it to be more expensive to maintain the bridge a reason for declaring the contract invalid. This feature relates to interest of the county in the bridge, as distinguished from that of the public; and as to such interest the county commissioners have the power to contract. This distinction is brought out in the case of Justices v. Plank Road Co., 9 Ga. 486, as follows: "The easement in a public road is a property, in equity, belonging to the county at whose expense it is constructed. It is subject to use by the public at large; hence, as I before have said, it appertains to the public. Yet this is not inconsistent with the idea of an equitable interest or property in the county. The public use may be considered as a limitation upon the property. The interest which a county has in a public highway springs equitably out of the fact that that county, and not the whole public, have paid the costs of construction. The right to lay out and open the road is derived from the inferior court, acting under the Legislature. The easement is a legislative grant. The people of the county make the grant available by the outlay which is necessary to open the road; and, so long as the grant is unrevoked, the road—that is, the easement—is an interest or property in the county. The inferior courts are the depositories of this property, as well as any other. It is their duty to protect it, as much so as to protect the courthouse, and, if it is violated, they have the right, as the agents or trustees of the county, to go into a court of equity for redress."

On this particular phase of the question the case of Hanbury v. Woodward Lumber Co., 98 Ga. 60, 28 S. E. 477, is squarely in point. Certain citizens residing in West End, Atlanta, attempted to enjoin the Woodward Lumber Company from laying, with the permission of the municipal authorities, a private railway track across a public street in which the lumber company owned the fee; the contention being made that the track and the moving of cars thereon rendered the public use of the highway inconvenient and unsafe. The Supreme Court said: "To what extent the owner of the fee may appropriate to his own use those other incidental rights not conflicting with the public use is necessarily a matter resting primarily with the city authorities, and is referable to the broad discretionary powers conferred upon them in the conduct and management of the public ways. He may be permitted to lay gas and water pipes or drains under the roadway, and do many other acts for his own advantage, provided the use of the public is not impaired. Whether or not such uses could be enjoyed without prejudice to the public right is, as we have said, primarily a matter for the consideration of the city authorities, and, if they conceive that the proposed right of the abutting lot owner may be safely exercised without exposing to inconvenience or jeopardy the easement of the public, an injunction against the exercise of such right, at the suit of private citizens not owners of property abutting upon the portion of the street sought to be devoted to the particular private use, will not be granted. In respect to this matter the authorities represent the public, and their consent is a sufficient warrant for upholding the judgment that the entry of the owner of the fee was not per se wrongful. In the present case the parties sought to be enjoined were, the one a railroad company, the other a manufacturing company. They owned lots opposite each other and abutting on the street in question. The latter desired the construction of a spur track, so as to connect the two lots and thus give it connection with the other company's railroad. They each agreed to this, and the municipal authorities consented, by resolution declaring that the public would suffer no inconvenience from the construction of the proposed track. We think, inasmuch as the city authorities held only an easement to the extent of a right of way, that there was no abuse by them of their discretion in allowing the owners of the fee the uses of the street for the purposes above mentioned. It was a valuable right to the owner of the lot. Proper precautions were taken to protect the interests of the public, and there is no reason why he should have been deprived of that right. Of course, we cannot undertake to say that the proposed track may not hereafter, either because of the manner of its construction or the manner of its use, become a nuisance and subject to abatement as such. An increase in population or travel may bring about such a result. But under the present record we hold that in favor of the owner of the fee in the street the city authorities had the power to authorize a joint enjoyment of the property, and that their discretion was not abused when it was determined that the proposed use by the owner of the fee was not inconsistent with the exercise by the public of its dominant right of way."

We have been led into this lengthy discussion of this case, not only by the able and earnest arguments which were presented pro and con, but also on account of the public character of the interesting questions involved; and, after considering the matter in its various phases, we hold that the contract is legal, and that the judgment rendered is correct.

Judgment, on the main bill of exceptions, affirmed; cross-bill dismissed.

MUTUAL LIFE INS. CO. v. STEGALL.
(No. 136.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. April 20, 1907.)

1. INSURANCE—TERM AND DURATION OF RISK—LIFE POLICY.

A petition brought to recover on a policy of life insurance, which shows, on its face and by its exhibits, that the policy was issued and bore date August 30, 1904, that the first premium was paid, that the condition of liability to pay the amount named in the policy was that annual premiums of a named amount should be paid in advance on August 30th in each year thereafter, that the insured did not accept the policy nor pay the first premium thereon until November 19, 1904, that no premium was thereafter paid, and that the insured died October 29, 1906, as against a general demurrer on that ground, sets out no cause of action.

2. SAME.

The contention that, under a policy such as above described, payment of the first premium and acceptance of the policy November 19, 1904, had the effect of continuing the policy in force for one year from that date, is unsound as a matter of law.

3. SAME.

A stipulation in a written application for a policy of life insurance to the effect that the contract to be issued thereunder shall not take effect until the first premium is paid is one for the benefit of the insurer; and when in response to such application the insurer accepts the same, and in due course issues a policy of which such application becomes a part, with conditions as above set out, and the insured afterwards accepts the policy and pays the first premium thereon, he must, in order to keep the policy in force, comply with its terms as to future payments of premiums.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Bainbridge; Harrell, Judge.

Action by Mrs. Claude Stegall against Mutual Life Insurance Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

James H. Gilbert and Pottle & Glessner, for plaintiff in error. A. E. Thornton and Russell & Hawes, for defendant in error.

LITTLEJOHN, J. The issues submitted for our consideration were raised by the refusal of the trial judge to sustain certain demurrers filed by the Mutual Life Insurance Company to a petition which Mrs. Claude Stegall filed in the city court of Bainbridge, seeking a recovery, in the aggregate of $5,000, on two policies of life insurance which the insurance company had theretofore issued on the life of her deceased husband, M. J. C. Stegall, and in each of which she was named as the sole beneficiary. There was a general demurrer that no cause of action was set out, and there were special demurrers to the alleged infirmities in particular paragraphs of the petition. As, however, we dispose of the case made by the petition on its merits, under the general demurrer, adversely to the contention of the plaintiff in the court below, it is not necessary that the grounds of special demurrer shall be considered or passed on. So far as it is necessary to determine the legal questions involved, the case made by the petition will appear in the following statement, which is compiled from the petition and the exhibits which were made a part thereof: On August 1, 1904, Martin J. Crawford Stegall made application to the Mutual Life Insurance Company of New York for the issuance of two policies on his life, one for $3,000 and the other for $2,000, containing, among other things, the clause: "Which [contract] I hereby agree to and accept, and which shall not take effect until the first premium shall have been paid during my continuance in good health and the policy shall have been signed by the secretary of the company and issued." On this application the policies were issued, duly executed, and bore date August 30, 1904. The body of each of the policies contains a promise to pay the plaintiff below, if living, etc., $3,000 under one of said policies, $2,000 under the other, upon acceptance of satisfactory proofs of the death of Martin J. Crawford Stegall "during the continuance of this policy, upon the following condition, and subject to the provisions, requirements, and benefits stated on the back of this policy, which are hereby referred to and made a part hereof: The annual premium [stating the amount] shall be paid in advance on the delivery of this policy, and thereafter to the company at its head office in the city of New York on the 30th day of August in every year during the continuance of this contract. The receipt of the first payment of premium hereon is acknowledged." Among the provisions on the back of each policy is the following: "Notice. No person, except an executive officer of the company or its secretary at the head office in New York, has the power on behalf of the company to make, modify, or alter this contract, to extend the time for paying a premium, to bind the company by making any promise or by accepting any representation or information not contained in the application for this contract." Touching the payment of premiums on these policies, the petitioner alleges that "on November 19, 1904, petitioner's husband [M. J. C. Stegall, the insured] paid the premium on said policies to T. E. Morgan, defendant's agent, who received said application, by executing and delivering to said agent his two promissory notes, both dated November 19, 1904 [for the stipulated yearly premiums], said Martin J. Crawford Stegall being at the time in good health, said notes paying the premiums on said policies for one year from the date of their execution and delivery," and that, "upon the execution and delivery of the said two notes, said policies of insurance were delivered to the said Martin J. Crawford Stegall, and from that date were effective." The petition alleges, further, that on October 29, 1905, "during the continuance of said policies," the plaintiff's husband, Martin J. Crawford Stegall, was shot and killed. The further allegations are made that proofs of death were duly made and that the insurance company denied its liability and refused to pay.

In support of the judgment rendered in the court below, counsel for the defendant in error insist, as a matter of law, that notwithstanding the policies of insurance bear date August 30, 1904, and provide that the annual premium to continue the policies in force shall be paid on August 30th in each year, yet, as the policies provide that they shall not become effective until the payment of the first premium and the delivery of the policies thereunder, it follows that, inasmuch as the premiums were not paid on the policies nor those writings delivered until November 19, 1904, the policies became effective on that day; that the date in the policies, by consent of parties, was changed to the day of payment and delivery of the policies, and, the premiums paying for insurance by the year, such payment held the policies in force until November 19, 1905, and, the insured having died on October 29, 1905, the beneficiary, by her petition, shows a right of recovery. We find one fatal defect in this line of reasoning. It is not in accord with the letter or the spirit of the policies. To maintain the right of recovery under the allegations of the petition, life insurance must primarily be treated as a subject of bargain and sale. As such it is frequently referred to. Yet it is not a chattel. It is not merchandise. Its object bears no relation to ordinary instances of bargain and sale, where the purchaser parts with his money for its equivalent in a material thing of intrinsic value to him; and, if it be a subject of bargain and sale at all, it is only so in a qualified and limited sense. For ourselves we prefer to treat life insurance from the standpoint of our Civil Code of 1895 (section 2114), as a contract by which the insurer, for a stipulated sum, engages to pay a certain amount of money if another dies within the time limited by the policy. As a contract, all of its material terms and conditions must be observed and complied with, either to create a right or a liability. Not only is it a contract, but, to be a valid one, it must be in writing. Civ. Code 1895, §§ 2117, 2089. Hence the terms and conditions of it are fixed and easily ascertainable. A policy of life insurance (in this case at least) is not the whole contract. The insured made an application in writing for the two policies, which were issued. That and the policies issued constituted the contract. The contract on which the plaintiff sues, and only on the terms of which she, in any event, can recover, contains a broad stipulation in the shape of a notice that only an executive officer or its secretary at its head office in New York has the power to modify or alter the contract, or to extend the time of paying the premium, or to bind the company by making any promises. No allegation is made that any change of the kind indicated was had. Consequently the rights of the parties are to be fixed by the original written contract. This (and both parties to the suit are equally bound by it) makes a condition precedent to the liability to pay on the death of the insured that the annual premiums shall be paid in advance on delivery of the policy, and thereafter on the 30th day of August in every year during the continuance of the contract. Certainly the contemplation of the parties was that the policies for which the insured applied should have a date from which the insurance should commence. None was fixed in the application, except that the company was asked to issue the policies and the insured agreed to accept them when issued. The application was made on August 1st. Thirty days afterwards the policies were issued in New York, and bore date August 30, 1904, and carried insurance on the life of Stegall from that date, thus making the year of insurance end on August 30, 1905. It is true that the insured did not receive the policies until November 19, 1904, and it is equally true that the company was not bound, under the terms of the contract, until he had paid the premium and received the policies. He asked for the insurance on August 1st, and agreed to accept the policies and pay the premiums when issued. The company accepted his application and furnished the contracts on August 30th. He did not then receive them, but let them lie dormant until November 19th. He then paid for them, and accepted the policies as they stood, carrying insurance back from August 30th, and stipulating that, to keep the policies in force, the next annual premium must be paid August 30, 1905. He asked for no change. None was made. He knew what he received. His beneficiary stands to-day on the contracts containing these stipulations. Nothing can be clearer to our minds than that, on failure to pay the annual premiums provided for on August 30, 1905, the policies lapsed, and were not in force at the time of the death of the insured, October 29, 1905. Under our positive law in relation to life insurance, a policy runs from midday of the date of the policy, and the time must be estimated accordingly if a policy is limited to a specified number of years. Civ. Code 1895, § 2119.

We were referred to a decision in the case of Methvin v. Fidelity Mutual Life Insurance Association (Cal.) 58 Pac. 387, as an authority to sustain the judgment of the court below. That decision, however, was not final; a rehearing being granted, on which the three justices who in department had rendered the decision joined with the other members of the court in bank in a unanimous decision which is in full accord with what we now decide. 129 Cal. 251, 61 Pac. 1112. In that case the policy was dated July 30, 1895, and called for quarterly premiums beginning on that date, and provided that it should not be binding until delivered and the first premium paid, and on failure to pay any premium when due the policy should be "ipso facto nul and void." The policy was not delivered nor the first premium paid until September 8d. The insured died after October 30, 1895, without paying the second quarterly premium. The holding of the Supreme Court of California is that the policy became void prior to the death of the insured, since the second quarterly premium became due October 30, 1895.

The court erred in overruling the general demurrer.

Judgment reversed.

Judge LITTLEJOHN, of the Southwestern circuit, Judge ROAN, of the Stone Mountain circuit, and Judge HAMMOND, of the Augusta circuit, were designated to preside instead of the judges of this court, who were disqualified.

SOUTHERN RY. CO. v. ROSENHEIM & SONS. (No. 301.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. May 9, 1907.)

1. CARRIERS—LOSS OF BAGGAGE—ACTION—DECLARATION.

A declaration against a railway company, merely alleging the delivery of certain trunks and their contents into its custody and a failure to redeliver, but not alleging that the trunks were to be transported or carried as baggage or otherwise, does not set out a cause of action against the railway company as a carrier of baggage, but only as a warehouseman or a depository.

2. SAME—LOSS BY FIRE.

One who, having been a passenger, arrives with his baggage at destination, surrenders his checks, opens up the trunks in the baggage room, and afterwards leaves the trunks in the baggage room by permission of the baggage clerk, upon a statement that he will be going off again next day and will then recheck them, cannot hold the railway company responsible as a carrier of baggage, for the destruction of the trunks by fire during the night.

(a) The transaction, if not merely a personal one between the owner of the trunks and the baggage clerk, charges the railway company with no higher responsibility than that of a depository.

(b) This is so notwithstanding the owner of the trunks may have been the holder of a mileage book, good for transportation on the railway company's trains.

58 S.E.—6

Error from City Court of Savannah; Norwood, Judge.

Action by Rosenheim & Sons against the Southern Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Osborne & Lawrence and Edmund H. Abrahams, for plaintiff in error. Garrard & Mel-drim, for defendants in error.

POWELL, J. 1. Rosenheim & Sons sued the Southern Railway Company and recovered a verdict. The plaintiffs' declaration, omitting merely formal parts, is as follows: "(1) That the Southern Railway is a railroad corporation, having an office and agent for the transaction of its usual and customary business in the city of Savannah, county of Chatham, and state of Georgia. (2) That on the 6th day of February, 1905, the said defendant then was and still is a common carrier of passengers for hire, and as such common carrier of passengers for hire had, on the 7th day of February, 1905, its depot at Waynesville, in the state of North Carolina. (3) That on said 7th day of February, 1905, at Waynesville, in the state of North Carolina, in consideration that the plaintiffs would deliver to the defendant certain goods of the plaintiffs (more fully set out in an inventory hereunto annexed, marked 'Exhibit A') to be by the defendant safely and securely kept and redelivered to the plaintiffs on request, the said defendant promised the plaintiffs safely and securely to keep the said goods and to redeliver the same to the plaintiffs on request, and the plaintiffs delivered to the defendant and the defendant received the said goods for the purpose and on the terms aforesaid, and the plaintiffs afterwards, and within a reasonable time in that behalf, requested the defendant to redeliver the same to the plaintiffs, and all conditions were performed, and all things happened, and all times elapsed necessary to entitle the plaintiffs to have the said goods safely and securely kept and redelivered by the defendant to the plaintiffs as aforesaid; yet the defendant did not safely and securely keep the same and redeliver the same to the plaintiffs as aforesaid, whereby the said goods were wholly lost to the plaintiffs, to the damage of the plaintiffs in the sum of $491.02, besides interest." Wherefore judgment is prayed, etc. The plaintiffs contend that this declaration sets out a case of liability against the defendant for a breach of its duty as a common carrier by the loss of a passenger's baggage, and insist that it is apt in form and substance for that purpose. The able and experienced attorney who appeared for the plaintiffs in this court also claims that the declaration is substantially in the form prescribed by Chitty. We think it plain that it sets out no such cause of action. It does not allege that the goods were delivered for the purpose of being carried by the defendant; and this is an es-essential allegation of Chitty's form in such actions. Chitty on Pleadings, *356. The suit, as we are constrained to view the declaration, is merely for a breach of a contract of bailment.

2. The evidence was likewise insufficient to sustain a verdict holding defendant liable as for the loss of passenger's baggage. Adams was a traveling salesman for Rosenheim & Sons. He lived at Waynesville, N. C. He arrived there on the defendant's train, Sunday afternoon, February 5, 1905, and with him came his trunks as baggage. The next morning he surrendered the checks, took charge of the trunks, opened them up in the depot, and sold a customer a bill of goods from the samples contained therein. He did not take the trunks away, but left them in the storage room of the depot, telling the agent, who also performed the duties of baggage clerk, that he would be going off again next morning to Addie, or to some other place west, and that he would leave them in the storage room over night and check them the next morning. The train next morning was due at 9:15 o'clock. That night the depot was burned, and the trunks and their contents were thereby destroyed. Adams had a mileage book, good on the Southern Railway. The trunks and their contents belonged to Rosenheim & Sons. The court charged the jury that under these circumstances, if the agent consented to the trunks remaining in the depot overnight, the company would be liable, unless the fire was occasioned by act of God. At common law, as well as by the law of this state, no excuse avails a carrier for the loss of the baggage of one who sustains it in the relation of passenger, except act of God, irresistible accident, or destruction by public enemy. Civ. Code 1895, § 2280; Dibble v. Brown, 12 Ga. 217, 56 Am. Dec. 460. A similar rule prevails in North Carolina. See Revisal 1905, § 2624. For baggage in possession of the carrier, and not within the protection of the above rule, the liability of the carrier is that of a depository for hire (warehouseman), with the duty of only ordinary diligence, or that of a naked depository, with responsibility attaching only in a case of gross negligence, according to the circumstances of the case. Georgia R. Co. v. Thompson, 86 Ga. 328, 12 S. E. 640. See, also, Civ. Code 1895, §§ 2921, 2922, 2923. We presume that the same rule prevails in North Carolina, as it is a matter of general law. If there has been no delivery to the carrier, but his agent, without authority, agrees to take care of the baggage as a matter of accommodation, the agent pro hac is the agent of the owner of the baggage, and not of the carrier, and no responsibility against the latter attaches to the transaction. Georgia R. Co. v. Thompson, supra. A baggage clerk has implied authority to receive baggage on behalf of the carrier only for a reasonable time prior to the departure of the train on which it is to be carried. Hutch.

Carr. (3d Ed.) § 1256; Lake Shore Ry. Co. v. Foster, 104 Ind. 315, 4 N. E. 20, 54 Am. Rep. 319.

From the instructions to the jury, appearing in the record, it is manifest that the trial court entertained the view that because Adams had a mileage book, good on the defendant's lines of railway, he was entitled to the rights of a passenger as to these trunks and their contents. Let us see if any such relation was sustained. "The owner of the property must, of course, stand in relation of passenger to the carrier, in order to fix upon him liability as a carrier of baggage. The carriage of the baggage is ex vi termini incidental to the carriage of the owner as a passenger." Hutch. Carr. (3d Ed.) § 1274; Atlanta Terminal Co. v. American Baggage Co., 125 Ga. 677, 54 S. E. 711. "The passenger has the right to deliver his baggage to the carrier such time before the starting of the train upon which he intends to take passage as may be reasonably necessary for obtaining a ticket and checking the baggage. From the time delivery is thus made, the carrier will be responsible for its safety as a common carrier. If, however, an earlier delivery to the carrier be made, his custody will be that of a warehouseman only, unless he has consented to hold it subject to his common-law liability. But the question as to when the carrier's liability as such with respect to baggage will begin will frequently depend upon his custom or manner of doing business at the particular station where it is received, and in order to impose upon the carrier the liability of an insurer of the baggage, it must be delivered to and accepted by an agent who is authorized to receive it, or delivery must be made under such circumstances that an acceptance by the carrier will be implied." Hutch. Carr. (3d Ed.) § 1281. The mere fact that one has a ticket, or that he has paid the price of transportation, or that he has made a contract of carriage, does not render him in all cases a passenger. He must have submitted himself to the carrier's protection and have imposed upon himself an obligation to the carrier for performance of his own side of the contract of carriage. "But so long as the party merely entertains the wish or intention, no obligation has arisen on either side, and he is at liberty to change that intention at any moment." Hutch. Carr. (3d Ed.) § 1015; Webster v. Fitchburg R. Co., 161 Mass. 298, 37 N. E. 156, 24 L. R. A. 521, and cases cited in the footnote; Central R. Co. v. Perry, 58 Ga. 461. In the Webster Case the person alleged to be a passenger had a 10-trip ticket, which establishes a similarity to this case, wherein Adams had a mileage book.

We think it manifest that Adams did not, under the facts stated, place or intend to place himself under the obligations of a passenger at the time he left the baggage in the depot. His intention to do so on the morrow did not place the carrier under the immediate duty. He did not ask for a check for his baggage then, although the North Carolina statute prescribes that "a check shall be affixed to every parcel of baggage when taken for transportation by the agent of a railroad company, and a duplicate thereof given to the passenger." Revisal 1905, § 2623. If the agent had checked the baggage, the carrier would have had a lien upon it, not only for the freight thereon, but also for the owner's transportation to the point to which it was checked. Adams was not in a position at that time to make a definite contract on this subject; for he had not then decided whether he was going to Addie, or to some other place, on the next morning. It is true he had a mileage book, and that he was in a position to claim transportation for himself on the company's trains, and to have his baggage placed in the company's responsibility a reasonable time in advance of the departure of the train on which he should elect to travel; but the mere possession of this mileage book did not hold him in the relation of a passenger, wherever he might be, but only at such times and under such circumstances as it was reasonable for the relation to be regarded as existing. What a mileage book is falls within common knowledge. It may be that prior to the enactment of our anti-pass law the judiciary of this state did not have sufficient personal information as to mileage books to take accurate judicial cognizance of them; but now the judges share with the general public this common knowledge. A mileage book is a contract of carriage, having attached thereto coupons, one for every mile; each coupon being in two parts, one part for the passenger's fare, the other for his baggage. When the baggage is checked, the baggage portion of sufficient coupons, according to the distance, is torn off; and no more baggage can be checked upon the mileage book until the remainder of these coupons, representing the carriage of the passenger, has been detached. This explains why Adams naturally did not wish to check his baggage before he definitely decided where he was going. It would have cost him something to have changed his mind or to have abandoned the trip. It was not bad business judgment for him, under the circumstances, to leave the trunks in the care of the depot agent overnight at his own risk, instead of placing them in the company's care and paying for the resulting protection by a surrender of baggage coupons out of his mileage book; but, having taken this risk, neither he nor his employers, who actually owned the trunks and their contents, but who must claim through him, can now charge the railway company with a liability which he was unwilling to pay them to assume. Applying the facts as they appear in the record to the law as we find it, we are constrained to hold that the transaction was either a personal one between Adams and the station agent, or, if there was enough in the circumstances to make the agent's custody that of the railway company, the latter held the trunks as a mere naked depository; and in neither event is the railway company liable for the loss, no gross negligence appearing. Judgment reversed.

GLENN v. WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH CO. (No. 67.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. March 2, 1907.)

1. TELEGRAPHS—FAILURE TO DELIVER MESSAGE—ACTION BY WIFE—DAMAGES.

As a wife cannot maintain an action to recover the earnings of her husband, it follows that she cannot recover damages for wages or salary he might have earned but for a defendant's tort or negligence. Consequently an allegation that "by reason of defendant's negligence aforesaid she was specially injured and damaged * * * the amount of his salary for 12½ months as a member of the police force, which her husband would have received and contributed to the support of his family * * * but for the defendant's negligence aforesaid," was properly stricken on demurrer.

2. DAMAGES—MENTAL ANGUISH.

Under the decisions in Chapman v. Western Union Telegraph Company, 15 S. E. 901, 17 L. R. A. 430, 30 Am. St. Rep. 183, 88 Ga. 763, and Giddens v. Western Union Telegraph Company, 35 S. E. 638, 111 Ga. 824, there can be no recovery in this state for mere mental pain and anguish; and this court is bound by these decisions. This court, however, does not, on principle, approve the doctrine therein, but yields to these decisions only because by law it is obliged so to do, and respectfully suggests legislation upon this subject.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 15, Damages, § 100.]

3. TELEGRAPHS—FAILURE TO DELIVER MESSAGE—NOMINAL DAMAGES.

It was error to sustain a general demurrer to, and dismiss, a petition which set forth a breach of contract implied from public duty on the part of defendant, and which, if proved, would entitle the plaintiff to recover nominal damages, if no more.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Macon; Hodges, Judge.

Action by Mattie J. Glenn against the Western Union Telegraph Company. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

Nottingham & McClellan, for plaintiff in error. Joseph H. Hall and Warren Roberts, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. The plaintiff in error filed the following petition:

"Mattie J. Glenn, hereinafter designated as 'plaintiff,' against the Western Union Telegraph Company, hereinafter designated as 'defendant,' brings this complaint, and to this honorable court respectfully sheweth as follows, to wit:

"(1) Defendant is a corporation engaged in the operation of a system of telegraph lines through various sections of this country, embracing, among other fields covered, the territory in, through, and from the cities of Macon, state of Georgia, to Memphis, state of Tennessee, and was such corporation and so engaged on the occasion and dates hereinafter named.

"(2) The business of defendant as it so was on the dates hereinafter specified is the immediate transmission and delivery of intelligence from point to point on its various lines by electricity; said defendant holding itself out to the public as undertaking, for hire at such rates and charges as it fixed, to promptly transmit and deliver such messages as may be delivered to it.

"(3) Defendant is and was, on dates and occasions hereinafter named, conducting its said business in said county of Bibb, state of Georgia, aforesaid, and has, and on said dates and occasions had, in said state and county an agent, an agency, and a place of business.

"(4) Defendant has injured and damaged plaintiff in the full sum and amount of $3,000, in manner and form and by reason of facts hereinafter set forth, for that:

"(5) For many years prior to the 18th day of July, in the year 1903, plaintiff, together with her husband, R. E. Glenn, her children, and her mother, was a resident citizen of the city of Macon aforesaid, where her said family lived happily, being lovingly provided for by her said husband, his only source of revenue being his position as a member of the police force of said city, at a monthly salary of $70; said income being the only means of living possessed by said family.

"(6) On said last-named date her said husband, in a remarkable and unusual spirit of anger, left his home and family; and for a period of about nine months remained so absented.

"(7) Two days after her said husband's departure, plaintiff received through defendant, by its messenger boy, a telegram from her husband, of which the following is a copy: 'Memphis, Tenn., July 20, 1903. Mrs. R. E. Glenn, 202 Cole St., Macon, Ga. Have just gotten right see mayor about job, answer at my expense care Western Union Telegraph Co. R. E. Glenn. 2:40 p. m.'

"(8) On the envelope inclosing said message was written by defendant's agent in said Macon, Ga., these words: 'Please send reply by bearer.'

"(9) Plaintiff then and there immediately penned the following reply to her husband's said telegram: 'Macon, Ga. July 20, 1903. R. E. Glenn, care Western Union Telegraph Co., Memphis, Tenn. Job all right. Moseley just left and told me so. Been in bed two days. Thank God you are coming. Hun.'

"(10) Plaintiff, having ascertained that her said husband's said position on the police force was still open for him, wrote the above message, as a reply to said message received from him, gave it to the bearing messenger boy, as instructed, to be delivered to the office and agent of defendant in said city of Macon, for transmission to her said husband.

"(11) Plaintiff confidently expected her said husband to immediately return home upon receipt of her said message answering his; but as the days wore on, and after her husband, as she has since learned, had left Memphis in despair of any reconciliation with her, and hopeless of recovering his said position on the police force, to her consternation and horror she discovered that defendant had negligently failed to transmit her said message within a reasonable time, and in time to reach her said husband while he was yet in the city of Memphis, and in fact had utterly failed to transmit, or even start, said message from said Macon office.

"(12) Long thereafter, some nine months, plaintiff, after having vainly inquired by letters, telegrams, and otherwise, for the whereabouts of her said husband, found that he was in Ft. Worth, Tex., where, in the month of March, 1904, she was enabled to reach him with a letter.

"(13) As soon as her said husband received her letter, and as soon as he could recover from an illness that was then upon him, he promptly returned to his home and family in the said city of Macon, and in a few months thereafter resumed his position on the police force, as aforesaid.

"(14) Had defendant received her said message he would have promptly returned to his home, family, and position.

"(15) After her husband's final return, plaintiff learned for the first time the exact condition of affairs which had for so long cruelly separated her husband from his home and family; learned, and here charges, that for several days after sending his said message to her, to wit, from Monday, July 20, 1903, to the Thursday following, her said husband had literally haunted the office and agency of defendant in the said city of Memphis, visiting same several times day and night, vainly inquiring for an answer to his said message, for which he had prepaid the charges, and finally, in despair of both reconciliation with her and recovering his position in said city of Macon, had gone to other parts of the country in search of work.

"(16) Plaintiff here charges defendant with negligence in failing to transmit her said message to her husband, and charges that said negligence was the proximate cause of depriving her of the companionship, protection, and support which her said husband afforded her and her family when with them.

"(17) Plaintiff charges that the negligence of defendant aforesaid was the direct and proximate cause of her husband's failing to return to his home and family, and his failing to have and hold his said position on the police force of Macon, from the said 20th day of July, 1903, to about the first part of August, 1904, when he was restored to his said position.

"(18) Plaintiff shows that the conduct of defendant, in failing to transmit her said message, which was delivered to defendant about 3 p. m. on the said 20th day of July, 1903, was attended with aggravating circumstances, for which she asks exemplary damages, in addition to the general and special damages she is entitled to recover, under the law and facts.

"(19) Plaintiff shows that the circumstances show that defendant was abundantly put upon notice of the purpose and importance of her message, both to her husband and herself, and submits, as part of the facts bringing home said notice to defendant, the prepayment by her husband of the charge of transmitting her said answer, his information to defendant's agent at Memphis at the time of its importance, the message to her on envelope as aforesaid, and the very wording of her message, as well as the wording of both her husband's and her message.

"(20) Plaintiff shows that because of the negligent conduct of defendant she was forced to endure all the pain and humiliation of an enforced separation from her husband for the long period of time aforesaid, was forced to endure the hardships incident to the withdrawal of his support and his protection of his family, and to endure many other painful things necessarily incident to such a condition of affairs.

"(21) By reason of this absence of her husband, brought about by defendant's negligence as aforesaid, plaintiff was forced to work and struggle to furnish to herself and family that provision and maintenance always theretofore afforded by her husband. Plaintiff, being unused to work of the character she was forced to resort to, in her distressing condition necessarily suffered great humiliation from the bare fact of the necessity.

"(22) In the effort to properly provide for her children during said absence of their father, she was forced to live for a time separate and apart from them, and was thus deprived, not only of the presence, companionship, and comfort of her husband, but of that of her children as well.

"(23) The negligent conduct of defendant aforesaid placed plaintiff in the false and humiliating attitude of a deserted wife, and brought upon her the usual suspicion and unkind things inseparably incident to so unfortunate a condition.

"(24) During said absence of her husband, by reason of defendant's negligence aforesaid, plaintiff was forced to give up her home, in her efforts to provide for her family without the necessary assistance of her husband.

"(25) Plaintiff submits that by reason of defendant's negligence aforesaid she was specially injured and damaged in the sum of $375, the same being the amount of his salary for 12½ months, as a member of the police force, which her husband would have received and contributed to the support of his family, from July 20, 1903, to about August 1, 1904, but for the defendant's negligence aforesaid.

"(26) Plaintiff cannot undertake to describe the mental anguish and suffering endured by her during the said exile of her husband, brought about by defendant's negligence aforesaid.

"(27) Wherefore plaintiff says that defendant has injured and damaged her in the sum of $3,000, for which she prays the judgment of the court, and to that end prays process requiring defendant to appear at the next term of this court to answer this complaint."

The defendant company demurred as follows:

"(1) Said petition sets forth no cause of action against this defendant. The damages claimed do not flow from, nor are they immediately connected with, any act of negligence alleged on the part of this defendant.

"(2) Defendant demurs specially to the twenty-fifth paragraph of said petition, in that it sets forth no cause of action against this defendant, for the reason that the damages therein claimed were not suffered by the plaintiff, but by the plaintiff's husband."

Upon hearing the demurrer, the judge of the city court sustained the same and dismissed the case, with judgment for costs. To this judgment the plaintiff in error, by her bill of exceptions, excepts, and assigns error in that the court erred in not overruling the general demurrer, in not overruling the demurrer setting forth that the alleged damage did not flow from and was not connected with any alleged act of negligence of the defendant, in not overruling the demurrer to the twenty-fifth paragraph of the petition, and in dismissing plaintiff's case.

We think that the court properly sustained the demurrer to the twenty-fifth paragraph of the plaintiff's petition; for it is clear that the damage therein alleged was not sustained by her. She had no interest in the contract mentioned in that paragraph, and was not entitled to maintain an action for it. The salary of her husband as a member of the police force was due and payable to him; and as the obligation to support wife and family is upon the husband, and not upon the wife, if it be true that the plaintiff and her family were deprived of support, the right of action therefor would be in her husband only. But we do not think that all of the damages alleged are so remote as that the general demurrer reaches all of the paragraphs of plaintiff's petition. We are quite sure that the court should not have dismissed the petition upon the ground that it set forth no cause of action, because the allegations of the petition showed a breach of contract by the defendant which entitled plaintiff to recover at least nominal damages. Civ. Code 1895, § 3801. This being true, the cause should not have been dismissed. The Supreme Court has frequently refused to reverse a judgment denying a new trial simply to allow plaintiff an opportunity to recover nominal damages; but such a rule has never been applied to the grant of a nonsuit, where the plaintiff was entitled to recover nominal damages. In Howard v. Dayton Coal & Iron Co., 94 Ga. 416, 20 S. E. 336, it was held that, "the evidence showing that the plaintiff was probably entitled to recover at least nominal damages to vindicate his right, it was error to grant a nonsuit." In this respect the same principle is applicable to the dismissal of an action on demurrer as that applied where a nonsuit has been awarded.

A declaration against a telegraph company, which alleges that the message delivered to the company for transmission was never transmitted, may be amended by striking allegations of damage which are too remote for recovery, and by inserting any new matter amplifying the plaintiff's allegations as to defendant's breach of contract or public duty; and if the petition, after being thus amended, is consistent, and sets forth a cause of action (either as to breach of contract or breach of public duty), such a petition, subject to such amendment, should not be dismissed on general demurrer, though most of the paragraphs of this plaintiff's petition would be subject to be stricken on special demurrer thereto, under the ruling in Chapman v. W. U. Tel. Co., 88 Ga. 763, 15 S. E. 901, 17 L. R. A. 430, 30 Am. St. Rep. 183. The suit in that case was brought to recover damages for mental suffering caused by the company's failure to deliver a message to the addressee. There was also a count for the statutory penalty. The plaintiff obtained a verdict for the penalty, but a demurrer to the counts for special damage, arising from mental pain and anguish suffered by the plaintiff, Chapman, was sustained; and this judgment was affirmed by our Supreme Court. The effect of this decision is to relieve a telegraph company, no matter how flagrant its neglect of duty, no matter how ruthless its violation of its contract, and no matter how harrowing or aggravating may be the results, from any liability whatever, unless there be a money loss—an injury to the person, reputation, or property of the injured party. We are bound by the decision in the Chapman Case as precedent, but we are in no sympathy with the principle upon which it is based or the reasoning by which it is sustained. To our minds it is monstrous that you can recover damages if you sustain loss on your car load of oxen by reason of unreasonable delay or failure to deliver a message relating to this, your property, but if you are summoned to the deathbed of your mother (whose dying blessing you would not exchange for all the cattle upon a thousand hills), and a telegraph company sees fit not to send or deliver the message which might have brought you to her side, you are completely helpless. The decision in the Chapman Case is too ultra material for even this material age, in which the acquisition of wealth seems well-nigh the only yardstick by which individual achievement is measured. It is not only in conflict with a long line of authorities, eminently respectable, and which are supported by consideration of the most mature legal reasons, but it is at variance with sound public policy.

In our opinion, mental pain and anguish should afford good basis for an action for damages, and the jury can safely be trusted to measure the amount. It is useless for us to cite the (to our mind) unanswerable argument afforded by the decisions of the courts of last resort of our sister states, but we are impressed with the necessity for legislative inquiry into this matter. We hope such definite legislative action will be taken at an early date as will entitle a citizen of this state to recover (as in other states) for mental suffering, as well as for pecuniary loss. Whether the default as to the message causes pecuniary loss or mental anguish, a party entitled to sue must be the real party in interest, and must be either a party to the contract or a beneficiary named therein. He may be a party to the contract by being either the sender whose name is signed to the message, or the principal who paid for the message, or by whose order the message was sent; for very frequently the signer of a message is a mere agent or messenger, who is not damaged and cannot recover damages. It is, of course, too well established for discussion that, before there can be a recovery, the telegraph company must have notice that the particular result alleged as the basis of the claim was to be apprehended from delay in transmission or failure to deliver and that there should be notice, also, of the beneficial interest of the particular person who claims compensation for suffering. The purposes for which telegraph companies are created cannot be ignored. Where disappointment, sorrow, and anguish are the natural result of negligence, they must be held to have been contemplated by a telegraph company when its agent received the message and agreed for a stipulated compensation to promptly transmit and cause the same to be delivered. "Otherwise, in a large class of cases most grievous wrongs may be inflicted in matters as vitally affecting the welfare of individuals as in other matters to which a pecuniary value, a market price, can be fixed; and this in disregard of a duty voluntarily assumed to the public, to secure the due performance of which many privileges, not possessed by persons generally, are conferred by the state upon the offending party." Stuart v. W. U. Tel. Co., 66 Tex. 584, 18 S. W. 352, 59 Am. Rep. 623. "Telegraph companies exercise and enjoy special franchises and privileges under the law. The very purpose of their organization is to furnish for compensation the means of rapid and prompt communication. Its use is expensive, and is rarely resorted to except in matters of importance to the parties. Hence the resort to this mode of transmitting information should of itself be held sufficient notice to the company's agents that, as between the sender and the party to whom sent, the message is deemed to be of some importance, unless the contrary is made known by strict information or strong implication, as time is the usual consideration that prompts parties to the use of the wire." So Relle v. W. U. Tel. Co., 55 Tex. 313, 40 Am. Rep. 805. "A telegraph company is essentially public in its duties. Without such public duties there would be neither reason for its creation nor excuse for its continued existence. In fact, being the complement of the postal service, it is one of those great public agencies so important in its nature and far-reaching in its application that some of our wisest statesmen have deemed its continued ownership in private hands a menace to public interests. Hence it follows, both upon reason and authority, that the failure of a telegraph company to promptly and correctly transmit and deliver a message received by it is a breach of a public duty imposed by operation of law. In the words of a great English judge: 'A breach of this duty is a breach of the law, and for this breach an action lies, founded on the common law, which action wants not the aid of a contract to support it.'"

Were it not for the decisions in the Chapman and Giddens Cases, we should unhesitatingly hold that injury to the feelings resulting from mental suffering and anguish constitute ground for general damages, recoverable under a general averment of damage; and though this doctrine of mental anguish in telegraph cases is of comparatively recent origin (having heretofore been deemed contrary to the principles of common law), it must be borne in mind that it must possess inherent merit, for the reason that it has made constant progress, in opposition to the preconceived ideas of courts and jurists. To our minds there is no good reason why mental suffering should be differently treated from physical pain. Indeed, in cases of physical injury the mental suffering is taken into view. Why should it be disregarded because it does not originate from a physical injury or is entirely disconnected from it? As remarked by Justice Lumpkin in the Chapman Case: "On ultimate analysis, all consciousness of pain is a mental experience, and it is only by reference back to its source that one kind is distinguished as mental and another as physical." It is interesting to note how the doctrine, first announced in the cause celebre of So Relle v. Telegraph Co., supra, of recovery of damages for mental anguish, has extended by its acceptance by courts of the greatest erudition. The doctrine has been followed in Texas in more than 50 cases; and in Tennessee, Alabama, Kentucky, Iowa, Louisiana, Nevada, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Washington, so far as our investigation has gone, it has been expressly approved and followed. And while there has been no decision upon the question in New York, so far as telegraph companies are concerned, the Court of Appeals of New York, in the learned opinion in Gillespie v. Railroad Co., 178 N. Y. 347, 70 N. E. 857, 66 L. R. A. 618, 102 Am. St. Rep. 503, unequivocally affirms the principle that a plaintiff can recover for purely mental suffering, without any physical pain whatever, resulting from breach of public duty by a common carrier; and railroad and telegraph companies (considered as corporations organized for public purposes and fixed for a public use) are essentially similar in nature. It has not been decided in Georgia what a telegraph company is. Three different opinions were held by the three members of the Supreme Court in W. U. Tel. Co. v. Fountaine, 58 Ga. 438, 439; but whether a telegraph company be a common carrier (as held by Judge Jackson), a bailee (as held by Chief Justice Warner), or a corporation sui generis engaged in taking and delivering messages, "receiving orders for work and labor and executing them" (as held by Judge Bleckley), the nature and importance of its business with the public, in our opinion, demands that such a corporation should, by appropriate legislation, be required to answer for mental suffering, as well as for pecuniary loss, caused by and due to the acts or omissions of its servants and agents.

The decision in the Chapman Case was not only rendered at a time when a statutory penalty (discussed in the opinion) was of force, but it is distinguishable from the present case in several other respects, which are adverted to therein and which doubtless affected the conclusion reached. The plaintiff in this case was the sender of the message, while Chapman was the party to whom the message was sent; and, in discussing the various decisions upon the subject of recompense for mental anguish, Justice Samuel Lumpkin mentions, as one of the elements of difficulty in determining that case, "whether the person to whom the message is sent, as well as the sender, can recover." 88 Ga. 765, 15 S. E. 901, 17 L. R. A. 430, 30 Am. St. Rep. 183. And again, still discussing the questions of difficulty (p. 766 of 88 Ga., page 901 of 15 S. E.), he says: "Some hold that the sendee also, being the beneficiary of the contract, can maintain the action for its violation." Again, it was not held in the Chapman Case that a plaintiff could not recover nominal damages, but only that the plaintiff in that case could not recover them, for the express reason stated, to wit, that to give nominal damages necessarily denies any further recovery, and in that case the plaintiff already had a verdict for the penalty. And further on it is held, in express terms, that a plaintiff in such a case as this, while she cannot recover for wounded feelings and mental anguish, can recover nominal damages. To quote from the opinion (page 775 of 88 Ga., page 904 of 15 S. E.): "It seems there is no public policy to be subverted by giving damages for mental suffering as a general rule, and the law does not allow it. But it is urged that the public occupation of telegraph companies creates between them and the public a special relation, in which their responsibility is greater than that of other persons. So much of their business and profit is derived from the acceptance of messages involving feelings only that at first view it would seem legitimate and salutary to require them to answer in damages for any dereliction of duty in this important part of their activity. The argument is that in the exercise of a public employment they undertake for hire to serve the feelings of their customers, and therefore ought to pay for negligent nonperformance or misperformance of this peculiar function. This reasoning is unanswerable in so far as it proves a right of action to arise out of the breach of duty." This last sentence unquestionably sustains our view with regard to the error of dismissing the plaintiff's petition in response to the general demurrer. The judge then proceeds to say that the penalty act of 1887 gives a conventional redress of some money value in lieu of mere nominal liability, thus again inferentially referring to one of the considerations which had influenced the decision in that case, to wit, that the plaintiff could not sue at once for the penalty and for nominal damages, as the nominal damages were included in the penalty and the plaintiff benefited thereby.

Unquestionably in this case, according to the allegations of the petition, the telegraph company, by receiving the dispatch, owed the plaintiff a duty the breach of which will support an action for damages. Langley v. W. U. Tel. Co., 88 Ga. 778, 15 S. E. 291. The damages recoverable would be controlled by the law of tort; the contract of the company (implied by acceptance of message) being merely inducement, creating the relation between sender and the company as carrier of the message, and fixing a public duty of the company. Telegraph companies pursue a public employment, and their public duty to a special patron is raised by the contract (implied by the acceptance of the message for transmission and delivery). Gray v. W. U. Tel. Co., 87 Ga. 351, 13 S. E. 562, 14 L. R. A. 95, 27 Am. St. Rep. 259. While not bound as insurers, they, as well as all common carriers, are liable for negligence. In every breach of contract duty, nominal damages (that is to say, general damages) are recoverable, and therefore the court erred in dismissing the present case. Civil Code 1895, § 3801; Lilly v. Boyd, 72 Ga. 83 (1); Kenny v. Collier, 79 Ga. 743, 8 S. E. 58 (1, 2). Deposit of the telegram and failure to transmit being shown, the burden would be upon the company to justify. This petition certainly could resist a general demurrer. It showed a public duty arising out of a contract to transmit the message, assumed by defendant company. It alleged a breach of that duty, growing out of the failure to transmit the message, and thereby imposed on the telegraph company the burden of showing diligence; and the breach of the duty entitled the plaintiff to recover for the tort. The petition met every requirement necessary to charge the company with notice of the relationship of the parties, as well as with actual knowledge of the vital importance of the misplaced message; and, but for the ruling in the Chapman Case, we would unhesitatingly say that if, on the trial of the case, the evidence sustained the allegation, the facts as alleged would justify the imposition of exemplary damages. According to the allegations of the petition there can be no doubt that the failure of the company to perform its duty was the causa causans, the proximate cause, of such mental pain and anguish, as well as inconvenience, as common carriers are well-nigh universally held responsible for in our courts. But, though the plaintiff may not recover this, she is entitled to recover at least nominal damages, and her petition should not have been dismissed.

Judgment reversed.

GEORGIA RY. & ELECTRIC CO. v. BAKER.
(No. 256.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. May 9, 1907.)

1. EVIDENCE—RES GESTÆ—ACTS ACCOMPANYING TRANSACTION.

It is error to allow a witness in an action brought to recover damages for an insult, alleged to have been given on a street car, to testify as to conduct of the conductor subsequent to the transactions alleged in the petition, and disconnected therewith. An objection to such testimony, that it was irrelevant and inadmissible, should have been sustained.

2. TRIAL—CONDUCT—REMARKS OF JUDGE.

While reasonable latitude of expression must be allowed a trial judge in ruling on the admissibility of evidence, still the immediate and positive affirmation by the court of a statement of counsel that a given fact (not relevant to the issues) would be evidence of discourtesy, and which could be well understood by the jury as an expression of an opinion as to the effect of the testimony, was error.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 46, Trial, §§ 439-443.]

3. SAME—INSTRUCTIONS—PROVINCE OF COURT AND JURY—COMMENTS ON EVIDENCE.

It was error, in instructions to the jury, for the court to charge that the Supreme Court had passed upon the fact that the things set out in the declaration made a case in court, and especially where, as a matter of fact, the particular case submitted had not been to the Supreme Court.

4. DAMAGES—SUBJECTS OF COMPENSATORY DAMAGES—MENTAL SUFFERING.

It was error to charge the jury that if the words and actions of the defendant's servant were such as to insult and annoy the plaintiff, and to worry her and humiliate her, she would be entitled to damages. There can be no recovery for annoyance and worry; and the jury should also have been instructed that the facts and circumstances should not only have been such as did humiliate and insult the plaintiff, but such as would reasonably tend to humiliate any person in similar circumstances. The damages recoverable for tort, in this state, are restricted to injuries to person, property, and reputation.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 9, Carriers, § 1121; vol. 15, Damages, §§ 101-103.]

5. SAME—INSTRUCTIONS.

It is error, after giving in charge section 3906 of the Civil Code of 1895, and without any other or further instructions as to the measure of damages, to charge the jury that this section would be the rule under which the jury would assess damages, in case they found the defendant liable. In every case the jury should be properly instructed as to the measure of damages applicable to the facts of the particular case.

6. CARRIERS—TRANSPORTATION OF PASSENGERS—PERSONAL INJURIES—ACTS OF CARRIER'S EMPLOYEES.

While the conductor of a common carrier is clothed with police power, that fact affords no immunity to the carrier for damage resulting from his wrongful or illegal discharge of his duty, either as servant of the company or under color of the police power delegated to him by law. Consequently it was not error for the court to refuse a request to charge that the defendant was not liable for its conductor's acts in carrying out the law requiring the separation of white and colored passengers; the request being only a partially correct statement of the law.

7. TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—NECESSITY—DUTY OF JUDGE.

It is error for the court to omit to charge the principles of law applicable to proper contentions of either party to a cause, where such contentions are authorized by the pleadings, and are sustained by testimony, and thus become issues in the case.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Atlanta; Calhoun, Judge.

Action by A. L. Baker against the Georgia Railway & Electric Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Rosser & Brandon and Walter T. Colquitt, for plaintiff in error. Burton Smith and J. A. Branch, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. Mrs. A. L. Baker recovered a verdict for $775 against the Georgia Railway & Electric Company. The defendant company moved for a new trial, and excepts to the judgment denying and overruling the motion. There are 21 grounds of the amended motion; but, as the decision of some of them is determinative of the merits of the question involved, it will not be necessary to pass upon all of these numerous assignments of error.

Mrs. Baker sued (in the language of her declaration) for annoyance, humiliation, mortification, and insult. No attempt was made to prove any special damages. The case proceeded upon her right to recover whatever actual damages she sustained to her feelings, and whatever vindictive damages, if any, the circumstances might authorize the jury to assess. It appears, from the evidence of the plaintiff, that Mrs. Baker was under treatment from a physician, to whose office she went at stated intervals; that she went to the office of the physician from her home, a distance of about a mile and a half, unaccompanied; that on the day in question she had been to the office of the physician, and walked back from his office, something more than two blocks, to take the car; that her husband, at the telegraph office, and her brother, at a wholesale house, were at work within less than 100 yards of where she passed along to take the car; that she got on the car and sat down on one of the rear seats, set apart for the use of colored passengers, and which she knew to be set apart for the use of colored passengers; that she was too sick to move forward while the car was in motion; that the conductor went to her soon after the car started, and said, "Move up to the front, please;" that she paid no attention to this request and made no response to the conductor; that the conductor shortly afterwards went to her again and requested her to move up to the front, whereupon she told him that she was too sick to move while the car was in motion, but that she would move when it stopped; that the conductor came to her again and requested her to move, and threatened to have her arrested if she did not move; that the car stopped again after this at Mitchell and Whitehall streets, and she did not move up while it was stopped; that after this time she heard the conductor, upon the back platform of the car, remark to another man in uniform, "Damn her, if she don't move I am a good notion to throw her through the window;" that she did not move at any of the subsequent stops of the car until it had become practically filled with people and had traveled about a mile, where some negro passengers got on, which necessitated her moving to the extreme front of the car in order to reach a vacant seat, all the other places, in the meantime, having been filled up by passengers at the various stops of the car. The foregoing presents the salient features of the case, as testified to by the plaintiff. No other witness testified as to the circumstances of the transaction, except the defendant's conductor, whose testimony was materially in conflict with that of the plaintiff, but which, having been disregarded by the jury, will not be considered by us.

The plaintiff in error insists that the verdict is excessive, and a new trial ought to be granted; that the most that the plaintiff ever claimed was that the conductor had requested her, two or three times, to move, which requests she disregarded, and kept her seat until she was forced to move by the advent of the negroes, after the car had traveled more than a mile; that the oath which she quoted was not addressed to her, but to some person outside of the car, on the back platform, and not intended for her ears at all. There is some force in the argument of counsel for the plaintiff in error that, even conceding that the defendant's conductor swore falsely when he denied the use of the oath, and conceding that the plaintiff, in her excited and nervous condition and at her comparatively remote distance from the conductor, did not misunderstand what he said, still the fact remains that the remark was not addressed to her and was not intended for her hearing; and it is most probable, as suggested, that, if it had been uttered in a tone of voice loud enough to warrant the inference that it was intended to be heard by her, the remark would have been resented by the other passengers on the car. Although a verdict for $775, under the evidence disclosed by this record, does seem to us rather large, still our obligation to recognize the right of the jury to assess the damages in every such case is so strong, and our regard for the right of passengers to protection from insult or abuse is so profound, that we would be extremely reluctant to set aside this verdict upon the ground that it is so excessive as by its very amount to show that the finding was the result of bias, prejudice, or other improper influences. We are not prepared to say that we would do so, were this the only question in the case. For reasons hereafter stated, it is not necessary that the question of amount be passed upon. Upon another trial, in which the errors now complained of will doubtless not be again committed, the jury can determine, not only liability, but amount. While any one of the various assignments of error certified by the trial judge might of itself be considered a harmless error, taken altogether it must be apparent, from the general countenance of the case, that the defendant did not have a fair legal trial, and that the errors complained of probably induced the verdict rendered, and perhaps greatly contributed to increase the amount of the recovery. A brief review of some of the grounds of the motion will sustain this statement.

It is complained in the first and second grounds of the motion that the court permitted the plaintiff to testify that the conductor would not stop the car long enough for her to get her feet on the ground. The defendant objected to this evidence as irrelevant and immaterial, but the court overruled this objection. The following colloquy occurred in the presence of the jury. Plaintiff's attorney, combating the objection, said that "to hurry her before she alighted safely would be an evidence of, discourtesy," and the court replied, "Yes; I will let it stay in." There was no allegation in the petition which authorized this evidence. The plaintiff's allegation of discourtesy concluded in the petition with the statement of acts on the car and before she proceeded to alight. The transaction complained of had closed. Discourtesy on one occasion cannot be shown by proof of discourtesy on another occasion. To admit the evidence at all had necessarily the effect of adding weight to plaintiff's contention that the conductor had been discourteous to her on the occasion from which the suit arose, as against his contradictory evidence that no discourtesy was shown. The objection that the evidence was irrelevant and immaterial was well taken; and when the judge, in making his ruling, stated in immediate sequence, and almost in concert with the counsel for the plaintiff, that to hurry her before she alighted would be evidence of discourtesy, and that for that reason he would let the evidence stay in, the jury could not have failed to understand the language of the court, under the circumstances, as being an opinion expressed by the court on the evidence. This was a violation of section 4334 of the Civil Code of 1895.

The third ground of the motion is not fully approved by the trial judge, and for that reason will not be considered. Nor is it necessary to discuss the fourth and fifth grounds.

In the sixth ground of the amended motion, as approved by the court, it is stated that counsel for the plaintiff argued before the court that the case then being tried had been to the Supreme Court, and that the Supreme Court had decided that in this declaration they had a good case; and in the seventh ground complaint is made that the court, in charging the jury, emphasized this error and gave additional weight to it, as against the defendant, by stating that the Supreme Court had passed upon the fact that the things set out in the declaration made a case in court. At the time of the argument of plaintiff's counsel the defendant asked a mistrial on account of the statement and argument complained of, upon the ground that it deprived the defendant of a fair trial, would inevitably affect the opinion of the jury, and could have no other effect than to bias the minds of the jury against the defendant. We are not prepared to say that the court should have granted a mistrial upon the statement made by plaintiff's counsel; but we are quite sure that the remark made was, in its tendency, prejudicial to the defendant's case, and that the court should have clearly and explicitly, at the time that his attention was called thereto, explained to the jury that they had no concern with what might have been the decision of the Supreme Court, that they should pay no attention to the remark made, and should receive the law only from the court, when it should thereafter be given to them in charge. So far as the language in the seventh ground is concerned, we are quite sure that the able trial judge was endeavoring to do what he should have done the day before—trying to withdraw from the jury any impression which might have been created as to the decision of the Supreme Court referred to. Upon examination of the whole charge we are constrained to this opinion. But the language used, that "the Supreme Court passed upon the fact that the things set out in the declaration made a case in court," in view of all the circumstances of the case, was peculiarly unfortunate, and not suited for the purpose doubtless intended by the court. The effect of this language was to state broadly to the jury that the Supreme Court had said that the plaintiff had a case, and that it was only necessary, in order to recover from the defendant, to prove the physical facts set out in her petition. It tended to deprive the defendant of that fair and impartial trial before a jury to which every litigant is entitled. Its natural effect was to bias the opinion of the jury towards a decision that a recovery should be had, in order that they should obey and properly respect what they thought was the opinion of the Supreme Court; and as a matter of fact, though plaintiff's husband's case had been taken to the Supreme Court (Georgia Railway & Electric Co. v. Baker, 120 Ga. 991, 48 S. E. 355), it appears from the record that this plaintiff's case had never been passed upon by that tribunal.

We think that the charge complained of in the eighth ground is too broad. It put too great a burden on the defendant, and made the effect on the plaintiff the test of the insult, without leaving the jury to pass upon the question of what would be an insult to a normal person of ordinary sensibility, under the facts and circumstances shown in the case; and it allowed plaintiff to recover if she was annoyed, whether she had reason to be annoyed and insulted or not. The language used by the court was as follows: "If you determine, from the evidence in the case, that the words, actions, etc., were such as to insult and annoy her, and to worry her and humiliate her, then you give her such damages as you think she is entitled to recover." As has heretofore been ruled by this court, in Glenn v. Western Union Tel. Co., 1 Ga. App. 821, 58 S. E. 83, we are bound by the decision in Chapman v. W. U. Tel. Co., 88 Ga. 763, 15 S. E. 901, 17 L. R. A. 430, 30 Am. St. Rep. 183, while we do not approve it. We think that the peace of mind, the feelings, and the happiness of every one should be guarded by giving recovery of damages for mental anguish or suffering produced either intentionally or negligently. But the doctrine of the Chapman Case, that only the body, reputation, and property of the citizen are protected by liability for damages on the part of the wrongdoer, is expressly affirmed in Cole v. Atlanta & West Point R. Co., 102 Ga. 479, 31 S. E. 108, in which a right of recovery is sustained on the express ground that the allegations of the petition affirm a "wanton and inexcusable injury to [Cole's] person, viz., a flagrant attack directed towards his reputation."

The next ground of complaint which we will consider is the exception taken to the following charge of the court: "Now, in passing upon the question of damages, if you should find that the railway company is liable, I give you this law of our state: 'In every tort there may be aggravating circumstances, either in the act or the intention; and in that event the jury may give additional damages, either to deter the wrongdoer from repeating the trespass, or as compensation for the wounded feelings of the plaintiff.' And that would be the rule under which you are to assess damages." We will consider this ground (which relates to the court's giving section 3906 of the Civil Code of 1895 in charge to the jury) in connection with the next succeeding ground, in which complaint is made that the court gave no measure to the jury by which they could estimate the plaintiff's damages in case of recovery, except section 3906 of the Civil Code of 1895. While it was not erroneous to submit the principle contained in this section, it was error on the part of the court to instruct the jury that this section would be the rule under which they were to assess damages. It was a clear expression of opinion on the part of the court that there were aggravating circumstances in the case being tried, and that additional damages should be given, and withdrew these questions from the jury by virtually saying to them that, if they believed the plaintiff was entitled to recover at all, damages should be given, either to deter the wrongdoer from repeating the trespass, or as compensation for the wounded feelings of the plaintiff; and this without anywhere having instructed the jury as to any measure of the original damages to which the proposed addition, arising from aggravation, should be made.

We think, too, that it was error for the court to charge the jury (though it was no doubt due to inadvertence, and perhaps thus understood by the jury, and consequently harmless) that they would be governed by the facts as they knew them to be and heard them from the stand. The court, doubtless, intended to say the facts as the jury knew them from hearing them from the stand.

Judgment reversed.

(1 Ga. App. 761)

BASHINSKY v. WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH CO. (No. 297.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. May 9, 1907.)

1. TELEGRAPHS—DELAY IN TELEGRAM — ACTION FOR DAMAGES—PLEADING.

The action being for damages on account of failure to deliver in reasonable time a telegram for the purchase of cotton, by which failure the plaintiffs were prevented from effecting a sale of the cotton and lost a contract from which, if the message had been correctly delivered, they would have made certain commissions, and the terms and conditions of the contract not being alleged so as to inform the defendant of its character and the amount of commissions contracted for, if any, and so as to enable it to be determined whether a contract or a proposal to contract was the subject-matter of the suit, a special demurrer to the petition was properly sustained.

2. SAME—CIPHER TELEGRAM.

While a telegraph company is bound properly and promptly to transmit and deliver a message sent in cipher, if it undertakes to transmit the same, such company is not chargeable with knowledge of the contents and meaning of words used in sending messages in cipher, and which are purposely unintelligible except to the addressee. In such case the only presumption with which the telegraph company is chargeable is knowledge of the importance of the message.

3. SAME.

Consequently, in a case where it is alleged that damage has resulted from failure either to transmit or promptly deliver a message in cipher, which message either embodies or completes the contract, and the fulfillment of which contract as alleged would have been profitable to the plaintiff, and the loss whereof, as alleged, has endangered him, it is incumbent upon the plaintiff to translate such cipher telegram in the petition, so as to put the defendant upon notice of its contents and properly enable him to prepare his defense.

4. SAME.

Where the alleged loss and damage, and the question as to whether there was a contract or not, and as to whether such contract, if shown to exist, and if it had been performed by the addressee, included profits or commissions, as alleged, can be determined only by a knowledge of the contents of such telegram, and such cipher message is unintelligible, a special demurrer to the allegations that a contract was lost by reason of delay in delivery of the message, and that by said contract the plaintiff would have made commissions, is properly sustained upon the ground that the allegations are too vague, indefinite, and uncertain.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Sandersville; Hyman, Judge.

Action by Bennett & Co. against the Western Union Telegraph Company. On the death of Bennett, Bashinsky, surviving partner, was substituted as plaintiff. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed, with direction.

Evans & Evans, for plaintiff in error.
Joseph H. Hall and Warren Roberts, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. Bennett & Co. sued the telegraph company in the city court of Sandersville for $1,999.99 damages for an alleged delay of 2 hours and 30 minutes in the delivery of the following cipher message: "Minnoten, Sandersville, Georgia. Devium Lichbades digrassa licoperdo gabbiola marntium argeorum liabamus balance haspicoll bemen." Plaintiffs alleged that this telegram was from a broker in Bremen for the purchase of 200 bales of middling lint cotton, each weighing 500 pounds, at the price of 6.20d. per pound for middling cotton and 6.25d. for good middling. Plaintiffs alleged further that they immediately wired their acceptance of the offer for the purchase of said cotton, but, by reason of the delay in delivering the original telegram sent them from Bremen, their reply reached Bremen too late, and they were thereby prevented from effecting the sale of the cotton, and lost a contract by which they would have made commissions of $1,999.99 had the message to them been promptly delivered. Plaintiffs further alleged that, if the message had been delivered in a reasonable time, or even an hour sooner, they would not have sustained any loss, but would have been able to make and carry out the contract, and make their commission in the sum aforesaid. The defendant demurred to those portions of the third and fourth paragraphs of plaintiffs' petition in which it is alleged that, by reason of the delay in the delivery of the message, a contract was lost, by which contract plaintiffs would have made commissions, upon the ground that the allegations as to the contract and the commissions are too vague, indefinite, and uncertain, and do not put the defendant specifically on notice as to the character and terms of the contract, the amount of the commissions contracted for, or what would have accrued to the plaintiffs upon the completion of the contract. This demurrer was sustained; and, no amendment being offered, the trial judge dismissed the suit, and this judgment is now alleged to be erroneous.

It cannot be seen, from the allegations of the petition, how the plaintiffs were damaged. No right to recover damages is alleged. It is nowhere distinctly alleged that the plaintiffs had a contract with the sender of the message. On the contrary, from the distinct averment in the fourth paragraph of the petition that they "would have been able to have made the contract," etc., it can only be inferred that they did not have such a contract as would have bound the sender of the message. They lost nothing but a chance to make something. It was a case of lost opportunity; but the plaintiffs were in the same condition after receiving the telegram as they were before, except the expense of their reply, which was sent "at a venture." It is averred that, if the plaintiffs had received the telegram in time, they would have made $1,999.99. They might have done this, if they had been able to make the contract, or they might not. No contract is set out. The defendant had the right to be informed. From the fact stated in the petition, that a reply had to be sent and received at Bremen by 10:30 o'clock a. m., it is evident that there was no contract, but only a proposal to contract. Thus viewed, plaintiffs' complaint is that the defendant failed to deliver in time the offer of the Bremen cotton buyers to take 200 bales of cotton at the price named; and the ruling in Richmond Mills v. Telegraph Co., 123 Ga. 222, 51 S. E. 293, becomes applicable. "Compensatory damages cannot be recovered of a telegraph company for failure to send or deliver a mere proposal to sell, * * * as they are contingent upon its acceptance." Beatty Lumber Co. v. Telegraph Co., 52 W. Va. 410, 44 S. E. 309, and cit. And in the Beatty Case (page 414 of 52 W. Va., page 310 of 44 S. E.) the court says further, "The trouble * * * is that there was no finished contract between the parties, but only a proposal for a contract; and there can be no contract without both a proposal and its acceptance. The failure of the telegraph company did not cause the breach of a consummate contract. It only prevented one that might or might not have been made." The whole question is most clearly stated by Justice Evans, in Wilson v. Western Union Tel. Co., 124 Ga. 131, 52 S. E. 153. In that case the plaintiff, Wilson, had an understanding with a bridge construction company that the company could procure his services when wanted, at a stated salary. The bridge company later, desiring Wilson's services, sent to Wilson at Waycross, Ga., a telegram in these words: "Can you commence work next week? Answer." The delivery of this message was delayed 10 days from the date of its reception, although it could have been delivered in a very few minutes either at Wilson's residence or at his place of business, and when it was delivered the senders of the telegram had made other arrangements. As said in that case: "The telegram, in connection with the averments on this subject, would not evidence a closed deal. * * * Suppose it had been promptly delivered, and the addressee had replied in the affirmative; still there would have been no contract between the bridge company and the plaintiff. * * * The failure to get employment with the bridge company was not proximately caused by the delay in the delivery of the telegram." In the trial court the case was dismissed on general demurrer, and the judgment was affirmed.

We think that the defendant had the right to be informed in the petition as to what was the meaning of the cipher telegram, so as to be enabled to properly prepare its defense. The language is absolutely unintelligible, except to those who may have been instructed in the particular cipher code used. A telegraph company is required to transmit and promptly deliver telegrams sent in cipher, but the telegraph company is not presumed to be advised of the contents or meaning of the message, further than that it is to be presumed important. If the importance of the message is recognized, and it is promptly delivered, it is immaterial whether the telegraph company knows the meaning of a single word therein contained, because it is none of its concern. But if it be claimed that the message was not properly or promptly transmitted or delivered, and that, by reason of negligence in any respect, injury or loss resulted, and suit is brought to recover damages therefor, then knowledge of the contents of the message becomes material to the defendant in preparing his defense, as it will be material to the jury on the trial, in determining whether there is any damage, and, if so, how much. The defendant has the right to be plainly apprised, in the petition, of every matter necessary to be proved on the trial; and, as it must be admitted that the words would have to be translated for the court and jury on the trial, so they should have been translated in the petition for the defendant. For failure to so interpret the cipher message and embody the translation in the petition, the demurrer of the defendant that the allegations as the contract do not put defendant on notice as to the terms or character of the contract was well taken and properly sustained. So far as we are aware, it has never been held that a company, engaged in the transmission of a message, is chargeable with knowledge of the contents of telegrams sent in cipher. The decision in the Fatman Case, 73 Ga. 285, 54 Am. Rep. 877, was based on the earlier ruling in Western Union Telegraph Company v. Blanchard, 68 Ga. 299, 45 Am. Rep. 480, that the telegram, though in singular and unintelligible language, put the company on notice that it related to important commercial business, and required reasonable and ordinary dispatch.

We not only have no hesitation in holding that the trial judge was right in sustaining the special demurrer, but we think that the petition would be subject to even a general demurrer or oral motion to dismiss, as setting forth no cause of action. It was settled in the Clay Case, 81 Ga. 287, 6 S. E. 813, 12 Am. St. Rep. 316, that profits anticipated from a contract from which, if the contract had been made, profit would have accrued, afforded no basis for the recovery of damages as against one who merely prevented the contract. In the Clay Case (in which the allegations as to the exact point now being considered were similar to those in this case) the declaration was demurred to orally, on the ground that it set forth no cause of action. And this petition could safely have been dismissed upon the same ground, if the ruling in the Clay Case was sound. It is based on the settled principle that the damages are too remote and uncertain to be the basis of recovery.

Judgment affirmed, with direction.

(1 Ga. App. 446)

MISSOURI STATE LIFE INS. CO. v. LOVELACE. (No. 39.)

1. JUDGMENT — CONCLUSIVENESS — MATTERS CONCLUDED.

The sustaining of a general demurrer to a petition for equitable relief filed in the superior court, upon the ground that the petitioner was not able to set up by way of defense in a city court the things which it sought to prove in order to cancel a policy of insurance, and the consequent dismissal of the petition, do not make the questions therein involved res judicata, so as to require the dismissal of a writ of error brought to review errors alleged to have been committed in the city court, even though the subject-matter of the suit was in both cases the same policy of insurance.

2. SAME—IDENTITY OF CAUSE OF ACTION.

The judgment sought to be set up as res judicata must be the result of an actual and fair trial of the issues. It is not sufficient that there is an inference of a decision upon the same points. There must not only be identity of subject-matter, of persons, and of parties, but identity of cause of action.

3. CONTRACTS—VALIDITY—WHAT LAW GOVERNS—JUDICIAL NOTICE.

Parties are presumed to contract with reference to the place of the contract. If the contract is valid there, it is valid everywhere. The lex loci contractus controls as to the nature, construction, and interpretation of a contract.

(a) By comity the laws of a sister state will be applied in the enforcement of any contract to be performed in that state, so long as such laws do not conflict with the statutes, powers, or rights of this state, its well-settled public policy, or the public conscience.

(b) "The court on the trial of a cause may proceed on their knowledge of the laws of another state, and it is not necessary in that case to prove them."

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 11, Contracts, § 724; vol. 20, Evidence, § 51.]

4. INSURANCE—CONTRACT—CONSTRUCTION—MOST STRONGLY AGAINST INSURER.

In cases of doubt as to whether the common law or the statutes of another state shall prevail, the law will be construed more strongly against the framer and proposer of the contract, always preferring, in contracts of insurance, that construction most favorable to the insured.

5. CONTRACTS—VALIDITY—WHAT LAW GOVERNS.

Where the laws of another state pro hac vice apply, an answer to a suit based upon a contract to be performed in another state should be stricken, unless a meritorious defense, as judged by the laws of that state, is presented.

6. INSURANCE—PENALTY—RIGHTS OF INSURED—WHAT LAW GOVERNS.

The penalty is one of the inherent rights attaching to a contract of insurance (in case there is groundless refusal to pay), to enable the beneficiaries to obtain, free from deduction, the original benefits of the provision in their favor according to the tenor of the policy. Such damages and attorney's fees as would be recoverable by citizens of another state can likewise be recovered by citizens of this state, where the contract sought to be enforced is to be performed in such sister state. Citizens of this state will not be deprived of any rights allowed citizens of the place of the contract, when the laws of that state are being administered at the choice of the insurer.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Atlanta; Reid, Judge.

Action by Ophella Lovelace against the Missouri State Life Insurance Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Motion to dismiss writ of error. Motion overruled, and judgment affirmed.

J. W. Preston and Payne, Jones & Jones, for plaintiff in error. Edgar Latham, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. We will first consider the motion of the defendant in error to dismiss the writ of error. The motion is predicated upon the following grounds: "(1) That on the 30th day of April, 1906, the Missouri State Life Insurance Company, the plaintiff in error in the above-stated case, filed its petition against this defendant in error in the superior court of Fulton county. A copy of said petition is hereto attached and marked 'Exhibit A,' and is made part of this motion. (2) That since the date of suing out the writ of error in the above-stated case by said company the said case of the said company against this movant came on to be heard in the said superior court of Fulton county, and that the same was heard on a general demurrer made by movant to the said petition on the 14th day of September, 1906, and during the September term, 1906, of said superior court, on which day this movant avers the court made and entered the following judgment therein, to wit: 'The general demurrer in this case coming on to be heard, it is ordered that the same be sustained, and plaintiff's bill is dismissed. September 14, 1906. J. T. Pendleton, J. S. C. A. C.' (3) This movant avers that every contention which was made by said company in its plea and answer to the suit brought by her against it in the city court of Atlanta, and that every issue involved in his case, was averred in said petition filed in the said superior court as aforesaid. (4) That the judgment of the said superior court, hereinbefore set forth, was not excepted to nor appealed from by said company, and that the September term of said superior court has expired, and that said company is now concluded, and cannot except to nor appeal from said judgment. (5) That every issue involved in the above-stated case was determined adversely to said company by the said judgment of the said superior court aforesaid, and that said judgment is now res adjudicata, and said company has no right to have two tribunals determine the issues involved in the two different proceedings. (6) That said plaintiff in error has no right to further prosecute the writ of error in this case, for the reason that it is concluded as to all assignments of error contained in the bill of exceptions in the above-stated case. (7) The said Mrs. Ophella Lovelace avers that the various exhibits referred to in the petition filed by said company in the superior court aforesaid are contained in the record in the case at bar, and are, therefore, already before this honorable court. (8) Wherefore she prays that said case be dismissed for and on account of the reasons herein alleged."

If we were to consult our own ease, we would cheerfully avoid the voluminous record in this case by sustaining the motion to dismiss the writ of error; and estoppels by judgment are favored. "In Lampen v. Corke, 7 Eng. S. L. R. 209, Holroyd, J., says that estoppels are odious in the law. It is often so said, and truly said, of estoppels by recitals in deeds, admissions in pleadings, and all of that class. They are not to be readily allowed. Estoppels by judgments are, however, not odious. They are to be received with as much favor as any other defense, because it is the interest of the commonwealth that litigation should cease." Evans v. Birge, 11 Ga. 265. On the other hand, "matters which have received a judicial determination cannot be called again into controversy"; and this "applies with full force, not only in the same jurisdiction, but also as between courts of law and equity." Pollock v. Gilbert, 16 Ga. 402, 60 Am. Dec. 732. In Evans v. Birge, supra, Judge Nisbet delivered the opinion, and announced the following rule of decision as to the plea of res adjudicata, and established its limitations: "It is very well settled that a fact which has been directly tried and decided by a court of competent jurisdiction cannot be contested again between the same parties or their privies, in the same or any other court. A judgment, therefore, of a court of law, or a decree in chancery, is an estoppel to the parties thereto and to those who are in privity with them. This is the rule. It is, however, carefully and strongly fenced. The judgment must relate to the same question, and must clearly decided it. If it came collaterally under consideration, or was only incidentally considered, there is no estoppel. And if the decision of the question is ascertained inferentially, by arguing from the judgment or decree and the pleadings in the case, there is equally no estoppel." And in Brooking v. Dearmond, 27 Ga. 58, it is held that "a judgment in one suit is not a bar to another suit, if, * * * although the parties in the two suits are the same, they sue or are sued in one suit in a right different from the right in which they sue or are sued in the other."

Applying Judge Nisbet's rule to the judgment of the judge of the superior court dismissing the equitable petition, as well as to the record in that case, we cannot dismiss the writ of error on the ground of former adjudication, or hold that that judgment, although unexcepted to, is a bar to the right of the plaintiff in error to prosecute its writ of error in this court. The suit which was brought in the city court of Atlanta was an action upon a contract, to which the insurance company filed substantially four defenses: (1) That the insured had made certain false representations in his application, which avoided the policy; (2) that the insured committed suicide, which should reduce the amount of the recovery; (3) that the insured became intemperate, and that this caused his death, and by the terms of the contract avoided the policy; (4) that the policy never became effective, because the premium was not paid. The suit filed in the superior court for equitable relief by the company sought (1) to enjoin Mrs. Lovelace from prosecuting the case in the city court, (2) to cancel the contract of insurance upon the life of her husband, upon various grounds, and (3) to have the superior court take jurisdiction of the entire cause in equity and by appropriate decree establish the rights of the insurance company in the premises. While there are many statements in the company's petition in the superior court which are similar to those contained in its answer to the suit in the city court, they may all be considered as only incidental to the gravamen of the suit. The twenty-second paragraph of the petition states the reason why it is sought to have the intervention of the court of equity, to wit, that by virtue of the common-law character of the city court of Atlanta the petitioner was unable to avail itself of various matters of equitable relief sought in the superior court. There was no trial in the superior court, and the reasons which controlled the judgment of the judge in dismissing the petition can only be reached by inference, which by Judge Nisbet's rule cannot be done. The judgment which it is sought to set up as res adjudicata must be the result of an actual and fair trial of the issues. It is not sufficient that there is an inference of a decision upon the very point. 21 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law, 129. And, if we were to infer anything, it might fairly be presumed that the dismissal of the petition by the judge of the superior court was due to his opinion that there was no reason for equitable interference with the cause then pending in the city court, and now, by writ of error, brought to this court. However this may be, the suit in the city court was one cause of action, and the petition to the superior court presented a different cause of action, and, wherever a judgment is sought to be set up as res adjudicata, not only must identity of subject-matter, of parties, and persons be shown, but identity of cause of action must also clearly be established. The motion to dismiss the writ is overruled, because, as was so well said by the Court of Appeals of New York in Palmer v. Hussey, 87 N. Y. 803, "the conclusive character of a judgment as a bar extends only to identical issues, and they must be such not merely in name, but in fact and substance. If the issue in the later litigation is intrinsically and substantially an entirely different one, even though capable of being described in similar language or by a common form of expression, then the truth is not excluded by the judgment."

Mrs. Lovelace sued the defendant company for $2,000 principal, $200 damages, and $500 attorney's fees, on a policy of life insurance issued in June, 1904, on the life of Edwin Lovelace, her husband, and in which she was named the beneficiary. One of the stipulations of the policy was in these words: "This contract shall be governed by and construed according to the laws of Missouri; the place of this contract being expressly agreed to be the home office of the company"—which, as appears from other portions of the policy, was the city of St. Louis, Mo. To this suit the defendant filed demurrer and answer. The demurrer contains several grounds specially demurring to the various paragraphs of the petition, as well as the general ground that the petition contains no cause of action. The demurrer was overruled. Exceptions pendente lite were filed, but were not presented and certified until after the opening of the next term of the trial court. This was too late to enable this court to review the order of the court upon the demurrer. The answer, besides denying the essential allegations entitling the plaintiff to recover, set up that the policy was void because of false and fraudulent representations made by Lovelace in the application for the insurance—namely, that he was at that time in good health, and usually enjoyed good health, that he was not then and never had been addicted to the use of narcotics or intoxicants, and that no company had ever declined to issue a policy upon his life, all of which statements were alleged in the answer to be untrue; that before the death of said Lovelace the company demanded from him a cancellation of the policy and received his promise that he would surrender it; that no consideration had ever passed to the company for the policy, because the premium thereon had never been paid; also that one of the conditions of the policy was that the policy should become null and void if within one year after its date the said Lovelace became intemperate in the use of narcotics or alcoholic drinks, that Lovelace did become so intemperate within such time, and that his death was the result of such intemperance. The company further answered that said Lovelace distinctly stipulated that all the statements in his application for insurance were warranted to be true and complete, that no information or material facts were suppressed, and that the same was offered to the company as a consideration for the contract of insurance; that all of said statements were false and fraudulent, and made with the design of deceiving the insurance company, and did so deceive it; that one of the provisions of the policy was that if death occurred from self-destruction, while sane or insane, within one year from the date of the policy, only the reserve (computed according to the Actuaries' Table of Mortality, with interest at 4 per cent.) should be due upon the surrender of the policy; and that Lovelace did in fact destroy his own life within one year of the date of the policy. The plaintiff filed a general and special demurrer to the plea and answer of the company. The general demurrer was sustained, and the plea and answer dismissed, except in so far as the answer denied liability for attorney's fees and damages.

The plaintiff subsequently amended her petition, by averring: That each and all of the statutes of the state of Missouri in force at the time the policy was issued became a part of the policy as effectually as if they had been incorporated therein. That at the time the policy was issued, section 7896 (chapter 119, art. 2) of the Revised Statutes of the state of Missouri of 1899 [Ann. St. 1906, p. 3750] was as follows: "In all suits upon policies of insurance on life hereafter issued by any company doing business in this state, to a citizen of this state, it shall be no defense that the insured committed suicide, unless it should be shown to the satisfaction of the court or jury trying the cause that the insured contemplated suicide at the time he made his application for the policy; and any stipulation in the policy to the contrary shall be void." And section 7890 of said Revised Statutes was as follows: "No misrepresentation made in obtaining or securing a policy of insurance on the life or lives of any person or persons, citizens of this state, shall be deemed material, or render the policy void, unless the matter misrepresented shall have actually contributed to the contingency or event on which the policy is to become due and payable; and whether it so contributed in any case shall be a question for the jury." That section 7929 of said Revised Statutes is as follows: "Every corporation, company, or association transacting business under the provisions of this article shall, upon the issuance of every policy, attach to such policy or indorse thereon the substance of the application upon which such policy was issued, and which is made a part of the contract of insurance, or referred to therein, or which may in any manner affect the validity of such policy." That the substance of said application was not attached to or indorsed upon this policy. That the stipulation contained in the policy, making said application a part of the contract, is void. That the policy alone constitutes the entire contract of insurance. Plaintiff further set up section 7867 of the Revised Statutes of Missouri, providing for the registration of policies, and that the policy sued on was a registered policy, and that the insurance company was estopped from claiming that the premium had not been paid thereon. Upon the allowance of these amendments the defendant renewed its demurrer, and, besides the general demurrer that the petition contained no cause of action, demurred specially on the grounds: (1) That there is a misjoinder of causes of action, for the reason that the petitioner has brought suit upon the alleged contract of insurance and also upon an alleged tort for which she prays special punitive damages; (2) that section 8012 of the Revised Statutes of Missouri, referred to in paragraph 8 of plaintiff's petition, is unconstitutional, in that it operates to deprive insurance companies of property without due process of law, and denies to them equal protection of the law, and requires them to pay attorney's fees and damages in certain cases to parties successfully suing them, while it gives them no corresponding benefits; (3) that the city court of Atlanta has no jurisdiction to enforce a penalty of the state of Missouri. This demurrer was, after a hearing, overruled by the court. Exceptions pendente lite to this judgment were filed in due form and in due time.

The case went to trial before a jury, therefore, upon the one question whether the plaintiff should recover the penalties fixed by the Missouri statutes. A verdict was found for the plaintiff for the amount of the insurance, with interest, and for $100 damages, and $500 attorney's fees; and a motion for new trial was made. The motion contains the usual general grounds, and, by amendment, the following additional grounds of alleged error: (1) The admission of the testimony of Edgar Latham and the refusal of the court to exclude his testimony that he is familiar with the insurance laws of the state of Missouri, and that the statutes pleaded in the cause and now before the court were the laws of force in that state at the time this policy was issued. (2) The admission in evidence of a book offered by the plaintiff, entitled "Insurance Laws of the State of Missouri, 1903," upon the front leaf of which book was printed: "Insurance Laws of the State of Missouri, 1903. Including Laws Governing and Regulating Fraternal Beneficiary Associations, Trust Companies, and Pools, Trusts, and Conspiracies. R. G. Yates, Supt. of Insurance. [Seal of State.] Jefferson City, Mo., Tribune Printing Co., State Printers and Binders." And on the second page of said book: "Insurance Laws of the State of Missouri, Revised Statutes of 1899 and Acts approved 1901 and 1903"—said book being admitted for the purpose of proving what the laws of that state were. The motion for new trial was overruled; and by the writ of error we are called upon to review the action of the court upon that motion, and those rulings of the court to which exceptions pendente lite were taken, as well as the overruling of an oral motion to dismiss that portion of the plaintiff's petition which sought to recover damages and attorney's fees; said motion being upon the ground that the allowance of the same was a matter of remedy governed by the laws of the forum, under which they could not be recovered.

We are clearly of the opinion that when the general demurrer was overruled, and this judgment was not excepted to during the term at which it was rendered, the petition became the law of the case so far as the defendant was concerned. Sims v. Georgia Ry. & Electric Co., 123 Ga. 643-645, 51 S. E. 573, and cases therein cited. If we are right in this, the subsequent demurrer offered by the company could not be considered by the court below, because in conflict with its prior ruling. Section 8012 of the Revised Statutes of Missouri, which was a ground of the second demurrer, was pleaded in the original petition and passed upon in overruling the first demurrer. As to the ground that there was a joinder of suit upon the contract of insurance with suit upon an alleged tort, we think it was properly overruled by the court. The ground that the court had no jurisdiction to enforce the penalty of another state will come more properly under what we shall have to say further on with reference to the application of the laws of Missouri to the case as a whole. Suffice it to say here that the law of Missouri was the selection of the company itself, and will be enforced, unless in conflict with our law or our public policy.

Much stress is laid by learned counsel for the company on the fact that certain of the Missouri statutes use the term "citizens of this state," and it is contended that by reason of these words the benefits which would accrue to the plaintiff in this case, were she a citizen of Missouri, are denied to her, because she is a citizen of Georgia. From the place assigned these sections in the Revised Statutes of Missouri it is evident to our minds that these words are used merely because it would naturally be presumed that generally the persons to be affected by the provision of the Missouri statutes would be citizens of Missouri; and as the plaintiff is forced, by the very contract prepared and proposed by the company, to have the contract construed and her rights adjudicated by the laws of Missouri, it is apparent that the words "citizens of this state" may be treated as mere surplusage and rejected as such. The guaranty in the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States, which declares that "No state shall deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws," was said by Justice Bradley, in Missouri v. Lewis, 101 U. S. 22, 30, 25 L. Ed. 989, to include "the equal right to resort to the appropriate courts for redress." "It means," as was further said by the court, "that no person or class of persons shall be denied the same protection of the laws which is enjoyed by other persons or other classes in the same place and under like circumstances." The same court, in United States v. Cruikshank, 92 U. S. 542, 555, 23 L. Ed. 588, per Waite, C. J., used the following language, in discussing the foregoing constitutional clause: "The equality of the rights of citizens is a principle of republicanism. Every republican government is in duty bound to protect all its citizens in the enjoyment of this principle, if within its power. That duty was originally assumed by the states; and it still remains there." In our view of this case the city court of Atlanta was for the time being a Missouri court, so far as the "validity and effect" of this contract is concerned. Under article 4, § 2, of the Constitution of the United States, "the citizens of each state shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several states." Sitting, as it were, in Missouri, so as to give "effect" to the contract, the trial court could not consider Mrs. Lovelace as other than a citizen of Missouri, at least in so far as to accord her any "privileges" appertaining to such citizenship, and to enforce the laws of Missouri, construing them most favorably to the insured. In the language of our Supreme Court in Champion v. Wilson, 64 Ga. 188, "The law of New York entered into this contract, as it was * * * to be executed there, and our courts will enforce it, whatever it may be; and this contract must stand or fall as the test of that law is applied to it." And, applying the language of the decision in that case to Missouri instead of New York: "When so applied it becomes, as the law of the contract, Georgia law; and it matters not where it comes from. For this case—pro hac vice—it is our own law."

We do not see either that the demurrer, which had at a former term been overruled, could be renewed at a subsequent term, or that it can be justly claimed that the plaintiff's petition set forth two causes of action merely because the plaintiff offered an amendment setting up certain statutes of the state of Missouri in amplification and aid of rights already claimed in the original petition. Foreign statutes may be pleaded by amendment. South Carolina R. Co. v. Nix, 68 Ga. 572. And the amendment in that case was expressly approved because allowable by the laws of South Carolina. Conlin v. City Council of Charleston, 15 Rich. Law, 201. The amendment did not materially change the cause of action, and gave no right to dig up a dead demurrer and have its sufficiency again passed upon. Civ. Code 1895, § 5068. The motion to dismiss that part of plaintiff's petition that sought to recover damages and attorney's fees was properly overruled, because, even as a matter of remedy and as governed by the laws of the forum, such penalty and damages can be recovered in Georgia; and the defendant's motion was made upon the distinct ground that they could not be so recovered.

We come next to the amended grounds of the motion for a new trial, which relate to the method of proving the laws of Missouri. It is settled that, where either party claims a benefit under a foreign law, the statute must be pleaded; and, of course, where the laws of a foreign state are specially pleaded, they must, as any other material matter, be proved. Champion v. Wilson, supra. But according to prior decisions of our courts there is no inexorable rule which demands a certain kind of proof or prescribes the exact quantum of proof required to satisfy the trial court as to the authenticity of the statutes of one of our sister states. The court's own knowledge may give testimony and supply the proper verification of the law. "The courts, on the trial of a cause, may proceed on their knowledge of the laws of another state, and it is not necessary in that case to prove them; and their judgment will not be reversed, when they proceed on such knowledge, unless it should appear that they decided wrong as to those laws." Herschfeld v. Drexel, 12 Ga. 582. Three methods of proof have been recognized. One is by proof of witnesses, testifying as to their familiarity with the law in reference to a certain subject. A second method is by certified copy of the statute in question. And the third method of proof is, we think, clearly authorized by the Code, which is judicial recognition. Civ. Code 1895, § 5231. An instance of the first appears in Chattanooga, Rome & C. R. Co. v. Jackson, 86 Ga. 681, 13 S. E. 110, where the Supreme Court approved proof by attorneys, who testified as to the law of Tennessee (as Latham did in this case as to the law of Missouri), except that they testified that they had practiced law in Tennessee, and Latham did not testify that he had practiced in Missouri. In that case Justice Simmons, in dealing with the exceptions to the testimony of the attorneys proving the law of Tennessee, lays down the following rule: "The public laws of the United States and of the several states thereof, as published by authority, shall be judicially recognized without proof." While, therefore, the trial judge might have resorted to the statutes and the decisions of the Supreme Court of Tennessee, we cannot say that it was error to receive the testimony of skilled attorneys who practiced in the courts of that state, to aid him in arriving at a proper conclusion as to what was the law of that state, and especially as to the practice of the courts thereof in regard to appeals and their dismissal. The testimony was not for the jury, but for the information of the judge; and he was not bound by the opinions of these attorneys, but it was his duty at last to decide the law himself, aided by these opinions and such other sources of information as were accessible to him. Knowing, as we do, the great difficulty under which courts labor in arriving at the true law of a case, and especially the difficulty encountered here, as well as by the court below in this case, we cannot condemn the trial judge for resorting to any sources of information which will aid him in coming to a correct conclusion as to the law." The learned Justice cites Hanley v. Donoghue, 115 U. S. 1, 6 Sup. Ct. 242, 29 L. Ed. 535, and Chicago & Alton Railroad v. Wiggins Ferry Co., 119 U. S. 615, 7 Sup. Ct. 398, 30 L. Ed. 519, as authority approving this method of proof, and refers to the fact that in other states that have no statutes like ours, evidence of this kind is the proper mode of proving the laws of another state. And in Thomas v. Clarkson, 125 Ga. 77, 54 S. E. 77, 6 L. R. A. (N. S.) 653, the same method of proof is recognized, and the only criticism passed upon it by the court was that the evidence of the witness did not refer to or show what the law was at the time of the contract.

The method of proving the laws of other states by copy thereof, "under the great seal of their respective states," is provided for by Civ. Code 1895, § 5233; but this mode of proof is not, as has sometimes been supposed, exclusive of every other means. That the court may consider the law as proven, by judicial recognition of its terms and provisions, is shown in Massachusetts Benefit Life Association v. Hale, 96 Ga. 802, 23 S. E. 849, where it was decided that a stipulation in a policy (which, like this, was to be governed by the lex loci contractus) that no suit should be brought under the contract, unless within one year from the death of the member, was void, because the law of Massachusetts allowed such suit to be brought within two years. In that case, "while it does not appear in the reported decision * * * that the Massachusetts statute was not invoked in the trial court, an examination of the original record shows that no reference whatever was made to this law in the pleadings of the parties." Seaboard Air Line Ry. v. Phillips, 117 Ga. 101, 43 S. E. 494. See, also, Barranger v. Baum, 103 Ga. 466, 30 S. E. 524, 68 Am. St. Rep. 113. No authoritative ruling was made by our Supreme Court upon this subject in Seaboard Air Line Ry. v. Phillips, supra, because it was not required; but we think that the reasoning of Justice Cobb is unanswerable, and that section 5231 of the Civil Code of 1895 means just what it says, and is founded upon sound reasoning. "If a book containing the laws as published by authority is not accessible, then, in the absence of a copy of the law under the great seal of the state, the case would generally have to be determined by a presumption that the common law prevailed in the other state." We think it absurd that a court of this state should be required to administer, as the law of a sister state, that which is not the law, when it has before its eyes an open book showing what is the law, refusing to see what may be seen by all men, merely because it was not formally offered as evidence on the trial. We think, then, that our view that there is no merit in the amended grounds of the motion for new trial is sustained by ample authority; and we come to the question which, after all, must determine the case—whether the court erred in the rulings which were the subject of the exceptions pendente lite. That question is: Did the court err in trying the case by the laws of Missouri; and, if so, how?

The policy of insurance prepared by the company named the situs in which it preferred its right to be administered, and made the state of Missouri the place of the contract. Having made choice, it is bound by its selection, and estopped to vary or retract its own contract from its written provisions. The policy, in its concluding paragraph, says: "This contract shall be governed by and construed according to the laws of Missouri; the place of this contract being expressly agreed to be the home office of the company."

All contracts of insurance are to be construed most strongly against the insurer and in favor of the insured; and if, therefore, the court had entertained doubt as to which law prevailed as to any phase of the case, the company having selected in the contract, which it prepared itself, the laws of Missouri, the court was bound to construe the contract by those laws of Missouri, most favorably to the insured. If this means anything, it means that the validity, form, and effect of the contract are to be determined by the laws of the state of Missouri. Georgia enforces the laws of another state only by comity. But that comity will extend, in passing upon a contract made to take effect and be performed in another state, so as to give effect to every law of that state applicable to the subject-matter of the litigation, except such as conflict with our laws or such as are opposed to the well-known public policy of the state. The question is: Was the court right in trying the case by the law of Missouri; and, if so, to what extent should the law of Missouri have controlled? The company selected the law of Missouri as its choice. Can it complain if that law is administered? And while he who claims a benefit under the law of a foreign state must plead and prove that law to the satisfaction of the court in some one of the modes to which we have referred, still, in the administration of such laws as collaterally, rather than directly, affect the case, it cannot be questioned that the court may in any way possible inform itself as to what is the law. The means of finding it are immaterial, provided, only, that the true and correct law is found. The court must inform itself; and, judged by this rule, the learned judge of the trial court was right in striking all of the defenses of the defendant company. The court had previously overruled the demurrers to the plaintiff's petition, and (no exception having been duly taken thereto) the right of the plaintiff to stand on her petition, both as to the law and as to the facts, was established. If her rights as to either were questioned before as to any portion of the petition, her rights as to both were extended to the extreme boundary lines fixed by the petition. This petition the plaintiff had the right to amend, and that right was not abused.

The plaintiff in error excepted pendente lite to the allowance of certain amendments, for reasons given in its demurrer; and error is assigned thereon in the bill of exceptions. We think the court was right in overruling the demurrers and allowing the amendments. The gravamen of the defendant's objection must have been that contained in the first demurrer, that there was a misjoinder of causes of action; the defendant contending that, joined to the suit on the contract of insurance, the plaintiff was praying for punitive or vindictive damages. The damages were alleged and asked for, and section 8012 of the Revised Statutes of Missouri was specially pleaded in the original petition, the special and general demurrer to which had been overruled, and, therefore, to offer this demurrer again was to ask the court to reopen what had already been settled as the law of the case. But, waiving this, we see no error in overruling this demurrer to the petition. The plaintiff was entitled to the damages if she established the allegations with reference to vexatious refusal, under Civ. Code 1895, § 8. It was one of the effects of the contract which our courts will enforce. The question of the constitutionality of the very statute of Missouri which was pleaded in this case, and which allows damages and attorney's fees, has been passed upon by the Supreme Court of the United States in Orient Insurance Co. v. Daggs, 172 U. S. 557, 19 Sup. Ct. 281, 43 L. Ed. 552, and it is not repugnant to our Constitution. The contract in the Daggs Case was one of fire insurance, instead of life insurance; but section 8012, cited supra, includes both. Its wording is: "In any action against any insurance company * * * under a policy of fire, life, marine or other insurance, * * * the court or jury may allow damages." The decision likewise covers life insurance as well as fire insurance; for the Supreme Court of the United States, in Farmers', etc., Ins. Co. v. Dobney, 189 U. S. 305, 23 Sup. Ct. 566, 47 L. Ed. 821, citing and referring to the Orient Case, says the statute of the state of Missouri was upheld, "not only on the ground of the right of the state to prescribe the conditions upon which an insurance company should transact business within its borders, but also because the rule in question was the lawful exercise of the power to classify."

In reference to the plea of suicide, the statute (Rev. St. Mo. § 7896) voids any suicide provision in policies of life insurance. But it was insisted that the provision in this case is not in the nature of a defense to the action, but simply provides for an apportionment of the loss in case of suicide—simply reducing the amount to be recovered, without defeating recovery itself. This same question has been decided by the Court of Appeals of Missouri, passing upon a provision identical with the contents of the policy under our consideration. In Keller v. Travelers' Insurance Co., 58 Mo. App. 557, the Missouri court held as follows as to reductions in cases of suicide: "A provision in a policy of life insurance, which reduces the amount of the insurance in case of the suicide of the insured below that otherwise contracted for, makes the suicide a defense to the extent of the reduction, and is, therefore, contrary to the statute on the subject and invalid." In the Keller Case the only question presented was whether or not the contract sued upon was in contravention of section 7896 of the Revised Statutes of Missouri, but, as in the present case, was embodied by the plaintiff in her petition. That section is as follows: "In all suits upon policies of insurance on life hereafter issued by any company doing business in this state, to a citizen of this state, it shall be no defense that the insured committed suicide, unless it shall be shown to the satisfaction of the court or jury trying the cause, that the insured contemplated suicide at the time he made his application for the policy; and any stipulation in the policy to the contrary shall be void." The clause of the policy relied on in the answer in this case is as follows: "But if death occurs from self destruction, while sane or insane, within one year from the date of issuance of this policy, then in such event only the reserve (computed according to the Actuaries' Table of Mortality, with interest at 4 per cent.) will be due on surrender of this policy."

The plaintiff in error urges that the clause of the policy invoked in this answer is a mere contractual limitation of the amount of the recovery to be had, and not a defense. Under the above-quoted decision of the Court of Appeals of Missouri we cannot agree with this contention. "The plain purpose of the statute quoted above was to prevent the insertion in policies of life insurance of exceptions of liability on the ground of the suicide of the insured, unless it could be proven 'that the insured contemplated suicide at the time he made the application for the policy.' This was in effect a legislative declaration of the public policy" of Missouri, the state which the company itself selected as the place of contract. In the Keller Case, above cited, the Court of Appeals of Missouri says: "That it was intended to limit the power to contract for a lesser liability in cases of death by suicide, not within the limitation expressed in the statute, is also apparent from its terms, to wit: 'And any stipulation to the contrary shall be void.' That it is not within the power of the parties to change or annul this statutory provision with reference to life insurance in this state has been held in a well-considered case in the circuit court of the United States. Berry v. Knights Templars', etc., Co. (C. C.) 46 Fed. 439. In construing the statute in question, that court said: 'The statute is mandatory, and obligatory alike on the insurance company and the assured. Its very object was to prohibit and annul such stipulations in policies, and it cannot be waived or abrogated by any form of contract or by any device whatever. The legislative will, when expressed in the peremptory terms of this statute, is paramount and absolute, and cannot be varied or waived by the private conventions of the parties.'"

For the same reasons as heretofore stated, we think that the question of attorney's fees and damages should also be determined by the laws of Missouri. As Chief Justice Jackson said in the case of Champion v. Wilson, supra, the court was pro hac vice sitting in Missouri, and the finding of the jury is in accordance with that law, which the Supreme Court of the United States has held to be constitutional and valid. "It was for the Legislature * * * to define the public policy of that state in respect of life insurance, and to impose such conditions on the transaction of business by life insurance companies within the state as was deemed best. We do not see any arbitrary classification or unlawful discrimination in this legislation; but, at all events, we cannot say that the federal Constitution has been violated in the exercise, in this regard, by the State of its undoubted power over corporations." Hancock Insurance Co. v. Warren, 181 U. S. 73, 21 Sup. Ct. 535, 45 L. Ed. 955. The reasoning in Railway Co. v. Ellis, 165 U. S. 150-153, 154, 17 Sup. Ct. 255, 41 L. Ed. 666, says the court, in Fidelity Mutual Life Association v. Mettler, 185 U. S. 326, 22 Sup. Ct. 669, 46 L. Ed. 922, does not apply to life insurance companies. "The ground for placing life and health companies in a different class from fire, marine, and inland companies is obvious, and we think that putting them in a different class * * * rests on sufficient reason. The Legislature evidently intended to distinguish between life and health insurance companies engaged in business for profit, * * * and lodges and associations of a mutual benefit or benevolent character, having in mind, also, the necessity of the prompt payment of the insurance money in very many cases in order to provide the means of living of which the beneficiaries had been deprived by the death of the insured." And in Orient Insurance Co. v. Daggs, 172 U. S. 557, 19 Sup. Ct. 281, 43 L. Ed. 552, the interpretation and construction of the Supreme Court of Missouri as to a similar statute was upheld. In Farmers' Insurance Co. v. Dobney, 189 U. S. 304, 23 Sup. Ct. 565, 47 L. Ed. 821, the Supreme Court of the United States, having under consideration the question of the allowance of attorney's fees and damages, and answering argument contending, as here, that such allowance was unconstitutional for various reasons, says: "But the unsoundness of these propositions is settled by the previous adjudications of this court. Orient Insurance Co. v. Daggs, 172 U. S. 557, 19 Sup. Ct. 281, 43 L. Ed. 552; Insurance Co. v. Warren, 181 U. S. 73, 21 Sup. Ct. 535, 45 L. Ed. 955; Insurance Co. v. Mettler, 185 U. S. 308, 22 Sup. Ct. 662, 46 L. Ed. 922. In the Orient Case, a statute of the state of Missouri which subjected fire insurance contracts to an exceptional rule was upheld, not only on the ground of the right of the state to prescribe the conditions upon which an insurance company should transact business within its borders, but also because the rule in question was the lawful exercise of the power to classify. In the Warren Case a like principle was applied to a statute of the state of Ohio establishing a particular regulation as to life insurance companies. In the Mettler Case a statute of the state of Texas was sustained, applicable alone to life insurance policies, which authorized the enforcement, not only of a reasonable attorney's fee, but, also of 12 per cent damages after demand in case of the unsuccessful defense of a suit to enforce a life insurance policy. In all three of the cases referred to, therefore, it was necessarily held that insurance contracts were so distinct as to justify legislative classification apart from other contracts, or to authorize a classification of insurance contracts so as to subject one character of such contracts, when put in one class, to one rule, and other varieties of such contracts, when placed in another class, to a different rule."

We come now to the complaint with reference to the striking of defendant's plea. If the court was right in adjudicating the case according to the laws of Missouri, it was clearly right in striking the defendant's answer, upon the ground that it constituted no defense. The defense was based upon five propositions:

(1) That Lovelace had made false statements in his application and failed to pay his premium. Under the statute of Missouri the company could not plead the application as a part of the contract, for it was not indorsed or the substance of the application entered on the policy. We hold, further, that it could not plead nonpayment of the premium, because the receipt of the premium was acknowledged in the policy, and it was estopped from denying this fact, especially in view of the death of the insured. The further portion of the fourth paragraph of the answer, that the policy was issued by reason of the false and fraudulent representations of Lovelace, and that the policy was procured by fraud, could not be considered after death of the insured. "The statements made in the application * * * were not warranties, and, before the company can be permitted to show that these false statements and answers contributed to the contingency on which the policy was to become due and payable, it must plead such defense, and, besides, it must deposit in court the premiums it received on the policy. And unless the company meets both these requirements the court should exclude the testimony * * * as to the cause of the insured's death, and as to his physical condition before and after his death, and give a peremptory instruction to find for plaintiff." "The company may, during the life of the insured, but not afterwards, bring a suit to set aside the policy on the ground that it was procured by fraud." Kern v. Legion of Honor, 167 Mo. 472, 67 S. W. 252.

(2) The fifth paragraph of defendant's answer denied that the premium was ever paid, and, as we said above, we think the recital of the policy that the premium had been paid es-tops the company to deny the receipt of the premium after the death of the insured.

(3) The sixth paragraph of the answer set up as a defense that "one of the conditions of said alleged contract of insurance was that, if within one year from the date thereof said Edwin Lovelace should become intemperate in the use of narcotic or other stimulants, any policy issued thereunder should be null and void; and this defendant alleges that the said Edwin Lovelace did become intemperate in the use of narcotic, alcoholic, or other stimulants, and that his death was the result of narcotic, alcoholic, or other stimulants." Counsel for plaintiff in error, in their very exhaustive brief, say: "We are at a loss to know how counsel for defendant in error ever convinced the court below that this one of the defenses was not good." We think that under the decision in Kern v. Legion of Honor, cited above, the answer should have been accompanied by the deposit in court of the premiums received; and without this, it is held unequivocally by the Supreme Court of Missouri that this defense should be dismissed.

(4) The seventh and eighth paragraphs of the answer were correctly stricken under the laws of Missouri—the seventh for the reason that the application was not indorsed upon the policy, and the eighth because the anti-suicide provision of the policy, as has been shown heretofore, is, under the laws of Missouri, void and of no effect. We have carefully examined all of the contentions of the learned counsel for the plaintiff in error, grouped in three heads: First. That the statute of the state of Missouri, allowing the recovery of damages and attorney's fees, will not be enforced by the courts of Georgia. Second. that the court erred in striking the defenses, which is assigned to be error upon three grounds: (a) That the main defenses, if proved, were good; (b) that the statutes of Missouri relative to misrepresentations and procurement of the policy by fraud, and relative to the suicide of the insured, are confined to citizens of Missouri; and (c) that the provision in the policy sued on, relative to the matter of suicide, was not in violation of the laws of Missouri. Third. That the evidence was not sufficient to authorize the verdict allowing the plaintiff damages and attorney's fees, because it did not show vexatious refusal on the part of the company to pay. For the reasons already heretofore stated we think the case was to be tried as if in Missouri and before a Missouri court, and that to deprive a citizen of Georgia of any rights belonging to a citizen of Missouri cannot, under the Constitution of the United States, be countenanced. Parties are presumed to contract with reference to the place of the contract. If it is valid there, it is valid everywhere. The lex loci contractus controls as to the nature, construction, and interpretation of the contract. The laws of one state have force in the territory of another, as long as they do not come in conflict with the power or right of that state, or violate its policy or conscience. Cox v. Adams, 2 Ga. 158. Where a contract is made in one state to be performed in another, the laws of the latter state govern as to the validity, nature, obligation, and construction of the contract (Dunn v. Welsh, 62 Ga. 241; Herschfeld v. Dixel, 12 Ga. 584); and they will be enforced by comity, unless contrary to our statute law, our general public policy, or violative of the conscience of the state called on to give it effect. We see no reason why a new trial should be granted because of the recovery of the attorney's fees and damages, especially as the Missouri statute is practically identical with our Georgia law upon the same subject. The only difference is that the state of Missouri imposes the penalty for a vexatious refusal, and the Georgia law (Civ. Code 1895, § 2140) makes bad faith in the refusal the basis for damages and attorney's fees. The various grounds of the second contention of the plaintiff in error have already been discussed, and so we come to the third.

Was the evidence of vexatious refusal sufficient to authorize the verdict upon the subject of damages and attorney's fees? We think that where it appears, as it does in this case, that the defendant had no ground of defense, or at least could set up none, to the payment of the policy, and yet declined to pay it, and thereby imposed upon the beneficiary a burden not contemplated in the original contract with the insured, and, without establishing any good reason for delay, subjects the widow and children of the dead to the expense of collecting by law what was contracted to be paid upon proofs of death, and extensively prolongs the litigation, it would be a great hardship if this loss and expense should be deducted from the provision made by the deceased for his family. On the other hand, we think that the expense necessary to collect the policy should be paid by the company, unless it establishes some good reason for an apparently frivolous refusal to pay promptly. In other words, the burden of proof, where unusual and unnecessary delay is shown, should be upon the company to give reason for the delay; or, after the delay is shown, it will be presumed to be vexatious, as in this case, or in bad faith, if under our Georgia statute. It must appear, from the evidence in this case, that the refusal or the neglect to pay was frivolous. The purpose of the law is to force prompt payment of such losses, after the lapse of a reasonable time, to enable the company to ascertain good grounds, if any, for not meeting the demand, and if no such cause existed for the refusal of compliance with the demand, and it refuses to respond, the company does so subject to the further claim for damages. Cotton States Life Ins. Co. v. Edwards, 74 Ga. 231. The meaning of the term "bad faith" is "any frivolous or unfounded refusal in law or in fact to comply with the requisition of the policy holder to pay according to the terms of his contract and the conditions imposed by the statute." We can hardly imagine anything that would be more "vexatious" than the treatment—the silent contempt—the plaintiff received at the hands of the company up to the time the suit was brought. We think the evidence authorized the jury to find that there was a vexatious refusal; and it was a benefit to the company that the penalty was affixed by the Missouri statute, instead of under the provisions of our Code, which would have allowed a larger penalty. For the decision in Phenix Insurance Co. v. Hart, 112 Ga. 765, 38 S. E. 67, holding section 2140 of the Civil Code of 1895 to be unconstitutional, was based entirely upon the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in Gulf, Colorado & Santa Fé Railway Co. v. Ellis, 165 U. S. 150, 17 Sup. Ct. 255, 41 L. Ed. 668, as controlling authority; and, since the decision in the Phenix Case, the Supreme Court of the United States has held, in the Mettler Case, 185 U. S. 308, 22 Sup. Ct. 662, 46 L. Ed. 922, that the ruling in the Ellis Case is confined to railway companies only, and has no application whatever to penalties imposed on insurance companies.

Judgment affirmed.

POWELL, J. (concurring specially). I cannot agree with all the reasoning by which my Brethren of this court arrive at the result in this Case. Indeed, it is only with hesitation that I am able to concur at all. It does seem, however, that if the insurance statutes of Missouri are to be read into the contract of insurance as a part thereof, these laws, as construed by the decisions of the courts of review in that state, authorize an affirmance of the judgment. The difficulty is that these statutes do not on their face purport to include the plaintiff within their purview. By express language they are applicable only to policies of insurance written upon the lives of citizens of Missouri; and it is presumed that as to policies of insurance not written upon lives of its own citizens the common law still prevails in that state. But I have finally come to the conclusion that, since policies of insurance are to be most strongly construed against the insurer, the language of the policy, wherein it contracts that the rights of the parties thereunder shall be determined in accordance with the laws of Missouri, contemplates these statutes, and not the common law merely; in other words, that the policy contracted to give to Lovelace the same rights which he would have if he were a citizen of Missouri.

In this view of the question I am able to concur in the judgment.

BAILEY & CARNEY BUGGY CO. v. GUTHRIE. (No. 149.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. March 2, 1907.)

1. BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—FORM AND ARRANGEMENT—WRIT OF ERROR—DISMISSAL—STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

Under Civ. Code 1895, § 5532, taken in connection with Acts 1893, p. 52 (Civ. Code 1895, § 5534), it is mandatory that the trial judge certify the bill of exceptions to be true; but the remainder of the prescribed form of the certificate is directory only, and no error or misdirection therein contained will operate to cause a dismissal of the writ of error in the appellate court.

2. WRIT OF ERROR—REVIEW—PRESUMPTIONS—MAKING AND FILING BILL OF EXCEPTIONS.

Unless the contrary affirmatively appears, the certifying, serving, and filing of a bill of exceptions are to be regarded as having taken place in their proper chronological sequence.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, §§ 3795-3803.]

3. PLEADING—MOTION TO STRIKE—GROUNDS.

While a plea or answer which sets up no legal or equitable defense, being bad in substance, may be stricken on motion at the trial term, yet such a motion is not available where the plea states a substantial defense, but is merely deficient in certainty or particularity.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 39, Pleading, §§ 1102-1110.]

4. SAME—PLEA—CONSTRUCTION.

The plea in this case was not subject to the construction that it admitted a sum to be due by the defendant to the plaintiff in excess of the amount found by the jury in the latter's favor.

5. WRIT OF ERROR—REVIEW.

The objections to the evidence were not well taken, the charges complained of are not erroneous for any of the reasons assigned, and the verdict is not without sufficient evidence to support it.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Nashville; Peoples, Judge.

Action between the Bailey & Carney Buggy Company and one Guthrie. From the judgment, the Bailey & Carney Buggy Company bring error. Affirmed.

Alexander & Gary, for plaintiff in error. Hendricks, Smith & Christian and Bule & Knight, for defendant in error.

POWELL, J. Since we have deemed it unnecessary to elaborate in the opinion the points decided in the headnotes 3 to 5, inclusive, we shall set forth only so much of the facts as are necessary to an understanding of what is decided upon the motion to dismiss the bill of exceptions. The assignment of error is to the overruling of a motion for a new trial, and no evidence is contained in the bill of exceptions, but the brief of the evidence is specified by the plaintiff in error as a necessary part of the record. The certificate of the judge, in addition to verifying the bill of exceptions, certifies that it "contains all of the evidence and specifies all of the record material to a clear understanding of the errors complained of," and concludes in regular form. The point is made that the certificate, in referring to the evidence, employs the word "contains," instead of the word "specifies." Civ. Code 1895, § 5534 (Acts 1893, p. 52), provides: "It shall be the duty of the judge, to whom any bill of exceptions is presented, to see that the certificate is in legal form before signing the same; and no failure of any judge to discharge his duty in this respect shall prejudice the rights of the parties by dismissal or otherwise." Prior to the adoption of this statute compliance with the prescribed form of certificate to a bill of exceptions was mandatory, and a certificate in the form used in the present case would not have been sufficient. Gresham v. Turner, 88 Ga. 160, 13 S. E. 946; Lovingood v. Roberts, 89 Ga. 417, 15 S. E. 495; Holland v. Van Bell, 89 Ga. 223, 15 S. E. 302. Since the adoption of this statute the Supreme Court has, reluctantly at first (see Pusey v. Sweat, 92 Ga. 809, 19 S. E. 816, and Gregory v. Daniel, 93 Ga. 795, 20 S. E. 656), but finally fully, yielded its assent to the principle that as to everything in the certificate presented by the Civil Code of 1895, § 5532, except the actual verification of the bill of exceptions, the form is directory only. Scott v. Whipple, 116 Ga. 214, 42 S. E. 519.

The further point is made, in the motion to dismiss, that "the writ of error is not dated, and there is no way to ascertain whether the writ was signed before the acknowledgment of service or not, or to ascertain whether the bill of exceptions was filed in the clerk's office before acknowledgment of service." "The presumption is that the different steps taken in having the certificate signed, service acknowledged, and the bill of exceptions filed were in their proper chronological sequence." McCain v. Bonner, 122 Ga. 843, 51 S. E. 36. The cases of Vickers v. Sanders, 106 Ga. 266, 32 S. E. 102, and Cooper v. State, 121 Ga. 578, 49 S. E. 707, holding to the contrary, were expressly overruled in Porter v. Holmes, 122 Ga. 784, 50 S. E. 923. Bush v. Keaton, 65 Ga. 296, was decided prior to the passage of the act of 1881, touching this subject-matter. So that the bill of exceptions will not be dismissed; but, under our holding as contained in the last three headnotes above, the judgment will be affirmed on the merits of the case. Judgment affirmed.

BENNETT v. CRUMPTON. (No. 122.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. March 22, 1907.)

1. SLANDER—JUSTIFICATION—FACTS CONSTITUTING.

A. brought suit against B. for slander for using of and concerning him the following words: "It is the general belief among the negroes and a great many white people that A. broke open the smokehouse of C., a negro, and stole therefrom a quantity of meat and syrup." A plea of justification was insufficient which alleged that B. had used such words and that his statement as to the existence of such belief of A.'s guilt was the truth. The plea should have averred further that A. was in fact guilty of the crime imputed to him by the report and belief which B. had repeated. The proof necessary to establish a plea of justification in such case would be A.'s guilt of the crime imputed to him as shown by a preponderance of the testimony. Proof of the fact that it was the common report and belief in the neighborhood that A. was guilty would not be sufficient. "Tale-bearers are as bad as tale-makers," and it is no defense that the speaker did not originate the slander, but heard it from another.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 32, Libel and Slander, §§ 104, 222.]

2. SAME.

The court erred in instructing the jury that the plea of justification would be established by a preponderance of the evidence showing that the statement made by B. as to the existence of the general belief that A. was guilty of the crime imputed to him, was true.

3. SAME.

The court erred in refusing a written request to charge embodying the principle stated in the first headnote.

4. SAME—ACTIONS—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

The court also erred in admitting testimony to the effect that it was "the general belief and report of the neighborhood that A. was guilty of breaking open the smokehouse of C., and stealing his meat and syrup," in support of the plea of justification. Such evidence would be admissible in mitigation of damages.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Dublin; Burch, Judge.

Action by K. H. Bennett against R. H. Crumpton. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

George B. Davis and Ira S. Chappell, for plaintiff in error. John S. Adams, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. K. H. Bennett brought suit against R. H. Crumpton, in the city court of Dublin, for slander in using of and concerning him the following words: "It is the general belief among the negroes and a great many white people that K. H. Bennett broke open the smokehouse of Lee Tillery, a negro, and stole therefrom a quantity of meat and syrup." The defendant filed the following plea: "That he did * * * use the words of and concerning the plaintiff as set out in the * * * petition, and he asserts that the report concerning the plaintiff * * * is and was true; and defendant stands ready to prove the same." The plaintiff demurred to this plea because "it is too vague and uncertain, and does not amount to a plea of justification, because it does not admit the truth of the charge and imputation of burglary and theft as charged in the declaration, and offer to prove the same, but admits only the report concerning the plaintiff, and offers only to prove that said report is true." The court overruled this demurrer, and allowed the plea to stand as a sufficient plea of justification. The court instructed the jury that the plea would be sustained if the preponderance of the evidence established the truth of the admission, to wit, that it was the general opinion among the negroes and a good many white people that the plaintiff had stolen the meat and syrup from the negro mentioned. The error assigned in this charge was that it confined the jury to a consideration of the question of opinion in the community as to the plaintiff's guilt, creating the impression on the minds of the jury that, if the defendant succeeded in proving that such was the opinion in the neighborhood, the plea of justification would be fully proved; whereas the court should have charged that, in order for the plea of justification to avail, it was necessary for the defendant to prove by a preponderance of the evidence that the plaintiff was guilty of the burglary and larceny as set out in the declaration. The court refused a written request to give the following charge: "In order for defendant to sustain the plea of justification, it is necessary for him to prove, by a preponderance of the testimony, that Bennett is guilty of breaking open Tillery's smokehouse and stealing therefrom his meat and syrup. Then your verdict must be for the defendant, for then the defendant would have made good his plea of justification by proving to your satisfaction that Bennett is guilty as charged in the declaration, and he was justified in using the language concerning Bennett, because it was the truth. If, on the other hand, a preponderance of the testimony convinces you that Bennett is not guilty of breaking open Tillery's smokehouse and stealing his meat and syrup, then your verdict should be for the plaintiff in some amount. It makes no difference what the common belief is or the current reports in the community." It is also claimed that the court allowed, over the plaintiff's objection, certain witnesses to testify that "it is the common report or belief in the neighborhood that Bennett stole Lee Tillery's meat and syrup, and the people generally believe that he did it." The objection made to this testimony was that "it was hearsay and inadmissible, and incompetent to prove a charge of burglary and larceny."

We do not think the plea or the evidence submitted in support thereof sufficiently averred or proved justification. One who repeats a charge imputing to another a crime, when called upon to account, cannot legally justify by showing that the alleged slander originated with others, and that he merely repeated it. Under the plea of justification he must go further, and prove by a preponderance of the testimony that the plaintiff did as a matter of fact and truth commit the offense with which he is charged. "Every repetition of a slander originated by a third person is a willful publication of it, rendering the person so repeating it liable to an action. 'Tale-bearers are as bad as tale-makers.' And it is no defense that the speaker did not originate the scandal, but heard it from another, even though it was a current rumor and he in good faith believed it to be true." Newell on Slander and Libel, 350. "Thus, if the libel complained of be 'A. B. said that plaintiff had been guilty of fraud, etc.,' it is no avail to plead that A. B. did in fact make that statement on the occasion specified. Each repetition is a fresh defamation, and the defendant by repeating A. B.'s words has made them his own, and is legally as liable as if he had invented the story himself. The only plea of justification which will be an answer to the action must not merely allege that A. B. did in fact say so, but must go on to aver with all necessary particularity that every word which A. B. is reported to have said is true in substance and in fact." Odgers on Libel and Slander, 173.

This rule, as declared by these standard authorities, is abundantly supported by the courts. A few decisions hold that slanderous words may be justified by giving another as the author by whom the assertion had previously been made, but it is generally held that this is not the law, both by the courts of England and this country. Bennett v. Bennett, 6 C. & P. 588; De Crespigny v. Wellesley, 5 Bing. 392, 2 M. & P. 695; Dole v. Lyon, 10 Johns. (N. Y.) 447, 6 Am. Dec. 346; Treat v. Browning, 4 Conn. 408, 10 Am. Dec. 156; Graves v. State, 9 Ala. 450. In Waters v. Jones, 3 Port. (Ala.) 442, 29 Am. Dec. 261, the words were: "It is the general opinion of the people in Jones' neighborhood that he burnt Coleman's gin-house"—and it was held that they were actionable, and that proof that such was the belief would furnish no defense. In the case of Brewer v. Chase, 121 Mich. 526, 80 N. W. 575, 46 L. R. A. 397, 80 Am. St. Rep. 527, it was held that "where one publishes that he has heard that another has been guilty of certain disgraceful conduct, though he give the source of his information, he makes the charge his own, and must show, in an action for libel, to constitute justification, not merely that he has in fact heard it, but that the charge itself is true." In Kenney v. McLaughlin, 5 Gray (Mass.) 3, 66 Am. Dec. 345, the court says: "The 'story' uttered or repeated by the defendant contains a charge against the plaintiff of a nature to destroy her reputation. * * * It is no answer, in any forum, to say that she only repeated the story as she heard it. If the story was false and slanderous, she must repeat it at her peril. There is safety in no other rule." In McPherson v. Daniels, 10 Barn. & C. 263, it was held that if A. said of X. that he was a thief, and C. published that A. said of X. that he was a thief, in a certain sense C. would publish the truth, but not in a sense that would constitute a defense. See, also, Giddens v. Mirk, 4 Ga. 364. But we do not think it necessary to multiply authorities on this point. Our own Supreme Court, in Cox v. Strickland, 101 Ga. 482 (3), 28 S. E. 655, declares the law to be as herein contended—that, to justify the repetition of an accusation of crime, the proof must show, not only the fact of the accusation, but the truth of the accusation. From what we have said it follows that, in our opinion, the charge of the court complained of, and the refusal to give the charge requested, were erroneous.

We also think that the court erred in admitting the testimony to the effect that it was the general belief and report of the neighborhood that the plaintiff was guilty of breaking open the smokehouse of Lee Tillery and stealing his meat and syrup. Common fame may probably be given in evidence in mitigation of damages, but not in support of a plea of justification.

The judgment of the trial court refusing a new trial is reversed.

(1 Ga. App. 162)

ATLANTA, K. & N. RY. CO. v. SMITH.
(No. 26.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Feb. 13, 1907.)

1. DEATH—PARTIES TO ACTION—BENEFICIARIES.

Under the statutes of Tennessee, the right of action which a person who dies from injuries received from another, or whose death is caused by the wrongful act, omission, or killing of another, would have had against the wrongdoer in case death had not ensued, does not abate, or is not extinguished, by his death, but passes to his widow, and, in case there is no widow, to his children, or to his personal representative, for the benefit of his widow or next of kin. Therefore, when the employé of a railway company is killed in Tennessee by the negligence of the company, either his administrator or his widow can bring suit for such negligent homicide. In either case the recovery inures to the beneficiaries designated by the statute.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 15, Death, §§ 38, 42.]

2. PARTIES—DESCRIPTION—AMENDMENT.

Where such a suit was brought in this state by the widow, suing as administratrix, for the benefit of herself as widow, an amendment striking the descriptive word "administratrix" from the declaration, and leaving the suit to proceed in the individual name of the widow, was properly allowed. Civ. Code 1895, §§ 5106, 5105, 3361. The right of amendment, being remedial and pertaining solely to the method of procedure, is governed by the lex fori.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 37, Parties, § 165.]

3. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS—COMMENCEMENT OF ACTION—AMENDMENT AS TO PARTIES.

Such amendment does not substitute a new party for the original plaintiff, or make a new cause of action, so as to open the case to the statute of limitations, but the amendment relates back to the commencement of the action, so as to defeat the bar of the statute of limitations.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 33, Limitation of Actions, § 543.]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Atlanta; Reid, Judge.

Action by Mrs. Maude Smith against the Atlanta, Knoxville & Northern Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Smith, Hammond & Smith, for plaintiff in error. Arnold & Arnold, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. On August 11, 1902, Mrs. Maude Smith, as administratrix of Clyde Smith, deceased, brought suit in the city court of Atlanta against the Atlanta, Knoxville & Northern Railway Company. The suit was for damages resulting from the homicide of said Clyde Smith, who was killed in a wreck on the line of the defendant's railway in the state of Tennessee. The injuries were inflicted September 25, 1901, and the deceased died therefrom September 26, 1901. The statutes of Tennessee, under which the suit was brought, were set up in the declaration, and are as follows: Code of Tennessee 1858, § 3130: "The right of action which a person, who dies from injuries received from another, or whose death is caused by the wrongful act, omission, or killing of another, would have had against the wrong-doer in case death had not ensued, shall not abate or be extinguished by his death, but shall pass to his widow, and in case there is no widow, to his children, or to his personal representative for the benefit of his widow or next of kin, free from the claims of creditors." Section 3131: "The action may be instituted by the personal representative of the deceased; but if he decline, the widow and children of the deceased may, without the consent of the representative, use his name in bringing and prosecuting the suit, on giving bond and security for costs, or in the form prescribed by paupers. The personal representative shall not in such case be responsible for costs, unless he sign his name to the prosecution." It will be seen that these statutes give the personal representative the right to prosecute the cause of action "which a person, who dies from injuries received from another, or whose death is caused by the wrongful act, omission, or killing of another, would have had against the wrong-doer in case death had not ensued." The right of action survives, to be prosecuted by the personal representative of the deceased for the benefit of his widow, and, in case there is no widow, to his children; and, in the event of neither widow nor children, for the benefit of the next of kin of the deceased, "free from the claims of creditors." In other words, the personal representative is the nominal plaintiff, the recovery being for the beneficiaries named; and in order that the rights of the beneficiaries might be fully protected, and to guard against the failure of the personal representative to sue, the widow and children are allowed to use his name without his consent, and bring the suit, under certain conditions as to costs, etc.

To the original petition filed in this case by the administratrix, for the benefit of the widow and two minor children, the defendant submitted certain special demurrers. These demurrers were all overruled, and, on exceptions, this judgment was carried to the Supreme Court. That court decided adversely to all the demurrers, except as to misjoinder of parties. The court held that the allegations setting forth the names and ages of the minor children were irrelevant, and should be stricken as surplusage, that the fact that there is a widow is all that is necessary to give a right of action to the representative, and that whether a recovery by the representative, upon the ground that there is a widow, would inure to the benefit of the children, as well as to that of the widow, are matters of no concern to the defendant. The court held that the petition, with surplusage stricken, set forth a good cause of action, under the Tennessee statutes, by the administratrix, for the benefit of the widow. Atlanta, Knoxville & Northern Ry. Co. v. Smith, 119 Ga. 669, 46 S. E. 853. The petition was amended in accordance with the foregoing decision of the Supreme Court, and the case came to trial in the city court of Atlanta, March 6, 1905. The plaintiff tendered in evidence temporary letters of administration on the estate of Clyde Smith, issuing out of the court of ordinary of Fannin county, Ga. To this evidence the defendant objected, and, pending argument on this objection, plaintiff amended her declaration by striking therefrom the word "administratrix," and leaving the suit to proceed in the name of Maude Smith, as widow. In support of this amendment, the plaintiff set up the statute of Tennessee (1871) authorizing such suits to be instituted by the widow in her own name. The defendant objected to this amendment on the following grounds: (1) Because the effect of said amendment was to substitute a new party plaintiff to prosecute the cause of action originally instituted. (2) Because said amendment was not germane to the original suit, and sets up a new cause of action. (3) Because the original suit was not such a suit as is contemplated by the Code of Georgia authorizing amendments as to striking, and insertion, of representative capacity as found in section 5106, such section having reference solely to actions brought by or against estates for the recovery of, or relating to, property or assets of such estates. (4) Because said amendment shows on its face that, if allowed, the cause of action was barred by the statute of limitations, no suit having been brought in behalf of the widow within two years of the time of the injury resulting in the death of her husband, Clyde Smith, and said cause of action being subject to the bar of the statute of limitations of two years. (5) Because the statutes of Tennessee, pleaded by the plaintiff and relied upon by her to maintain the cause of action in said case, only authorize the widow to institute a suit, and do not authorize her to be made a party to the suit brought by the personal representative. (6) Because said amendment sets forth a new cause of action.

(7) Because, under the pleadings and the proof tendered by the plaintiff prior to said amendment, said proof being temporary letters of administration in behalf of Maude Smith as temporary administratrix of the estate of Clyde Smith, deceased, no suit had been brought, up to the time said amendment was offered, that could be maintained under the said statutes of Tennessee. These objections were overruled, and said amendment allowed on March 6, 1905, and said case allowed to proceed in the name and behalf of Mrs. Maude Smith, as widow of Clyde Smith, deceased. To the judgment allowing said amendment over the objections of the defendant exceptions pendente lite were made, allowed, and certified, and proper assignment of error made thereon in the bill of exceptions. After the amendment was allowed the defendant made a written motion to dismiss the whole case, on the ground that, as amended, it set forth no cause of action. The court overruled this motion, and the defendant then excepted, now excepts, and says that the court erred in not sustaining said motion. Exceptions pendente lite were duly tendered, allowed, and made part of the record; and error on this judgment is properly assigned in the bill of exceptions.

Defendant then tendered a plea of the statute of limitations, which was, on plaintiff's motion, rejected, and defendant likewise excepted to the order rejecting said plea, duly tendered exceptions pendente lite, which were allowed and made part of the record, and error is properly assigned in the bill of exceptions on this order and judgment. The averments of this plea are here set out in full: "(1) While said original suit on its face purports to have been brought by Maude Smith as administratrix of Clyde Smith, deceased, the said Maude Smith at the time said suit was brought was not in fact the administratrix of said Clyde Smith, deceased, and was not then the personal representative of said Clyde Smith, deceased. Said Maude Smith was on the 5th day of December, 1904, appointed administratrix of the estate of Clyde Smith by the ordinary of Fannin county, Ga.; and until said appointment she was not the personal representative of said Clyde Smith, deceased. (2) Until said suit was so amended as to convert same into a suit by Maude Smith as widow of Clyde Smith, deceased, no suit had been instituted upon said cause of action by the widow of Clyde Smith, suing as such, or by the personal representative of Clyde Smith, suing for the benefit of his widow, and the personal representative or the widow of Clyde Smith, as the case may be, alone are entitled, under the law of Tennessee, to maintain the suit upon said cause of action, as appears from the copies of the statutes of Tennessee, set forth in pleadings of the plaintiff in said case. (3) At the time said amendment converting said suit into a suit by Maude Smith, as the widow of Clyde Smith, as plaintiff in said case, was allowed and filed, to wit, on March 6, 1905, more than two years had elapsed since the injuries resulting in the death of Clyde Smith were received by him, to wit, on September 25, 1901, and more than two years had elapsed since the death of said Clyde Smith, to wit, September 26, 1901, and more than two years had elapsed from said dates of injury and death as aforesaid before said Maude Smith was appointed administratrix of the estate of said Clyde Smith, deceased, to wit, on December 5, 1904. (4) The statute of limitations applicable to said cause of action is two years, and the same began to run from the date of said injuries."

After this preliminary skirmish of pleading, the real battle took place, and resulted in a substantial victory for the plaintiff in a verdict for $20,000. The trial court, in the exercise of its discretion, set aside this verdict and granted a new trial. On the second trial, April 9, 1906, plaintiff obtained a verdict for $5,000. The defendant made a motion for a new trial, which was overruled, whereupon the defendant excepted and brings to this court the whole record, including exceptions pendente lite to rulings on the first trial. In this court the plaintiff in error abandoned all assignments of error, except, first, the order of the court allowing the plaintiff to amend her declaration by striking therefrom the allegation that she was suing in her capacity as "administratrix" of Clyde Smith, and inserting in lieu thereof herself as widow of Clyde Smith; second, the overruling of the motion to dismiss the petition as amended; and, third, the rejection of the plea of the statute of limitations. These assignments constitute the gravamen of the case to be reviewed by this court.

1, 2. Did the court err in allowing the amendment to the petition, striking therefrom the allegation that Mrs. Maude Smith was the administratrix of the estate of Clyde Smith, and inserting in lieu thereof herself as the widow of Clyde Smith, and allowing the suit to proceed in her individual name? Under the original petition based on the sections of the Tennessee Code therein set up and proved the suit was brought by the administratrix for the benefit of his widow and two minor children. The Supreme Court of this state held that this was a good suit in behalf of the widow. Atlanta, K. & N. Ry. Co. v. Smith, 119 Ga. 667, 48 S. E. 853. The administratrix was only a nominal plaintiff; the real plaintiff being the widow. Under the law of Tennessee, the right of action given to the husband passed, by virtue of this statute, to his personal representative, for the benefit of his widow. And even under the law prior to the act of 1871 the widow had the right to prosecute the suit in the name of the personal representative under certain conditions. The act of 1871 (page 70, c. 78, Acts Tenn. 1871) amended the law on this subject by providing that the right of action which the deceased husband would have had if he had not died shall pass to his widow, and allowing the widow to prosecute the suit in her own name. The Supreme Court of Tennessee in Webb v. Railway Co., 88 Tenn. 128, 12 S. W. 430, construing the old law and the act of 1871 amendatory thereof, says: "Both before and since the amendment, the administrator is in fact a nominal plaintiff, the recovery being for the widow and children. * * * When we consider the object in view, and when we take the language of the amendatory act itself, we are led to the conclusion that the Legislature intended merely to give the cause of action to the widow in her own name in preference to any administrator, but not to the exclusion of an administrator where the widow elected not to sue."

When this suit was filed, either the administratrix or the widow had the right to bring it. The plaintiff, as administratrix, filed the suit as the nominal plaintiff, for her individual benefit as the real party at interest. The amendment allowed under the act of 1871 simply eliminated from the case the nominal party, and substituted therefor the real party. There was no change of persons, but the real party interested in the suit, and in whom was placed the right of action, took the place of the nominal party. The substance was exchanged for the shell. While such change secured and perfected the rights of the real plaintiff, we cannot see how it injuriously affected any of the rights of the defendant. It is well settled that the question presented by the allowance of this amendment must be determined according to the remedial statutes of this state. The right to sue, and the persons authorized to bring suit, are governed by the laws of Tennessee, where the cause of action arose. The method of suit is determined by the laws of the state where the suit is brought. "The practice of the lex fori in respect to pleadings, amendments, and the general mode of procedure will control, if it differs from the practice in the state where the cause of action arose." This rule is so perfectly familiar as to render citation of authority unnecessary. South Carolina Railroad Co. v. Nix, 68 Ga. 572 (4a); O'Shields v. Railway Co., 83 Ga. 621, 10 S. E. 268, 6 L. R. A. 152. This being true, section 5106 of the Civil Code of 1895 applies and conclusively settles the question. This section is as follows: "In an action by or against an executor, administrator, or other representative, the declaration may be amended by striking out the representative character of such plaintiff or defendant. And in an action by or against an individual, the pleadings may be amended by inserting his representative character." The amendment in this case simply struck the representative character of the plaintiff, who was only the nominal plaintiff, and left the suit to proceed in the individual name of the widow, who was the real plaintiff, and, so far as the defendant was concerned, the only person who had any right to the recovery or any interest therein. Atlantic, K. & N. Ry. Co. v. Smith, 119 Ga. 669, 46 S. E. 853, supra.

But it is insisted that under the law of Tennessee, presumably the common law, a temporary administrator was not such personal representative as was authorized to bring the suit. The declaration in this case alleged generally that the plaintiff was the administratrix of Clyde Smith, deceased; and for the purpose of deciding the question made by the amendment, in the absence of a special demurrer, we must assume that she was the regular or permanent administratrix; but, conceding that the suit was brought by her as temporary administratrix, and that by the laws of Tennessee such administratrix could not bring the suit, she being also the widow, clearly entitled to bring the suit under said laws, the right to strike the word "administratrix," merely a word descriptio personæ, and leave the suit to proceed in her name as widow, is manifest. In other words, the allegations of the declaration with this word left out making a good cause of action in behalf of the widow, such word can be stricken out as a misdescription, and the suit stand as a good one in the name of the widow. The widow has an individual right to recover under the Tennessee statute, without reference to whom the proceeds are afterwards to be distributed. Certainly she would have such right as to her own individual interest in the proceeds, and the suit, as amended, would therefore be a perfectly good suit as to her. Act 1871, p. 70, c. 78, Acts Tenn.; Webb v. Railway Co., 88 Tenn. 119, 12 S. W. 428; Greenlee v. Railroad Co., 5 Lea (Tenn.) 418; Hooper v. Railroad, 107 Tenn. 712, 65 S. W. 405; A., K. & N. R. Co. v. Smith, 119 Ga. 669, 46 S. E. 853. We might therefore well hold that the suit as originally brought was by the widow in her individual capacity, and that the amendment was really unnecessary, on the assumption that she, as the temporary administratrix, was not authorized to bring suit, but as the widow she was so authorized.

The case of Flatley v. Memphis & Charleston Ry. Co., 9 Helsk. (Tenn.) 230, is relied upon by counsel for plaintiff in error. That was a suit before the act of 1871, and was by the widow of the deceased who had been negligently killed by the defendant. Under the law as it then existed, she had no right to bring a suit as widow of the deceased, except in the name of the personal representative, and to prevent the defeat of such suit an amendment was made, substituting the administrator as plaintiff. The amendment was allowed, but the court held that prior to such amendment no suit had been brought for this cause of action that could be maintained, and the statute of limitations of Tennessee was sustained. When the present suit was brought, the widow did have the right of action under the law of Tennessee, and, after the words of description had been stricken out by the amendment, it left the cause of action in the name of the widow substantially as it had been from the filing of the original declaration. It is also insisted by counsel for plaintiff in error that the amendment substituted the widow as the personal representative of the deceased, as plaintiff, for the widow as an individual. If this be true, such right is fully given by the latter part of section 5106 of the Civil Code of 1895, which says: "And in an action by or against an individual, the pleadings may be amended by inserting his representative character." We think it wholly immaterial, under this section of the Code, and under section 3361, whether the amendment changes the character of the suit from that of an individual into a suit by the personal representative, or by the administrator as personal representative into a suit by the widow as personal representative, for all of these changes are clearly provided for under Code sections, supra.

3. If, therefore, this amendment was properly allowed, it follows as a corollary that it did not open up the suit to the statute of limitations. The amendment relates back to the date of the original declaration, and, if it be not barred, the amendment will be not barred. That an amendment properly allowed does relate back to the date of the filing of the original declaration is too well settled to admit of doubt. That this amendment did not substitute a new party nor set up any new cause of action we have endeavored to show. The cause of action was that of the deceased, passing at his death to his widow or personal representative. Unnecessary words of description, describing the plaintiff as administratrix, were stricken out, leaving the same person as an individual, in her individual right, to prosecute the suit. That such an amendment relates back to the filing of the suit so as to prevent the bar of the statute of limitations has been repeatedly held by our Supreme Court. Colley v. Gate City Coffin Co., 92 Ga. 664, 18 S. E. 817; Verdery v. Barrett, 89 Ga. 349, 15 S. E. 476; South Carolina R. Co. v. Nix, 68 Ga. 572; Rutherford v. Hobbs, 63 Ga. 243; Flatley v. Railroad Co., 9 Helsk. 230; Hooper v. Railway Co., 107 Tenn. 712, 65 S. W. 405.

We have given to the able argument of the counsel for the plaintiff our earnest and careful consideration. We do not in this opinion think it necessary to follow him in the many phases of the objections which he has so forcibly urged against the allowance of the amendment in question, nor in his contention that the statute of limitations, after the amendment had been allowed, was fatal to the suit. We think there can be no doubt that the vital question in this case, to wit, the allowance of the amendment, is fully governed by the provisions of our Civil Code, supra, on the subject. These provisions are liberal in behalf of the substantial rights of parties. Subtle distinctions or overnice constructions, which tend to destroy or render doubtful the enforcement of right and justice, should not be favored. The trend of modern judicial utterance is to make plain the pathway of the law, and to make impossible the defeat of substantial rights by mere technicalities. Apply these observations to the facts of this case. A man is killed in Tennessee by the negligent conduct of the railroad company. The law of that state plainly says that the right of action for such wrong is in the deceased, but shall not die with him, and survives to his widow or personal representative. Either one can set in motion the legal machinery to enforce the right of action against the wrongdoer, or, to use the expressive language of the learned counsel for plaintiff in error, "either one is the legal conduit through whom the fruits of recovery could reach the beneficiaries entitled." The widow begins as the administratrix, merely as a formal party. Preferring to proceed as the real party at interest, she simply strikes from her declaration the useless word of description, "administratrix," but with that word gone she leaves the suit, in the name of the widow, complete and perfect as to form and substance. Conceding her undoubted right to recover as the widow, can it be possible that in getting rid of the descriptive word she thereby gives the death-blow to her right? To so hold, it seems to us, would not only be the death of the spirit of the law and the exaltation of its mere form, but would result in the infliction of a great wrong, and would be violative of the express letter of our Code sections, supra, on the subject of amendments.

For the reasons above given, we hold that the court did not err in allowing the amendment and overruling the motion to dismiss the suit, and in rejecting the plea of the statute of limitations.

Judgment affirmed.

(1 Ga. App. 380)

NORTH BRITISH & MERCANTILE INS. CO. v. TYE. (No. 24.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Feb. 13, 1907.)

1. INSURANCE—POLICY CONSTRUCTION.

Insurance is a matter of contract. An insurance policy is a contract of indemnity for loss, and the intention of the parties, if it can be ascertained, must determine the sense in which the terms employed are used. This intention of the parties must be sought for in accordance with the true meaning and spirit in which the agreement was made and expressed in the written instrument, and the ordinary and legal meaning of the words employed must be taken into consideration.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 28, Insurance, §§ 172, 292.]

2. SAME—PROPERTY INSURED.

In the absence of proof that it was the intention of the parties to include houses disconnected with a "two-story frame building and its additions adjoining and communicating," a contract thus describing the insured property will not be construed to include a servant's house 150 feet distant from the two-story frame building, although occupied exclusively by domestic servants employed in the dwelling house of the assured, and although connected therewith by a system of call bells.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 28, Insurance, §§ 339-341.]

3. SAME.

In some cases the valuation of the property and the premium collected thereon may be submitted to the jury, in ascertaining the intention of the parties, in addition to the intention to be drawn from the words used to describe the property insured in the policy.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Atlanta; Reid, Judge.

Action by Carrie W. Tye against the North British & Mercantile Insurance Company. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant brings error. Reversed.

King, Spalding & Little, for plaintiff in error. Spencer R. Atkinson and John L. Tye, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. The question in this case is one of liability or nonliability under a state of facts undisputed. Mrs. Carrie W. Tye brought suit on two policies of insurance which she had on her dwelling at 740 Peachtree street, in the city of Atlanta, and the result of the issue depends upon the construction which is to be placed upon the descriptive terms of these insurance policies. The property insured was described in one of them as "$4,000 on her two-story frame, shingle-roof building and additions thereto, occupied by assured as a dwelling only, and situated at No. 740 on the west side of Peachtree street in Atlanta, Georgia," the other as "$4,000 upon the two-story shingle-roof frame building and its additions adjoining and communicating, while occupied as a dwelling-house, and situated at No. 740 on the west side of Peachtree street, Atlanta, Georgia." The lot upon which the dwelling in question stood fronts 80 feet on Peachtree street, and extends back 400 feet to another street. The main dwelling occupied the front; and commencing at the rear of the house and extending around the entire lot to the rear of the house was a plank inclosure. In the rear of the dwelling and within this inclosure, at a distance of about 150 feet, was a one-story two-room servant house, which at the time of the fire was occupied by the domestic servants of the assured. This servant's house, which was entirely apart from the dwelling or any other building, was connected with the dwelling by two wires and electric call bells, by which the servants might be called and could respond. On the other side of the lot there was a barn, 40 or 50 feet from the house, used for stables and the storage of the family vehicles. It was not connected with the house by means of electric bells or otherwise. A chicken yard about 15 feet square, surrounded by a wire net fence, was situated between the dwelling and the servant's house, about 50 feet from the dwelling. It was in proof that no one dwelt in the barn. On November 22, 1903, a fire occurred, partially destroying the servant's house. The amount of the loss was $228. A demand was made for indemnity. One other insurance company, which had issued a policy for a like sum as these two policies above described, paid its pro rata share of the loss, leaving $152 claimed to be due by the defendant company. The company admitted the amount of the loss, but on January 8, 1904, denied its liability, placing its denial on the ground that the servant's house above referred to was not within the terms of and was not insured by its policies. The case was tried in the city court of Atlanta on March 29, 1906. At the conclusion of the plaintiff's evidence, which presented the case above stated, the defendant moved for a nonsuit, upon the grounds that the plaintiff had not made out a case, and that the facts showed that the servant's house was not insured by the policies introduced. The court refused to nonsuit the case, and, on plaintiff's motion, directed a verdict in her favor for $152, with interest from January 8, 1904. The defendant company, now plaintiff in error, brings the case here, alleging error in the refusal of nonsuit and in the direction of the verdict; the error, as insisted, being that the servant's house is not covered by the policies sued on. The sole question for determination, it will be seen, is this: Was the servant's house, above referred to, covered by the terms of the policy?

The policies are slightly different in form of expression. They are both upon the same building, and in one the insurance extends to "additions thereto," and in the other to "its additions adjoining and communicating." To put the question more exactly from the contract of insurance: Do the words "the two-story shingle-roof frame building and its additions adjoining and communicating," and "her two-story frame shingle-roof building and additions thereto," cover a servant's house situate 150 feet distant, and only connected therewith by two small wires? The plaintiff in error contends that the words do not so signify; that such a separated independent structure is in no legitimate sense either an "addition to the two-story frame shingle-roof building" or one of "its additions adjoining and communicating." The defendant in error insists that either form of expression necessarily includes the house in question, as a component part of the domestic establishment, and that without the use of the word "addition," whether communicating or adjoining, or otherwise; "that the subject of the insurance was a dwelling house, and that, as the words 'dwelling' and 'dwelling house' signify habitation, the meaning of neither can be confined by construction to a single apartment, but comprehends the entire congregation of buildings, main and auxiliary, used for the purpose of abode."

Led into a comprehensive view of the question by the very scholarly brief of the learned counsel for the defendant in error, we have made a somewhat extended examination of the authorities, and have been much interested in the definition of the term "dwelling house." We have carefully considered the various authorities cited by the counsel for defendant in error to sustain his position, and it is plain that in certain senses the term "dwelling house" may embrace a cluster of buildings. In the case of Workman v. Insurance Company, 2 La. 507, 22 Am. Dec. 141, it was held that the word "house," in the common, ordinary acceptation of the term, embraces everything pertinent and accessory to the main building, and that this is the significance that must be given to it when used in policies of insurance. And Mr. Bishop defines a "dwelling house" as "a permanent building or cluster of buildings in which a man with his family resides. He need not so construct his habitation that all the shelter he requires will be under one roof. Therefore the words 'dwelling house' embrace in law the entire congregation of building, main and auxiliary, used for abode." And upon the same line the words "dwelling house" will be found to be defined by numerous other law-writers, such as Bouvier, Angell, and Black. In our opinion the words have a meaning in Georgia which varies with the sense in which they are used. There is one significance attached to the word "dwelling" when considered in connection with the charge of burglary. There the breaking of any house within the curtilage makes complete the offense, provided such breaking be with the criminal intent specified in the statute. There is another meaning in connection with the offense of arson, dependent upon its occupation; and, excepting these two special meanings, there is the use of the word and its significance as commonly used and popularly understood, which, as we will show hereafter, will not include houses disconnected from those occupied by the family. But we think the decision of this case does not depend upon the definition of the word "dwelling house," because the building insured is not only said to be a "dwelling," but it is further described and identified by the words "her two-story frame, shingle-roof building and additions thereto," in one policy, and "the two-story shingle-roof frame building and its additions adjoining and communicating," in the other policy. So that the real question is, not whether a cluster of disconnected houses may or may not in some instances constitute a "dwelling house" (to which proposition we fully agree), but whether it can be fairly understood as a part of the contract of insurance that "a two-story frame building and its additions," used as a dwelling house, shall also include a servant's house 150 feet away, so as to render the insurer liable for damage by fire to the servant's house, though there was no fire or damage to the two-story frame building. Wherever there is a doubt as to the meaning of words, they are to be given their ordinary significance; and policies of insurance, notwithstanding the peculiar language in which they are generally couched, are at last but written contracts, to be interpreted by the same rules as other contracts, and to be enforced according to the intention of the parties; that construction most liberal to the insured being preferred wherever there is ambiguity in the language used. We do not think there is any ambiguity here. We cannot bring ourselves to the conclusion that, giving to words their reasonable and ordinary intentment, the servant's house can be called an addition to the two-story frame shingle-roof building situated at No. 740, on the west side of Peachtree street, Atlanta, Ga. It was on this construction that our learned Brother of the trial bench directed the verdict for the plaintiff; but we are compelled to differ with him, not only by our understanding of the ordinary and general meaning of the descriptive words used in the policy, but because that view is enforced by a consideration of the disastrous effect of any other construction as a matter of public policy.

We are aware that in some states buildings that are disconnected have been connected by legal construction; and we are cited to the cases of Phenix Insurance Co. v. Martin (Miss.) 16 South. 417, Mutual Insurance Co. v. Roe, 36 N. W. 594, 71 Wis. 33, and Gross v. Milwaukee Mechanics' Ins. Co., 66 N. W. 712, 92 Wis. 656. We have examined these cases, and in doing so were led into a wide field of research by a consideration of cases therein mentioned. It may be safely asserted that the general principle deducible from the rulings in all the states except one is that there has been an inseparable identity of use, no matter what the nature of the structure, where insurance on one building has been made to cover another. In Phenix Ins. Co. v. Martin, supra (decided by the Supreme Court of Mississippi), a policy on a two-story brick building and additions thereto, occupied as a dwelling, was held to include the building partly occupied by assured's servants, one of the rooms of which was used as a laundry, although not annexed to the brick building. The opinion in the case is very brief, and the judgment was based entirely on the conclusion that the word "additions" must have operation, and, construing it most favorably to the insured, could only refer to the building nearby, when there was "no other building in assured's yard which could be claimed as an addition to the main building, not built in it as a part of the house originally." In the other cases the issue naturally turned on the identity of use, and the inclusion, by that use, of all the articles destroyed, in a term of description applicable alike to all of them. We are not prepared to adhere to the principle laid down by either the Supreme Court of Mississippi or the Supreme Court of Wisconsin; though, if we were inclined to do so, these cases are clearly different in several respects from the one now under our consideration. An "addition" means something added to another. It implies physical contact. "Adjoining" means when things meet at some line or point of juncture. Objects are adjacent when they are close to each other, not necessarily in actual contact. It is true that one of the policies used the word "communicating," and the evidence showed that there was communication by call bells between the dwelling and the out-house. But in this age, when communication by wire can be had, no matter what the distance nor what the intervening objects, by telegraph and telephone, it would hardly be that the word "communicating" could be said to be used in an insurance policy in the sense insisted upon by the defendant in error. At least we are not prepared to so hold. As we understand the common acceptance of the word "communicating," as referring to the different portions of dwelling houses (whether constructed originally all under one roof or not), they are houses so connected by some structure, forming a part of both, as to afford a passageway without going into the yard or getting on the ground. The Wisconsin case cited could have well been decided, as it was, upon the descriptive terms of the policy. There the property insured was a manufacturing plant described as "a planing mill and its machinery," and, of course, this did not have as much reference to the buildings as to the entity used for manufacturing purposes, to wit, a planing mill and its machinery. In the Mississippi case, though the distance was less than in the case before us, and there was no other building upon the lot, the court seems to have rendered the decision upon the idea that the word "additions" had to have something upon which to operate, which was then in esse. We are not prepared to follow this doctrine, even were it necessary to decide that question in this case. As we have above stated, the whole question here is embraced in the inquiry as to whether the word "additions," when coupled with the "two-story frame building," will include the servant's house. If the description had been simply the dwelling house of the assured, we confess that we might have been in a sea of doubt, because so many considerations have been urged by different authorities as to the meaning of that term. It appears from the record that the policies upon which this suit was brought were for five years, and it is more reasonable to presume that it was in contemplation that additions might be made to the main two-story building within five years than that it was the intention of the parties to include a disconnected building used by servants 150 feet away. In Workman v. Insurance Co., 2 La. 507, 22 Am. Dec. 141, a number of cases are cited to sustain a decision holding that certain outhouses which were damaged by fire were included in the description of the policy, which was as follows: "Two houses situated in Dorsier street adjoining the City Hotel between Custom House and Canal Sts., being number 5 and 7 in the city of New Orleans, in equal proportions of $10,000." The first reason given for the decision is based upon the fact that the assured paid a premium commensurate with the entire value of the outhouses, as well as the main buildings. And as the greater and lesser buildings were all included with a common brick wall which formed part of the buildings, and as it required the valuation of the lesser houses to be added to the greater in order to conform with the premium, the court held that the company was liable for the damage to the smaller houses, but, in doing so, concluded the decision with these words: "But it must be confessed that we have arrived at this conclusion not without doubts." In the decisions cited to sustain the judgment of the Louisiana court importance is attached in some cases to the distance from the dwelling house, and much to the use. In some cases, also, the necessity of a common inclosure is commented upon. The greater weight of authority seems to be that the use of the building must be accessory to the dwelling. In all of these cases (and most of them are criminal cases) the doctrine of the court seems to be supported by the use of the word as applied to cases of burglary. Nearly all of the cases referred to are prosecutions for arson or burglary; for it is in such cases that the terms "house" and "dwelling house," etc., are most frequently defined. It is obvious, however, that cases of insurance furnish a means of construing the term "house" which is not found in criminal prosecutions. Insurance is a matter of contract, and the intention of the parties, if it can be ascertained, must determine the sense in which the terms employed are used. From the context or from circumstances it may be clear that a policy on a house was intended to cover only a single structure, or, on the other hand, that it was designed to cover accessory and contiguous structures; and it would only be in the absence of special indication of the intention that the term would be interpreted in accordance with the rules adopted in burglary and arson. The method of interpretation as applied to the word "house," and kindred terms, in insurance cases is very well indicated in the following decisions which sustain our view of the meaning of the word "additions" as conveying the idea either of identity of use or of something added to a building by adjoining it and being in some manner connected with said building. In Liebenstein v. Baltic Fire Insurance Co., 45 Ill. 301, insurance effected on stock in a certain chair factory was held to cover also stock contained in an engine house appurtenant to the main building and connected with it by a platform and by belting extending from the engine wheel to the machinery in the factory. The court in that case said that the word "factory" does not necessarily mean a single building or edifice, but may apply to several, where they are used in connection with each other for a common purpose and stand together in the same inclosure. On the other hand, in Liebenstein v. Aetna Insurance Co., 45 Ill. 303, which was a case of insurance on a part of the same stock, the policy described the stock as "contained in the two-story frame building occupied by the assured as a chair factory situated on the north side of Superior street"; and it was decided that the stock in the engine house was not covered by the insurance. Here were policies in favor of the same assured, where the test was applied, and to our mind the latter case is nearly identical with the case at bar. In Blake v. Exchange Insurance Co., 12 Gray (Mass.) 285, a policy was issued on goods "in a brick building situated on Main street in Cambridgeport, Mass., known as the Davenport & Co.'s Car Factory"; and it was held that it covered goods in the building erected as a wing against the rear wall of the main building, with opening between about three feet square, commonly inclosed with an iron door; it appearing that both buildings were used in manufacturing cars and were known under the general name of "Davenport & Co.'s Car Factory." In Washington Mutual Insurance Co. v. Merchants' & Manufacturers' Ins. Co., 5 Ohio St. 450, insurance was effected on a "steam flouring mill"; and it was left with the jury to say whether a fire kiln for drying corn or meal, in addition with a corn meal mill, was known or usually incident to a "steam flouring mill." In White v. Mutual Fire Ins. Co., 8 Gray (Mass.) 566, part of property insured was described as a woodhouse, but, while the house was in fact a wood and carriage house combined, the two parts were only separated by a loose partition and the structure was known to the tenants and the neighborhood as "the woodhouse." In Home Mutual Insurance Co. v. Roe, the insurance was for a certain amount on a planing mill and addition, and a certain amount on machinery therein. The disconnected building, which was 22 feet away, was the engine room, and the court inferred the intention of the parties to insure the additional building (after defining the mill to be "the building with its machinery where some process of manufacturing is carried on") in the following words: "It conclusively appears that the engine room was the only motive power for propelling any of the machinery in either of the buildings. The engine was used for no other purpose. It was therefore an essential part of the mill. Without it there would have been no complete mill. The insurance was upon the 'planing-mill building and addition,' and upon the 'machinery, including shafting, gearing, belting, saws, tools, force-pump, and hose therein.' It is claimed that the engine room cannot be construed to mean an 'addition' to the 'planing mill building,' because it does not join directly upon the same; but, as we have seen, they were both essential to the completion of the mill. The motive power was by means of pulleys, belts, and shafts transmitted from the engine room to the machinery in the main building. And the waste shavings, etc., were conveyed from the latter building to the engine room to generate heat to propel the engine. Thus the two buildings were not only connected, but the machinery in each were inseparable, while the whole continued to be a planing mill. The words 'planing-mill building' would seem to be broad enough to include the engine room."

The words, therefore, of this contract, are to be construed according to their general ordinary meaning, bearing in mind the other rule that the contract is to be construed according to the understanding and the intention of the parties, and remembering that even in cases of doubt, while contracts of fire insurance are to be construed more strongly against the insurer (Northwestern Insurance Co. v. Ross, 63 Ga. 204), still, in construing the contract, the court cannot go further than a fair construction of the language used will permit (Behling v. Northwestern Nat. Ins. Co., 117 Wis. 24, 93 N. W. 800; Guarantee Co. v. Bank & Trust Co., 183 U. S. 402, 22 Sup. Ct. 124, 46 L. Ed. 253). In Roberts v. Willink, 21 Ga. 103, Justice McDonald, delivering the opinion, says: "The contract must be construed by the words, unless there be some reason for taking the case out of this first great ruling for the construction of contracts." And in the case of Clay v. Phoenix Ins. Co., 97 Ga. 53, 25 S. E. 420, Justice Atkinson says: "There is no greater sanctity and no more mystery about a contract of insurance than any other. The same rules of construction apply to it as to other contracts; and the true rule for their interpretation may be stated to be that stipulations and conditions in policies of insurance, like those in all other contracts, are to have a reasonable intentment, and are to be so construed, if possible, as to avoid forfeitures and to advance the beneficial purposes intended to be accomplished." We may be pardoned for saying that, in our judgment, were the rule of construction so extended beyond what we conceive to be the ordinary meaning of a "two-story frame building and its additions" as to include as an addition a house occupied by servants 150 feet away, it would certainly be an unreasonable intentment, and create forfeitures, instead of avoiding them. If these policies cover this separate servant's house, then, under their covenants, a breach of any condition of the policies as to the servant's house would vitiate the whole policy. The policy is an entire and indivisible contract. Southern Fire Ins. Co. v. Knight, 111 Ga. 622, 36 S. E. 821, 52 L. R. A. 70, 78 Am. St. Rep. 216. And a breach of a condition which would work a forfeiture would avoid the entire policies, and not simply authorize an apportionment of the loss. Under the stipulations now before us, if mechanics had been employed for more than 15 days in building, altering, or repairing the servant's house without permission, then the policy on the house would have been void. Imperial Ins. Co. v. Coos Co., 151 U. S. 452, 14 Sup. Ct. 379, 38 L. Ed. 231.

It is a fact, so generally known that the courts may take notice of it, that all over our state dwellings are insured which have outbuildings situated in more or less proximity to the main dwelling, that policies of insurance on these dwellings have provisions the violation of which imposes a forfeiture of their benefits; and to hold then that the word "dwelling" would include the outhouses (generally not intended to be insured in the same policy) would be to put it within the power of the insurers to avoid payment for the loss of the dwelling house should any of the acts prohibited by the policy be done in the outhouses. For instance, if the owner of a dwelling had a disconnected servant's house, and the dwelling was destroyed by fire, and the policy had in it a provision against the keeping of gunpowder or dynamite or naphtha or other explosives, if the insurance company could show that in these outhouses (perhaps never visited by the owner or his family and yet occupied by his servants) there was gunpowder or kerosene or dynamite, and the dwelling house should burn, the policy would be void and there would be no indemnity by reason of the violation of these stipulations of the policy. There would be a breach of the contract and a forfeiture of the policy which it would be impossible for the insured (so far as the outhouses are concerned) to either foresee or prevent. It is a fact well known that at the present time menial servants in this state are in no such state of control as formerly, and that the supervision of their acts or responsibility therefor, unless they be immediately under the eye of the employer, is, at best, but an ill founded legal fiction. Learned counsel for the defendant in error rely upon the principle of an identity of use, and insist that the servant's house is a part of the dwelling house, because it was always occupied by the menial servants of the family; for, quoting from 2 Joyce on Insurance, § 1738, they say: "The word 'house,' as used in a policy of insurance, embraces everything appurtenant and accessory to the main building and used as a part and parcel thereof, even though separated therefrom." Counsel argue that this construction and application of the words "dwelling house" and "house" is peculiarly appropriate to our traditions and social conditions. It is insisted that, under the facts in the case, "the servant's house in question was accessory and one of the appurtenances of the main building," because of the fact that in "this country, in which the policies sued upon were issued, and where they are sought to be enforced, from time immemorial the master has been accustomed to provide shelter for his menials under a roof, within the curtilage, separate from his own." The former existence of the conditions and relations referred to can well be considered a matter of judicial knowledge. But the point is no longer of any effect, except to suggest mournful reflection. Unlike the learned counsel, the writer is too young to recall from personal recollection those days (of which we know only from family tradition and history) when throughout the South the position taken by him was sustained by experience and observation so general as to make it a matter of common knowledge. In the halcyon days which he recalls, the household servants were indeed members of the master's family. The servants' health and happiness were to the master a matter of prime importance, and the care and comfort of the master, the "mis-sus," and their children was to the servant a matter of constant affectionate consideration. And in sickness, it mattered not whether it was master, and none the less if it was the servant, who was stricken by disease; either and each with affectionate tenderness and absorbing interest nursed and ministered to the other until health was restored, or, if the dread Reaper could not be arrested, paid, with grief unaffected, the last painful services to the dead. In those days the out-houses occupied by domestic servants of the family could be well said to be accessory to the domus mansionalis around which they clustered. There was identity of use. Then the old definition, "A dwelling house is a building or cluster of buildings in which a man with his family resides," was applicable. But such are not present existing circumstances.

"Those happy days shall nevermore return,
Those happy days that you have seen."

We have no wish to elaborate unfortunate conditions. Suffice it to say that it is well known that the habits, services, and feelings of those who intermittently can be induced to perform menial domestic service are generally wholly repugnant to the idea that they are domestic servants, and so subject to obey and be controlled by the master as to be even in any legal sense members of his family. While there may be separated instances to the contrary, the relation sustained by the hired help to the employer is such that now the practice of servants occupying houses within the curtilage is neither general nor usually desirable. But even in those instances where the servant occupies an out-house near the main building the control over the former is, from the nature of the case, so slight that to hold that such a servant's house is included as a matter of course in the stipulations of a policy of fire insurance on a dwelling house and its additions would virtually destroy the protection of thousands of homes in this state by exposing them to risks of forfeiture for violations of stipulations in the policy by irresponsible persons at the servant's house, whose conduct could be neither foreseen, controlled, nor prevented by the insured. Even if the words of the policy, construed by their ordinary meaning in general use, did not fully satisfy us (as, however, they do) that the "two-story building and its additions" cannot include a one-story servant's house 150 feet away, which was damaged by fire, we are fully persuaded that, under the evidence, no such identity of use was shown as would indicate that it was the intention of the parties to contract in reference to said servant's house. In our opinion neither the words "two-story frame building with its additions, adjoining and communicating," etc., used in one of the policies, nor the "two-story * * * building and additions thereto occupied by assured as a dwelling only," in the other policy, can include the servant's house 150 feet away; and it was error to direct a verdict in favor of the plaintiff under the evidence submitted.

KING MFG. CO. v. WALTON. (No. 60.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. March 11, 1907.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT—INJURY TO SERVANT—ACTION—VARIANCE.

There is no fatal variance between any material allegation of the petition and the proof.

2. SAME—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

An act of the servant within the scope of his duties, entirely harmless except in connection with certain physical conditions of danger caused by the antecedent negligence of the master of which the servant was ignorant when he performed the act, will not as a matter of law defeat his right to recover, although it may have contributed in some degree to his injury.

3. SAME—DUTY OF MASTER.

Masters owe to their servants the duty of providing them a reasonably safe place in which to work, and of maintaining it in a reasonably safe condition during the employment. This is a positive duty. It is not one of the risks assumed by the servant, and the servant has the right to rely on the fact of its performance by the master.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 34, Master and Servant, §§ 171-175.]

4. SAME.

This duty is not discharged in a particular case where the facts show that the master negligently left an excavation on his premises in a dangerous place and condition, where he knew the servant would probably be engaged at night in the proper performance of his duties, and that the master, although he had reason to believe that the servant did not know of the excavation, failed to give him warning in respect thereto.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 34, Master and Servant, §§ 209, 228.]

5. SAME—ACTS OF SERVANT.

The law is not quick to condemn acts of employes as negligence, when such acts result from a zealous, rather than a careless, performance of duty.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 34, Master and Servant, § 674.]

6. TRIAL—QUESTIONS FOR JURY.

"Juries have no higher function than to solve mysteries," and perplexing problems of fact are wisely submitted to their decision.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 46, Trial, §§ 337-345; vol. 36, Negligence, §§ 277-286.]

7. MASTER AND SERVANT—INJURY TO SERVANT.

The court fully and clearly instructed the jury on the law of negligence and contributory negligence; and the verdict was not contrary to the physical facts of the case, and was warranted by the evidence.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Richmond County; Eve, Judge.

Action by one Walton against the King Manufacturing Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Lamar & Callaway, for plaintiff in error. Austin Branch and A. L. Franklin, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. The plaintiff brought suit for damages resulting from personal injuries received by him while in the discharge of his duties as an employe of the defendant. There was a demurrer, which was overruled, and exceptions pendente lite were filed. On the trial a verdict was rendered for the plaintiff. The defendant filed a motion for a new trial, which was overruled. The defendant excepts to the decision overruling the demurrer, and also to the decision refusing a new trial. In the amended motion for a new trial several assignments of error are made as to the verdict of the jury, as being contrary to certain portions of the charge, and also that certain portions of the charge were erroneous. These assignments were not argued, and are not covered by the brief, and will be therefore considered as abandoned. It was insisted before us that "the verdict was contrary to the physical facts as disclosed by the evidence, as follows: Plaintiff testified that he was the outside night-watchman, and that his duties required him to look after the boilers, clean them out, and fire them up every morning, and have steam ready for the dynamos and to supply the slashers, and that he also had to keep water in the boilers; and, when there was too much water in the boilers, it would whistle, and when there was not enough it would whistle. He was injured about a quarter to 5 o'clock Tuesday morning, February 14th. He had kept a fire in the boilers all of Monday night before he was scalded the next morning, in order to keep steam in the pipes and prevent their bursting on account of the cold weather. He had tried to revive the steam in the boilers that morning, and succeeded with two of them, but the other he failed to make hold water, after he had cleaned the clinkers out of the furnace, and then went to the blow-off valve, located on the outside of the brick wall which inclosed the boilers, to see if he could find out where this particular boiler was leaking. This blow-off valve was about two feet above the ground, in the pipe which led from the boiler that failed to generate steam. He caved into the hole which had been dug into the ground around this pipe, where it led down to a horizontal waste pipe. This blow-off valve was used only to empty the water from the boiler, and not to put water into the boiler. The boiler was supplied by water from pumps located in another part of the structure. He did not turn the valve, but got his hands on it, and found it was shut. Then he knew it was burst. Gresham, master mechanic, testified that he reached the boiler at half-past 5 on the morning plaintiff was injured, and found the blow-off valve about half open and the water running out, and that the water had got below the safety plug in the boiler, and that he immediately shut off the water and drew the fire to keep from burning the boiler. The blow-off valve could not have turned itself, but required some human agency to turn it. The leak in the pipe was below the valve, and the valve was between the leak and the boiler. The leak in the pipe at that time would not have emptied the boiler without the valve being open. Reese, the foreman under the master mechanic, testified that the water from the boiler had to pass the valve before it got down to the crack in the pipe; and, when the valve was shut off, the leak, which was below the valve, would not have any effect on the water in the boiler. So long as the valve was shut and closed the water could not get to the leak. The blow-off valve has nothing to do with regulating the water or steam or anything else in the boilers. No water could get to the crack unless the valve was open. It would be impossible unless the valve was out of fix, and he was sure it was in good fix; and, if the valve had been left open all day, the night watchman could not have fired up at all, as it would have let out all the water. If that boiler had been heated up, and furnished heat and steam all night long Monday night, and up to the time of the injury, then that valve could not have been open; for, if the valve had been open from Monday evening, or any time Monday night, up to 5 o'clock that morning, no steam would have been generated in there at all, and the boiler would in that case have burned out before 4 o'clock in the morning. I am a practical mechanic. (a) The fact that plaintiff had been generating steam with the boiler in question all Monday night, without the boiler blowing up, proves conclusively that the blow-off valve, which was used only for emptying the boiler, had not been open during the night. (b) The valve was not out of fix, and could not turn itself, but required some human agency to turn it. (c) The valve closed prevented any water from reaching the crack in the pipe, which was on the other side of the valve from the boiler. (d) Plaintiff says he found the valve closed and the hole full of hot water. (e) The hot water in the hole below the valve and around the leak could not have been the accumulations from the day before; for it was outside, exposed to the air, during a very cold spell of weather. (f) Some human agency necessarily opened the valve and allowed the water to reach the crack in the pipe below the valve. The night watchman was supposed to be the only human agency on the premises, and his explanation of the water from the boiler filling the hole through the burst pipe will not reconcile with the undisputed physical facts; for water will not flow through a closed valve. (g) Some human agency must have opened the valve before the water could have reached the leak and filled the hole. Whether this human agency was the plaintiff, or a trespasser on the premises of the mill, it would be chargeable to plaintiff's negligence, and defeat a recovery. (h) The only reasonable hypothesis upon which the physical facts can be explained is that the plaintiff, finding too much water in the boiler, had turned the blow-off valve to let the water from the boiler, and, when the water got low in the boiler, had gone back to shut off the valve and found the hole full of hot water. If this is the truth, his own negligence was the proximate cause of his injury. * * * Said verdict is contrary to the evidence, because it appears from plaintiff's testimony that at the time he went to the blow-off valve, where he slipped into the hole of hot water, he had his lantern with him, and that there was no trouble or defect with the lantern. It was a good lantern and cast a light, except in the steam, and he could see the steam before he got to it. If plaintiff could see the steam, this was sufficient to put him on notice of danger; and, by the exercise of ordinary care and diligence, he could have avoided the accident."

We have thus given in full the facts set out in the ground of the motion illustrating the controlling issues in the case. Based upon these facts, and the law applicable thereto, the plaintiff in error insists that it is entitled to have the verdict set aside and a new trial granted, (1) because the verdict is not only without evidence to support it, but is positively contrary to the undisputed physical facts in the case; (2) because plaintiff was unquestionably and indisputably guilty of such contributory negligence as would defeat his recovery; (3) because there is a fatal variance between certain material parts of his declaration and the proof. We will consider these grounds in the inverse order in which they are here stated.

The variance between the allegation and the proof, which is claimed to be fatal, is seen by reference to paragraph 13 of the petition and to the evidence referring to the same subject. In this paragraph it is alleged that on the morning of his injury he "noticed that he was not getting much steam in one of the boilers. He raked the fire and threw in coal, did every thing he knew to generate the usual amount of steam in said boiler, but to no effect. Thereupon he determined to go to the rear of the boiler and furnace, loose the blow-off valve, and let the steam out of said boiler, in order that he might find out the trouble. This plaintiff did." In his testimony he says, "I did not turn the valve. I got my hands on it and found it was shut, and then I knew it was a burst." The statement made in the paragraph, taken alone, might be construed to mean that he did "loose the blow-off valve," and, so construed, it would present a variance, as against the statement in his testimony that he did not turn the valve, but got his hands on it and found that it was shut. And, if his right to recover was dependent materially upon the act thus pleaded and proved, it would constitute a fatal variance. We cannot say, however, that his right to recover depended solely on the fact whether he did or did not loose or turn the valve. We also think that it would be giving a too narrow construction to the plaintiff's allegation to say that he alleged unequivocally that he opened the valve. He did not allege in paragraph 13 positively and distinctly that he opened the valve. On the contrary, this paragraph, construed in connection with paragraph 17, would fairly give rise to the inference that he did not, mean so to state; for in the latter paragraph he says that he "walked to the rear of the boiler and furnace for the purpose of blowing the steam out of said boiler and furnace," and "stepped into said hole of hot water, and was thereby injured." These two paragraphs, construed together, leave the allegation on this point in doubt, and his evidence clears up this doubt by the positive statement that he did not turn or open the valve.

It is said that the plaintiff was guilty of such contributory negligence as would defeat a recovery, even conceding that the defendant was negligent in leaving the hole around the pipe near the blow-off valve from Saturday evening until Tuesday morning, the time he was injured, because, by ordinary care, he could have avoided the consequences to himself caused by this negligence. In support of this proposition, it is insisted that the plaintiff's own negligence was the effective and leading cause of the injury; the specific acts of negligence relied upon being that he must necessarily, as he alleged in paragraph 13 of his declaration, have turned the valve which allowed the hot water to escape from the boiler and thus reach the crack in the pipe below the valve, and thus leak out and fill up the hole, and that, as the valve could not be turned without some physical agency, it must necessarily be accepted as a fact that either the plaintiff himself turned the valve, or negligently allowed or permitted some trespasser to turn it, thus permitting said hole to fill up with hot water, and that in either event his injury was the result of his own negligence. We are not prepared to hold as a matter of law, under the circumstances of this case, that, if the plaintiff did turn the valve, it was an act of culpable negligence. He had noticed that he was not getting much steam in the boiler from which this pipe led. It was his duty to find out where the trouble was. "If there was any trouble with the boilers, I was told to see what it was, if I could, and report it." And, if he did turn the valve in an honest effort to find out where the trouble was, we cannot hold as a matter of law, that such act amounted to contributory negligence. It must be borne in mind that the plaintiff did not know of the hole which had been left around the pipe; nor did he know of the break in the pipe below the valve. The turning of the valve and permitting the hot water to go down through the pipe involved no danger whatever, if the pipe had not been broken below the valve and if the hole had not existed around the pipe. Without knowledge of the dangerous conditions existing, he had the right to assume that they did not exist, and could not properly be chargeable with negligence in acting according to such assumption. The effective and producing cause of the plaintiff's injury was not the turning of this valve and permitting the hot water to flow down, but the negligence of the company in permitting the crack to remain in the pipe and the hole to be left open around the pipe. These two things concurring made the act of turning the valve, otherwise harmless, dangerous; and the plaintiff, if he did turn the valve, was ignorant of the danger resulting therefrom.

It is not the law that an act of an employé in the zealous discharge of his duties, which would be entirely harmless but for the pre-existing negligence of the master, is such an act of culpable negligence as would bar his right to recover. The law is not quick to condemn an act of a faithful servant resulting from a zealous, rather than a careless, performance of his duties; and if the plaintiff in this case did, as a matter of fact, turn this valve, thus permitting the water to flow down and out, if he might reasonably have thought that the turning of the valve would result in no danger, but would enable him to find out the cause of "the trouble with the boiler," the jury might very well have found that his act was one of diligence, and not negligence. If, in this case, the servant's act in turning the valve operated upon and rendered actively dangerous the physical conditions previously created by the master's antecedent breach of his obligation, and such act was one of negligence on the part of the servant, he cannot recover. But if the act of the servant was not an act of negligence, and but for such dangerous conditions would have been harmless, the master is liable. The foregoing propositions on the subject of contributory negligence, we believe, are based upon sound reasoning, and are supported by authority.

A suit by an employé will not be barred on the ground that he was guilty of contributory negligence in respect to the act which was the real cause of his injury, unless it is shown that he knew, or ought to have known, of the conditions which rendered the act so done an imprudent one. 1 Labatt on Master & Servant, § 319. "Negligence can only be affirmed in respect to situations and conditions known to the party to whom it is imputed." Brown v. Louisville R. Co., 111 Ala. 275, 19 South. 1001. "The mere fact that, if the servant had not done a certain act, he would not have been injured, is, of course, not a bar to his maintenance of an action, if that act is not a culpable one, considering the circumstances." 1 Labatt on Master and Servant, § 323. The employer is not allowed to escape responsibility where the intervening act of the employé, although it may have contributed to the cause of the injury, was done without knowledge that it would be dangerous, and would not have been dangerous but for the pre-existing physical conditions of danger due to the employé's negligence. Therefore, if we concede that the plaintiff in this case did in fact turn open the valve so as to permit the hot water to escape and fill up the hole around the pipe, such an act could not prevent his recovery, where it is clear that he was ignorant of the existence either of a crack in the pipe or of the hole, which physical facts and conditions were due to the antecedent negligence of the defendant. Discarding all complex and subtle discussion of the question of causation, intervening or proximate, of the injury, it is perfectly plain that the injury in this case could not have taken place without the breach of duty by the master in digging the hole around the pipe, and in allowing it to remain, without warning to the servant of its existence, and with the knowledge that the servant would be exposed, in the discharge of his duty, to the danger that might result. This was the causa sine qua non of the injury in this case. We have dwelt at some length on this subject because of the position of the learned counsel for the plaintiff in error that there was no reasonable solution of the evidence, other than the assumption that the plaintiff did in fact turn open the valve on the pipe, and that this was an act of contributory negligence which should prevent his recovery.

It is next insisted that, if the plaintiff did not himself turn on this valve and permit the water to escape into the hole, he must have allowed some trespasser to come on the premises and do so, and that this would have been an act of negligence on his part which would defeat recovery. We are inclined to think that this suggestion is too improbable for serious consideration. But, even if it were true, it would not as a matter of law prevent a recovery. Impossibilities are impossible, and the law neither requires nor expects their performance. The presence of a trespasser might have been entirely consistent with the plaintiff's discharge of duty. He could not be present at every point of the premises or prevent every possible trespass.

It is also insisted that the plaintiff was furnished by the defendant with a lantern for the purpose of making "night the same as day to him upon the defendant's premises"; that this lantern was in good condition, and that its light was sufficient to put him on notice and cause him to investigate before stepping into the hole of hot water; that it did permit him to see the steam arising from around the pipe; and that the rising steam ought to have given him warning of the danger. We think the light of the lantern is somewhat magnified by the distinguished counsel when he claims that it "made night the same as day." It was poetic license that authorized Portia to say to Nerissa, "How far that little candle throws his beams!" The jury, probably being men of practical experience, might have remembered the light of a lantern was extremely limited as to area, and intensified the darkness outside of such area, and, although it did cast a light on the steam around the pipe, it did not cast a light through the steam so as to disclose the hole, or clearly show from whence the steam came. Light cannot penetrate vapor so as to discover physical objects located within and enveloped by it. Therefore the steam, although it might have given notice of some trouble with the pipe, did not necessarily give notice of the existing trouble, to wit, the hole of hot water. The steam was more probably coming from the crack in the pipe than the hole in the ground.

In the next place, it is insisted with a great deal of earnestness by the very able counsel for the plaintiff in error that the verdict is without evidence to support it, because it is positively contrary to the undisputed physical facts of the case; that these physical facts prove that it was impossible for the plaintiff to have been injured in the manner in which he says he was injured. The plaintiff testified that he was injured by the caving in of the dirt around the hole and his feet falling into the hot water. He does not say how the water got into the hole, though he does say that the valve was shut when he put his hand on it. It is true that the water could not have gotten down into the pipe below the valve if the valve had been shut securely and was itself in a perfectly sound condition. We are not called upon to suggest any theory explaining the presence of the water in the hole. This was a question for the jury. Difficult and perplexing questions of fact are committed by the wisdom of the law to the solution of the jury. The great Chief Justice, who but this very week left us to solve the last great mystery, declared that "juries have no higher function than to solve mysteries." Central Railroad v. Rouse, 77 Ga. 407, 3 S. E. 308. And this wise statement has been approved by Justice Cobb in Southern Ry. Co. v. Webb, 116 Ga. 164, 42 S. E. 395, 59 L. R. A. 109. With the very limited practical knowledge we possess on such questions, we might, however, suggest several ways in which this hot water might have gotten into that hole. The valve might have been partially open all night. The crack in the pipe was very small. The water might have been constantly flowing slowly from the boiler, its intense heat lasting some time, because, although the night was very cold, the hole of water was in proximity to the heat from the boiler and furnace, or the valve itself might have had a slight crack through which the hot water gradually flowed. It may have been true that the plaintiff did turn the valve himself, but this hypothesis is not invulnerable, in view of the fact that he stated that his feet fell at once into the water, hardly giving sufficient time, between the turning of the valve and falling into the hole for the water to run through the very small crack in the pipe and fill up the hole. But we do not think it was incumbent upon the plaintiff to clearly explain how the water got into the hole. He could have recovered under the facts short of that proof. The great practical, controlling facts were that the water was in the hole, in a scalding condition, and both the crack and the hole had been left there by the master without warning to the servant, although the master knew that in the discharge of his duties the servant would be about the place of danger at night with only the light of the lantern to save him from probable injury.

It seems to us in this case that the master did not measure up to the full performance of his duty as imposed upon him by law. It is an elementary principle that masters owe to their servants the duty of providing them a reasonably safe place in which to work, and of maintaining it in a reasonably safe condition during the employment. This is a positive duty which the master owes, and the servant has a right to assume that it will be fully performed. 20 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law (2d Ed.) 55, 56. If there are any holes or excavations on the premises, about or over which the servant must pass in the course of his work, the master must take reasonable precaution to protect the servant from injury by erecting proper barriers, or otherwise; and, if he neglects to do so, he is liable in case the servant is injured by reason thereof. Indiana Pipe Co. v. Neusbaun, 21 Ind. App. 361, 52 N. E. 471; Frye v. Bath Gas Co., 94 Me. 17, 46 Atl. 804. If there are dangers incident to an employment unknown to the servant, of which the master knows or ought to know, he must give the servant warning in respect thereto. Civ. Code 1895, § 2611. When the servant injured did not know and had not equal means of knowing of the danger, and by the exercise of ordinary care could not have known thereof, he can recover. Civ. Code 1895, § 2612. By the undisputed facts in this case it is clearly shown that the master knew of the existence of the danger, permitting it to remain for three days, did not inform the servant of its presence, and knew that the servant, in the discharge of his duties, would be exposed to the danger, and that the servant did not know of the danger, and, by the exercise of ordinary care, could not have found it out, as he was the night watchman, and was not on the premises during the day.

There may be mysteries in this case. There may be some doubt as to how the hot water got from the boiler, past the valve, and into the hole; but there is one fact that is clear, and that is that the employé, when hurt, was in the line of his duty, and was trying to find out "the trouble," in order that he might save his master's property from threatened injury. Possibly the jury in solving the perplexing mystery of the presence of the hot water in the hole gave the benefit of any doubt which may have been on their minds to the vigilant employé. The law on the subject of negligence and contributory negligence was fully given in charge by the learned trial judge. The verdict of the jury was consistent with reasonable inferences deducible from the evidence, was not inconsistent with the physical facts, and was approved by the court. This court will not disturb the judgment refusing to grant a new trial.

Judgment affirmed.

J. F. BAILEY CO. v. WEST LUMBER CO.
(No. 19.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. March 2, 1907.)

1. APPEAL—REVIEW—QUESTIONS OF FACT.

The evidence in the justice's court, set out in the petition for certiorari (which was adopted by the magistrate), authorized the verdict in that court, and that verdict, having been approved by the judge of the superior court, will not be disturbed.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, §§ 4322-4326.]

2. SALES—CONTRACT—EXECUTION—EVIDENCE.

The correspondence of the parties, especially when taken with the fact that plaintiff treated the letters as a contract and attempted to carry out the agreement by filling defendant's order, is sufficient to establish a contract between the parties.

3. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT—PROOF OF AGENCY.

The agency of a person who is recognized by both parties as agent in regard to a particular transaction is sufficiently proved where the relation is wholly uncontradicted by the adverse party. A suit brought to enforce rights based upon unauthorized acts of an agent, or other person acting in behalf of a principal, may imply ratification of the acts of such person, and dispense with the necessity of any further proof of ratification.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 40, Principal and Agent, §§ 420-429, 655.]

4. CONTRACT—PROPOSAL—ACCEPTANCE.

"If a proposal includes any qualifying conditions, the acceptance of it is an assent to those conditions, and gives the proposer the right to understand that the acceptance was in all things according to the terms of the offer." 7 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 181. A party to a contract, in the absence of fraud, cannot avoid it by reason of misunderstanding it, unless it appear that his misunderstanding was not the result of his own fault or negligence.

5. SALES—ACTION—DEMAND.

Plaintiff's suit relieved defendant from the necessity of a demand for the lumber according to the terms of the contract.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; Pendleton, Judge.

Action by the J. F. Bailey Company against the West Lumber Company. Judgment for defendant on counterclaim. From an order overruling a certiorari, plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Etheridge, Boykin & Etheridge, for plaintiff in error. Walter McElreath, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. The error alleged in this case is the overruling of a certiorari. J. F. Bailey Company filed suit against West Lumber Company, in a justice's court, on an account for $22.25, "for demurrage and loss on selling price of lumber shipped July 7, 1904." The defendant in error, West Lumber Company, filed a plea in recoupment for the sum of $82.50, for failure to deliver goods alleged to have been purchased of plaintiff in error, and asked judgment for the difference between the contract price and the market value at the place of delivery. In this plea the defendant contended that plaintiff had contracted to deliver a certain carload of lumber, to wit, No. 1 common boards, at $9.50 per 1,000. It was further alleged that the market price of No. 1 common boards in Atlanta, at the date of the shipment, was $15 per 1,000, and that the car load which plaintiff agreed to sell would have been not less than 15,000 feet. The defendant in the plea asked, therefore, for the difference of $5.50 per 1,000 feet between the price at which it claimed to have bought and the market price at the place of delivery, to wit, the city of Atlanta, on 15,000 feet of lumber. Before the case went to trial plaintiff in error attempted to dismiss its action, but upon defendant's objection the magistrate put the case to trial, and the defendant (now defendant in error) proceeded to introduce evidence to prove plaintiff's liability, and recovered a verdict for $82.50, the amount of damages it claimed. The plaintiff in error excepted to this verdict and the judgment thereon, and carried them to the superior court by certiorari. Upon consideration the judge of the superior court overruled the certiorari and refused a new trial; and this judgment is, by the bill of exceptions, assigned to be the error which this court is asked to review.

In the petition for certiorari a new trial is asked: (1) Because, as alleged, the evidence showed that there was never a clear understanding between the parties in such a way as to constitute a valid contract. (2) The parties did not agree to the same thing and in the same sense unconditionally, unequivocally, and without variance of any sort. (3) Because the letters upon which West Lumber Company relied as the basis of their contract are signed by John J. Earle, and the evidence does not show that John J. Earle was an authorized agent of the Bailey Company. (4) Because there was no proof to show that the act of Earle was ever ratified by defendant, Bailey Company, or that they ever had any notice of his act and the circumstances under which Earle acted for them. (5) There was no proof of any demand ever being made upon J. F. Bailey Company for delivery of No. 1 common boards. The statement of these assignments of error shows that the case depends largely upon the construction of the evidence by the jury in the first place, and the review of that construction by the court in the second instance. We shall consider the first two grounds together; and, while there appears to have been, so far as the direct evidence is concerned, a claim of misunderstanding between the parties, the jury could well infer from the uncontradicted circumstances of the case that a contract was entered into on the part of the plaintiff to furnish car of No. 1 boards at the price mentioned in plaintiff's proposal. The correspondence introduced before the jury would have made a contract before the alleged misunderstanding came into existence. There was an invitation for a proposal, and an acceptance; and this was followed by shipment of the articles referred to in the very initiation of the correspondence. The first letter, May 28, 1904, addressed to West Lumber Company and signed by Earle, states: "We have three cars 13/16x6 and up No. 1, Common Boards D2S, en route to your city. If you can use same, we would be pleased to have your best offer by return mail." Second. The letter dated May 31, 1904, addressed to J. F. Bailey Company, and signed by West Lumber Company, says: "Yours of 28th inst. to hand and noted. We will take one car of this lumber at $9.50 per thousand, f. o. b. Atlanta, cash in ten days, less two per cent., provided the lumber is sound and square edge; otherwise at half price." Third. The letter of June 3, 1904, addressed to West Lumber Company and signed J. F. Bailey Company, per Earle, and stating: "We have your favor of 31st inst., and do not quite understand your order. However, we are entering same. We note you say price $9.50, less 2 per cent., provided the lumber is sound and square edge; otherwise at half price," etc. The plaintiff treated these letters as constituting a contract between the parties. It shipped certain lumber in what it asserted was a compliance with the contract. The jury was authorized to find there was no misunderstanding except such as was created by the plaintiff. There was no dispute as to the market value of boards at Atlanta. The only question was whether the Bailey Company was to furnish that kind of lumber or a different kind; and from the correspondence it would seem that the jury was at least authorized to sustain the contention of the defendant. The plaintiff in error insists that the contract must relate back to the letter written by Earle, and that it is not shown in the evidence that John J. Earle was an authorized agent of J. F. Bailey Company upon whose letters West Lumber Company rely to establish their contract, and further contends, if the letters signed by J. J. Earle are presumed to have been written by him as an authorized agent of Bailey Company, that there is nothing showing that the letters are genuine. In Freeman v. Brewster, 93 Ga. 649 (6), 21 S. E. 165, the court held that "a letter is not admissible in evidence without proof of its being genuine, and this proof cannot be supplied solely by what appears on the face of the letter itself, to wit, the contents, the letterhead," etc. We think the evidence, without regard to the contents or the printed letterhead, proved the genuineness of the letters so as to make them admissible; and certainly the action of the Bailey Company in attempting to perform the contract, which in any view of the case had its inception in the letters and was made by them, disposes of all question as to the authority of Earle to write and sign the letters constituting the contract. If it had not authorized him before, it adopted his action and ratified it certainly by suing on the contract. Thereby it admitted the genuineness of the letters (whatever might be the variance between the parties as to the construction to be placed upon them), and it could not be heard to say that there was no contract between the parties, or that Earle acted without authority. "The agency of a person, who is recognized as such in regard to a particular transaction, is sufficiently proved where the relation is wholly uncontradicted and unanswered by the adverse party." Liverpool Insurance Co. v. Ellington, 94 Ga. 785, 21 S. E. 1006. "Implied ratification arises when the alleged principal claims and seeks to enforce by suit rights based upon the unauthorized act of an agent or other person acting in behalf of the principal." 1 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 1209. After the plaintiff filed its suit and after the defendant had filed its plea of recoupment, the plaintiff attempted to withdraw its action and to dismiss the suit. There was no error in the court's refusal to allow this to be done. Nothing is better settled than that, where a defendant (after he has been haled into court) himself asks for affirmative relief, he is entitled to proceed with his counter action.

The other grounds of error assigned are fully covered by the headnotes thereon, and do not require further elaboration. There was no error in overruling the certiorari.

Judgment affirmed.

4. EVIDENCE—PAROL EVIDENCE—MORTGAGED CHATTELS.

A mortgage in which the property mortgaged is described as "all my crops corn, cotton, etc., now up and growing, on about 240 acres of land, all the above property is in Jackson district, county and state aforesaid," may be explained by parol evidence so as to point out and identify such property, and is good as between the parties to the mortgage.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Dublin; Burch, Judge.

Rule by the S. Weichselbaum Company against Peacock, sheriff, for distribution of funds. The Read Phosphate Company and others, claiming an interest in the funds, were made defendants to the rule. Judgment for movant, and the other defendants bring error. Reversed.

James A. Thomas, for plaintiffs in error. W. C. Davis, P. L. Wade, and Harvey Hill, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. S. Weichselbaum Company brought a rule against Peacock, sheriff, to distribute money in his hands arising from the sale of property of R. B. Blackshear. In the rule the movant set out two mortgage fi. fas. and a distress warrant, and claimed that they were the highest and best liens upon the fund in the hands of the sheriff. The sheriff in his answer, admitted that the two mortgage fi. fas. and a distress warrant for $250 in favor of Mary A. Smith against R. B. Blackshear, and properly transferred by Mary A. Smith to S. Weichselbaum Company were in his hands, and that the net sum of $745.93 was in hand for distribution, but he denied that movant's mortgages, as alleged, were of the highest dignity. The sheriff further answered that he had in his hands "a mortgage fi. fa., foreclosed October 9, 1905, from a mortgage deed dated — day of May, 1905, and recorded May 11, 1905, on crops of R. B. Blackshear, in favor of the Read Phosphate Co. vs. R. B. Blackshear, for the sum of $351.50 principal, interest $3.75, attorney's fees $35, and costs of court," which was placed in his hands October 19, 1905, with written notice to hold up said fund, and that said Read Phosphate Company claim their mortgage fi. fas. to be of the highest dignity and entitled to said fund. He also set out other liens placed in his hands, which claim the fund. Upon motion of movant's attorney, the court directed that the denial by the sheriff in his answer of the allegation in the rule that the S. Weichselbaum mortgages were of "highest dignity" should be stricken from the answer, which was done, over objection of counsel for respondent. In response to a motion by movant, the court also struck from the sheriff's answer the date of the record of the mortgage of Read Phosphate Company, the words "and recorded May 11, 1905," also the words "that Read Phosphate Co. claim their mortgage to be of the highest dignity and entitled to said fund." All parties having fi. fas. in the hands of the sheriff were made parties defendant to the rule. It was admitted that the property sold was the property of R. B. Blackshear, raised by him on his farm in Jackson district, Laurens county, Ga., in the year 1905; that the consideration of the mortgages of Weichselbaum Company was supplies to make said crop, and the consideration of Read Phosphate Company's mortgage was commercial fertilizers to make the same crop. The issue was narrowed down to the question as to which constituted the superior lien upon the fund in the hands of the sheriff, the mortgages of Weichselbaum or the mortgage of the Read Phosphate Company, and this issue was determined in favor of the mortgages held by Weichselbaum. There are four material assignments of error in the bill of exceptions which either include or control all the lesser complainants: (1) That the court erred in striking the allegations of the sheriff's answer as to the matters which have been referred to above; (2) that the trial judge erred in holding that the mortgage of the Read Phosphate Company was no mortgage, for want of sufficient description; (3) that the judge erred in holding the two mortgages of Weichselbaum Company were good and sufficient as to description; (4) that the trial judge erred in admitting evidence without any traverse to the answer being filed.

We think there can be no question that the court erred in striking the sheriff's answer as to the portions complained of. The court is always warranted in striking (upon proper objection thereto) bare conclusions of the pleader, but the portions of the sheriff's answer which were stricken in this case were not conclusions of the sheriff, but statements of facts which had influenced him in not paying over the money upon demand. He was the subject of a harsh remedy. The rule called upon him to show cause why he had not applied the fund in his hands to the satisfaction of certain fi. fas. which had brought the fund into his hands. He was subject to penalties drastic and severe, unless he offered a good reason for his nonpayment. On the other hand, the answer of the sheriff, not traversed, is to be taken as true, and the right of every party at interest was to be affected by it as the truth, until it was traversed. Hutchins v. Hullman, 34 Ga. 347. And, as said by Judge Bleckley in Davis v. Reid, 57 Ga. 190, if it be not true, let it be traversed, and let the sheriff have an opportunity of supporting it by proof, if he can. Certainly he had the right to deny, in his answer, the specific allegation made by Weichselbaum & Company that their mortgages were of the "highest dignity." If he did not deny this, what defense could he offer, or what reason give why he had not paid over the money? And it seems to us equally clear that as a servant of the court, called to answer for an alleged dereliction of duty, he would have the perfect right to say he had not paid the fund, because of another mortgage fi. fa., and to describe it, and at least, as evidence of his good faith, to say that the holders of this other mortgage fi. fa. "claimed their mortgage to be of the highest dignity and entitled to said fund." It has been expressly held that, if there are defects in the answer, they are to be pointed out by special demurrer, so as to permit of amendment. Davis v. Reid, 57 Ga. 190. Every party to a rule, moreover, is affected by the sheriff's answer, because of the fact that it is to be taken as true until traversed; and to needlessly or improperly strike the answer is not only to deprive the sheriff of his rights, but also, perhaps, to deprive some party to the cause of a substantial benefit accruing to him by operation of law.

We think it clear that the second assignment of error is well taken. The description in the mortgage of the Read Phosphate Company was sufficient to point out the property against which the lien was created.

In the third assignment of error it is insisted that the judge erred in holding that the two mortgages of Weichselbaum Company were good and sufficient as to description. The description of the property in both mortgages was the same, to wit: "All my crops corn, cotton, etc., now up and growing, on about 240 acres of land, all the above property is in Jackson district, county and state aforesaid." We think the objection of the plaintiff in error was well taken. The description was entirely inadequate as to the property, though the uncertainty of description could be relieved in any contest between mortgagee and mortgagor by parol evidence; but, as will appear from the ruling on the fourth assignment of error, evidence was not admissible unless a traverse had been filed to the answer.

Complaint is made that the trial judge admitted the evidence submitted by defendant in error without any traverse or pleading of any character. It appears from the bill of exceptions that movant offered the record book of mortgages for the purpose of showing that Read Phosphate Company's mortgage was recorded, but only one witness' name, to wit, W. J. Joyner, appeared on said record. Attorney for respondents (though agreeing that the record book might be used instead of a certified copy, if the evidence were otherwise admitted) objected to the introduction of the evidence upon the ground that no traverse of the sheriff's answer, nor any written pleading of any character, had been filed or offered to be filed by movant attacking said mortgage for matters dehors the record as made up by the rule and answer. The court overruled the objection and admitted the evidence. Movant then offered Mark Smith as a witness to show that the name of L. B. Ogburn, commercial notary public, was not signed to the paper when it was recorded. Respondents objected to this evidence upon the same grounds, that no traverse to the sheriff's answer or any written pleading or paper of any kind had been filed attacking said mortgage dehors the record. The court overruled the objection and allowed the witness to testify. Movants, over the same objection interposed by respondent, also offered R. B. Blackshear, who testified that his recollection was that he did not acknowledge his signature to this paper before Ogburn, but did to a mortgage he gave Read Phosphate Company, but not this paper. Movants having closed, respondents introduced L. B. Ogburn, who testified that he signed the mortgage as commercial notary public, that Blackshear acknowledged his signature before him, and this was done before the same was recorded.

We are bound by a long line of decisions to hold that the introduction of testimony, in the absence of a traverse to the answer of the sheriff to a rule, is erroneous. There is no issue for a jury, or for a court sitting as a jury, to which the evidence can be addressed. The sheriff's answer, verified by his oath, is to be taken as true, unless traversed as provided by the Code and a verdict found by the jury against the truth thereof. Pound v. Carr, 40 Ga. 84. In the Pound Case the judge refused to submit the matter to a jury and examined witnesses. In this case it does not affirmatively appear that the parties consented that the judge should hear the issues of fact (should the answer be traversed) instead of a jury. We do not know whether it was the agreement for the judge to take the place of the jury or not. If there was no such consent, the judge could not have heard evidence touching the answer at all, but, even if the consent extended to the judge's determining the issues of fact instead of a jury, still no evidence was admissible until the answer was traversed. Except for the difference that in the Pound Case the judge refused a jury, and in this case acted without one, there is no difference between the present case and that case. See, also, Civ. Code 1895, § 4775; Haynes v. Perry, 76 Ga. 33; Cason v. Mulling, 50 Ga. 599; Lightfoot v. Freeman, 54 Ga. 216; Heard v. Callaway, 51 Ga. 317; Davis v. Strickland, 62 Ga. 174; Wilkin v. American Freehold Co., 106 Ga. 182, 32 S. E. 135; Lindsey v. Cock, 40 Ga. 7. In the case of Lightfoot v. Freeman, supra, the sheriff, as in this case, was unable to determine what he should do in the premises, and therefore returned the papers by his answer, to be adjudicated by the court. In that case "he was desirous of performing his whole duty in the matter and acted in the utmost good faith and would have sold the land, but for the reason that he was wholly unable to determine what was his duty," and in this case the sheriff appears to have acted in the utmost good faith, and only asked the direction of the court as to which of the contending mortgage f. fas. he should pay the money. He was acting at his peril in paying it to either without this direction, and, having answered, it was error to strike out good grounds of defense from the answer, and error to admit evidence without a traverse.

Judgment reversed.

HARRIS v. HILL & BRIDGES. (No. 189.)
(Court of Appeals of Georgia. March 11, 1907.)

EXEMPTIONS — SCHEDULE — DESCRIPTION OF PROPERTY.

In order to be superior to the title of a bona fide purchaser without actual notice, a statutory or short homestead under Civ. Code 1895, § 2866, must contain a description of the property sought to be exempted sufficiently definite to impart constructive notice.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Sylvester; Park, Judge.

Action by one Harris against Hill & Bridges. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Passmore & Tison, for plaintiff in error.
J. H. Tipton, for defendants in error.

POWELL, J. Though many questions appear in the record, one is controlling. The plaintiff brought suit against the defendants for the recovery of a described cow and calf, claiming the same by virtue of what is known as a "statutory" or "short" homestead. In the schedule offered in support of the plaintiff's title there is listed "one cow and calf"; no other description being given. In settlement of a pending litigation the plaintiff had sold the cow and calf in dispute to another person, who, in turn, sold it to the defendants. The defendants bought without any notice whatever of the exempt character of the property, unless the record of the schedule containing the description above mentioned be regarded as sufficient for the giving of constructive notice. The court awarded the property to the defendants, and the plaintiff excepts.

The proceedings necessary to the setting apart of the statutory or short homestead, under Civ. Code 1895, § 2866, are very simple and summary, and yet for the protection of those who may have occasion to deal with the exempt property certain statutory requirements have been made. The debtor must prepare a schedule of the property he desires to be exempted, and must cause the same to be recorded. This schedule and record are necessary to put the public on notice, not only that an exemption has been claimed, but also of the identity of the property which is thus to be withdrawn from the category of the debtor's ordinary belongings. The description appearing in the schedule, "one cow and calf," while not entirely void, and while capable of being amplified and made certain by amendment, is too vague and indefinite to be regarded as constructive notice of the exempt character of property answering to that general description, which has been bought by an innocent purchaser who had no other notice. That bona fide purchasers, without actual or constructive notice, are protected against the title of the beneficiaries of a homestead. See Weaver v. Saffold, 101 Ga. 150, 28 S. E. 118; Willingham v. Slade, 112 Ga. 418, 37 S. E. 737 (2); Walden v. Brantley Co., 116 Ga. 298, 42 S. E. 503.

Judgment affirmed.

HARRELL v. MAYOR & COUNCIL OF MACON. (No. 69.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. March 11, 1907.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS — DEFECTIVE STREETS—ASSUMPTION OF RISK.

There is no rule of law in this state that where a defect or dangerous excavation exists in a highway, and is known to one who elects to use such highway, such election, even if justified by the dictates of ordinary prudence, must as a matter of law entail the consequences of a want of ordinary care and prudence.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 36, Municipal Corporations, §§ 1679, 1754-1757.]

2. SAME—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

Where a ditch or gully has been left open for several months on the side of a public alley in a city, the alley being used generally as a thoroughfare and being a part of the street, it is not such contributory negligence per se, on the part of a person living near the alley, having knowledge of such ditch or gully, to walk on the alley to her home at night, as she had done on previous occasions, instead of taking another way to her home, as will justify a judgment of nonsuit.

3. SAME.

It is for the jury to determine, from all the facts and circumstances, whether the location of the ditch, and the hazard to result from an attempt to walk on the alley at night, was so great that the plaintiff, with knowledge of the defect, could not, as a reasonably prudent person, in the exercise of ordinary care, have elected to use said highway instead of taking another route to her home.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Macon; Hodges, Judge.

Action by one Harrell against the mayor and council of Macon. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

M. R. Freeman, A. L. Miller, and J. C. Morcock, for plaintiff in error. Minter Wimberly, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. The plaintiff in error sued to recover the amount of the damage alleged to have been sustained from personal injuries suffered by her as the result of a fall into a ditch in a street of the city of Macon. At the close of the testimony introduced in behalf of the plaintiff a motion for nonsuit was made and sustained, and a judgment entered dismissing the case. This judgment is before us for review. A motion to nonsuit presents for decision the single question whether or not the evidence introduced in behalf of the plaintiff, assuming it to be true, proves his case as laid (Reeves v. Jackson, 113 Ga. 182, 38 S. E. 314; Kelly v. Strouse, 116 Ga. 873 (4 b, c), 43 S. E. 280, or, in somewhat different phraseology, whether under the facts as alleged and proved by the plaintiff, and all reasonable inferences fairly deducible therefrom, the jury, under the law, can find a verdict in his favor. This makes it necessary to consider the case as made by the facts proved by the plaintiff and appropriate to the allegations of the petition.

The plaintiff, a woman 62 years of age, was hurt by falling into a ditch or gully on the side of a public alley which was used generally as a thoroughfare, in the city of Macon. She lived on Elm street, and, some months prior to the accident, the city authorities had worked the street in front of her residence, leaving next to her fence a narrow sidewalk, and making a new sidewalk between this old narrow sidewalk and the street. A row of brick steps ran from the old sidewalk in front of the plaintiff's house down to the level of the new sidewalk. These brick steps were not in good repair. From the surface of the street to the new sidewalk was 21 inches and the step up from the new sidewalk to the brick steps was 12 to 14 inches. There were two ways from the plaintiff's house to the street—across the old sidewalk down to the new sidewalk, stepping down the brick steps and then to the street, or down the old sidewalk to the alley, and then down the alley in a gentle slope to the street. On account of the condition of the brick steps, the latter way was most generally used. On both sides of the alley were ditches and gullies. On one side the ditch or gully was about 12 inches deep, and on the other side the ditch or gully was two feet deep, two feet wide, and extended for some distance. This was the ditch into which plaintiff fell. There was an electric light near the corner of the street and alley, and, when burning, these ditches or gullies were plainly visible. Plaintiff knew the situation of the ditch or gully into which she fell. It had been in the same condition for four or five months, and she went up and down the alley several times a day. The night of the accident the plaintiff left her residence, went down the old sidewalk next to her fence, to the alley, and then on to the street, as she usually did, on account of the condition of the brick steps across the new sidewalk. The electric light was burning brightly. In returning from church, about 9 o'clock, the light was still burning, and, when she reached the alley, just as she turned up the same, the light went out, leaving her in total darkness. She waited a minute for the light to return, but, it not doing so, she took four or five steps carefully up the alley, and, knowing she was in the neighborhood of the gully, stopped and stooped down to feel for it. As she stooped down, the ground caved under her feet, and she fell into the gully. The foregoing facts were in accord with the allegations of the petition; and the question for decision is: Did the court err in granting a nonsuit?

It is the duty of the city to keep its streets and sidewalks in a safe condition for travel in the ordinary modes, by night as well as by day, and, if it fails to do so, it is liable for damages for injuries sustained in consequence of such failure. Mayor of Atlanta v. Perdue, 53 Ga. 607; City of Columbus v. Anglin, 120 Ga. 785, 48 S. E. 313. The whole of the street used by the public must be kept in a reasonably safe condition. City of Atlanta v. Milam, 95 Ga. 135, 22 S. E. 43; Jones Neg. Mun. Corp. § 77. "The municipality should not allow obstructions or excavations to adjoin the traveled way which will render its use unsafe and dangerous. The public is entitled to the use of the whole street from side to side and from end to end." Jones, Neg. Mun. Corp. § 78; Tied. Mun. Corp. § 300. "Cities are liable for negligently permitting unguarded excavations near the line of the road or street." Ell. Roads & Str. § 613. These principles are cited with approval by our Supreme Court in City Council of Augusta v. Tharpe, 113 Ga. 155, 156, 38 S. E. 389. In the instant case the evidence shows that the plaintiff was hurt by falling into a gully or ditch in a public alley, between the sidewalk and the street, and therefore being a portion of the street, and commonly used as a thoroughfare. Whether the gully or ditch, in the place where it was, and of the width and depth that it was, was such an excavation as to render the thoroughfare unsafe for travel by day or night, presented questions of fact for the exclusive determination of the jury, under proper instructions from the court. 15 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law (2d Ed.) 440, and notes. Whether the city had actual notice of the alleged unsafe condition of the street, or whether such alleged unsafe condition had existed for such a length of time that, by reasonable diligence in the performance of its duty, it ought to have known of such condition, were questions of fact. Mayor of Atlanta v. Perdue, 53 Ga. 607, City Council of Augusta v. Tharpe, 113 Ga. 155 (2), 38 S. E. 389.

The gully in question having existed for three or four months, we think the jury might well have concluded that the city did have legal notice of its existence. We do not imagine, however, that our learned Brother based his judgment of nonsuit on the insufficiency of the proof in these particulars. We infer from the argument and brief submitted in behalf of the city that the court adopted the theory that knowledge of the defect in the highway by the plaintiff precluded a recovery for an injury caused by such defect; in other words, that, as the plaintiff well knew the condition of the alley and the location of the ditch thereon, when she made use of the alley she assumed the risk incident to such use, or that she was not in the exercise of ordinary care to avoid the result of the negligence of the city in using the alley at night and after the light had gone out. That the mere knowledge of a dangerous defect in a sidewalk is sufficient to preclude recovery, regardless of circumstances, is not the law. But a person having knowledge of a defect or dangerous condition of a street is bound to use care, according to the circumstances, to avoid injury. On this point we might well content ourselves with the authority of the Supreme Court in Samples v. Atlanta, 95 Ga. 119, 22 S. E. 136, where Mr. Justice Lumpkin, in giving the rule laid down by text-writers and many decisions, deduces therefrom the following as the correct doctrine: "The law is plain and clear, and in a nutshell is as follows:

If the danger arising from a defect in a bridge, or other portion of the highway within the limits of a city, is obviously of such character that no person, in the exercise of ordinary prudence, would attempt to pass over the same, or, in other words, if such an attempt would, of itself, plainly and unequivocally amount to a want of ordinary care and diligence, the court may so instruct the jury as matter of law. But in other cases the mere knowledge of the existing defect will not prevent a recovery on the part of one who is injured because of the defect, if the use of the bridge or highway in which the defect exists is consistent with ordinary care, and it further appears that the plaintiff did in fact exercise such care. All cases of this kind should be submitted to the jury, who, in determining what would be ordinary care in the particular instance, should take into consideration and carefully weigh all the facts and circumstances."

Between the two extremes of plain, obvious danger, and slight or trivial danger, incident to the use of many public highways, there may be every conceivable degree and kind of danger, and in those cases lying between the two extremes the question of contributory negligence in the use of the street with knowledge of the danger is one for the determination of the jury. Osborne v. London & Northwestern Ry. Co., L. R. 21 Q. B. Div. 220, was a case where the facts were similar to those in the one now under consideration. The plaintiff was injured by falling on the steps leading to the defendant's railway station. He knew that the steps were dangerous, but went down carefully, holding the handrail; and it was held that these facts did not show such contributory negligence as to make the maxim "volenti non fit injuria" applicable, and therefore he was entitled to recover. The plaintiff in this case knew of the existence of the ditch, and, when the electric light went out, she carefully went four or five steps up the alley, and, knowing the proximity of the gully, she went down on her hands for the purpose of feeling her way so as to avoid it. Can the court say as matter of law that in doing so she was not in the exercise of ordinary care to avoid the danger? Or can the court say as matter of law that ordinary care would have compelled her, when the light went out, to retrace her steps and take another way to her home? She testified that this other way was more dangerous and inconvenient than the way by the alley, and, for this reason, pedestrians used the way she took. Can it be doubted that these questions were for the determination of the jury? Negligence is peculiarly and specially a question for the jury. In the case of City of Columbus v. Ogletree, 96 Ga. 178, 22 S. E. 709, the Supreme Court uses the following emphatic language: "If anything is settled in the law of this state, it is that, as a general rule, what will or will not constitute negligence is a question peculiarly for determination by the jury."

The case of Mosheuevel v. District of Columbia, 191 U. S. 247, 24 Sup. Ct. 57, 48 L. Ed. 170, is closely analogous to the present one. The plaintiff, a woman, was hurt by stumbling over a water box in the sidewalk. It was about four inches square, projecting irregularly above the level of the sidewalk, and was without covering of any kind. It was visible from the door of the plaintiff's home, and had existed, with her knowledge, in the same condition for some months before the accident. She had on a previous occasion stumbled over it; and, because she knew it, she took a long stride to get over it. She usually went around it. She testified that on the day she got hurt she had the box in view from the time she left her door, had it in mind all the time, and remembered its dangerous character, but that on this occasion she attempted to step over it, instead of going to one side, did not take a sufficiently long step, and put her foot into the hole and was thrown and hurt. The Supreme Court held that under these facts the court erred in directing a verdict for the defendant; because, under the undisputed proof, it was a question for the jury, and not for the court, to determine whether in attempting to step over the box, instead of going around it, she was guilty of such contributory negligence as would prevent her from recovering. In that case the court discusses at length the question of contributory negligence in the use of streets with knowledge of the existence of dangerous defects therein, and declares that "there is no rule of law that where a defect exists in a highway, and is known to one who elects to use such highway, such election, even if justified by the dictates of ordinary prudence, must as a matter of law entail the consequences of a want of ordinary care and prudence." Whether the use of the highway was negligence must in each case be evolved from the facts and circumstances of the particular case, taking into consideration the extent and character of the defect, and the degree of care exercised by the plaintiff in the use of the street with knowledge of the dangerous defect. To hold that the use of a street with knowledge of a dangerous defect would as a matter of law amount to an assumption of the risk in the event of injury, although, in choosing to make use of the street, and in the manner of the use, the greatest degree of judgment and care was exercised, "would be to relieve municipalities of all duty and consequent responsibility concerning defects in highways, provided only they choose to give notice of the existence of such defects." 191 U. S. 247, 24 Sup. Ct.

57, 48 L. Ed. 170. Of course, under the law in this state, the plaintiff could recover, even if guilty of contributory negligence, if the united acts of negligence on her part and on the part of the defendant caused the injury (the damage to be reduced according to the degree of negligence attributed to her), provided, by ordinary care, she could not have avoided the consequences to herself caused by defendant's negligence.

The able attorney for the city of Macon insists that the plaintiff failed to show any negligence on the part of the city, but that, assuming that such negligence was shown, it was also shown that the plaintiff, by the exercise of ordinary care, could have avoided the consequences to herself caused by such negligence, and therefore she is not entitled to recover. He asserts that "she voluntarily left an open street and went up an alley which she knew had an open drain or ditch on the side, where she would have to use extreme care, or she would fall into it; that in the dark, just as the light went out, her own common sense ought to have taught her that it was safer to step 14 inches up on safe brick steps in front of her house than to take the risk and negligently go up the alley in the dark, into what was a dangerous place." In reply it was doubtless urged that in the dark to go the way where she would have been compelled to step up 21 inches from the street to the sidewalk, and then up brick steps out of repair, 12 or 14 inches, was more dangerous than to go up the alley with caution and care to avoid falling into the ditch. These contentions presented clear-cut issues for the jury. The law could not make a selection. "Whether it is obligatory upon the plaintiff to pass over the walk known by her to be unsafe, or to pass around it upon the street, or to take the walk on the opposite side of the street, was a question which it was not the province of the court to determine as a matter of law. It is a question of fact for the jury, whether in passing over a walk known to be dangerous, instead of taking some other route, the plaintiff is, or is not, in the exercise of ordinary care." City of Sandwich v. Dolan, 133 Ill. 177, 24 N. E. 523, 23 Am. St. Rep. 598; 191 U. S. 263, 24 Sup. Ct. 57, 48 L. Ed. 170. The use of a sidewalk with knowledge of its dangerous condition may be evidence of negligence, but it is not negligence as a matter of law.

It is not our purpose in this review of the case to express any opinion on the merits. All we decide is that the plaintiff had sufficiently proved her case to entitle her to have it submitted to the decision of the jury.

She was deprived of this right by the judgment of nonsuit; and, for this reason, the judgment is reversed.

3. SAME.

In an issue formed on a motion to distribute money between judgments one plaintiff in fi. fa. cannot attack the judgment of another plaintiff in fi. fa. on the ground of irregularities previous to the judgment. The defects, to be subject to objection, must be such as are not amendable.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 30, Judgment, § 941.]

4. SAME.

Consequently, where the revived dormant judgment, dating from its revival, is older than another judgment, which carries with it no special lien on the fund, all the questions involved in the revival by scire facias are res adjudicata. The court cannot inquire or consider whether any other than the plaintiff in the judgment before him has been plaintiff in the original judgment revived by scire facias, and can only award the fund in dispute to the older lien.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Catoosa County; Flite, Judge.

One Chapman brought a rule against the officer who had made a sale of certain property requiring him to pay over the money on his fi. fa. and one Taliaferro intervened and was made a party to the rule, and asked that the money be applied to her fi. fa. Taliaferro's prayer was refused by the justice of the peace, but granted by the superior court, and Chapman brings error. Affirmed.

Payne & Payne, for plaintiff in error. J. H. Anderson, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. The question involved in this case is the priority of lien between two judgments against S. D. Taliaferro, the husband of the defendant in error, one of which is held by the plaintiff in error as guardian, and the other by Mrs. M. E. Taliaferro, the defendant in error, as transferee. The contest between the contending lienholders started in a justice's court. A horse levied upon as the property of the defendant, under the Chapman fi. fa., was claimed by the wife of defendant, the present defendant in error. Her claim was not sustained, either in the justice's court or in the superior court. The horse was found subject to Chapman's judgment, and was finally sold under the levy of his fi. fa. Chapman brought a rule against the officer who sold the horse, requiring him to pay the money over on his fi. fa., and the defendant in error intervened and was made a party to the rule, and asked that the money be applied to an execution which she held as transferee. Her prayer was refused by the justice, but granted by the judge of the superior court. Mrs. Taliaferro, the defendant in error, as transferee, had the oldest execution, but it was attacked by Chapman as void. The facts as to this fi. fa. are conceded to be as follows: A judgment was obtained by an original plaintiff, not disclosed by the record, against S. T. Taliaferro, which had been transferred in writing to Mrs. Whatley, the mother-in-law of the defendant. This judgment became dormant. Mrs. Whatley sought to revive it, the scire facias being in her own name as transferee. The judgment was duly revived, and the revival was placed on the record in Gordon county, where it was first obtained, and on the general execution docket in Catoosa county, where S. D. Taliaferro lived. All of this had been done before the debt was created, out of which Chapman's judgment grew. Chapman attacked this judgment, on the ground that it ought to have been in the name of the original plaintiff, for the use of the assignee, as provided in Civ. Code 1895, § 5384. The justice's court sustained this contention and awarded the money to the younger judgment. Mrs. Whatley in the meantime had transferred it to her daughter, the wife of the defendant, who carried the case by certiorari to the superior court, which court sustained the certiorari and awarded the money to Mrs. Taliaferro; and to this judgment plaintiff in error excepts. The question in the case, then, is whether the fi. fa. and the judgment on which it was issued were void by reason of the fact that the dormant judgment was revived, not in the name of the original plaintiff, for the use of the transferee, as is required by section 5384 of the Code, or whether its revival and proceeding in the name of the transferee is merely such an irregularity as would protect the judgment from collateral attack.

There is no question that the requirement of section 5384 is plain, and that it is intended, where a judgment has been assigned and has become dormant, that the scire facias to revive it shall proceed in the name, not of the transferee, as in this case, but in the name of the original plaintiff, for the use of the transferee. Section 5380 declares that scire facias to revive a dormant judgment is not an original action, but a continuation of the suit upon which the judgment was obtained, and is based upon a record. Where a dormant judgment has been revived, it is a lien on the defendant's property from the date of revival only. Foster v. Reid, 57 Ga.

609; Dunn v. Brogden, 68 Ga. 63. There can be no question, then, that in the case the dormant judgment, dating from its revival, March 6, 1901, is an older lien than the judgment in favor of the plaintiff in error, which was rendered June 27, 1904; and, unless the older judgment is void, the judgment of the superior court in awarding the funds in the hands of the constable to the defendant in error was right. The line of demarcation between a void judgment and a judgment voidable is not always plainly apparent. It has perhaps not been very definitely established in this state. Stanford v. Bradford, 45 Ga. 97. "A judgment that is void may be attacked in any court, and by anybody. In all other cases judgments cannot be impeached collaterally, but must be set aside by the court rendering them." Civ. Code 1895, § 5373. "Creditors or bona fide purchasers may attack a judgment for any defect appearing on the face of the record or pleadings, * * * whenever and wherever it interferes with their rights." Civ. Code, 1895, § 5371. These sections must be construed together, to enable us to know when and how a judgment can be attacked as being void. We shall not attempt to summarize what is included in the words "void for any other cause," following the statement of the well-known principle that the judgment of a court having no jurisdiction of the person and subject-matter is a mere nullity, as laid down in section 5369, but it is fundamental that the judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction cannot be collaterally attacked in any other court for irregularity, but shall be held a valid judgment until reversed or set aside. Civ. Code 1895, § 5368. The question, then, is: Was the fi. fa. revived by scire facias void, because the transferee proceeded by a scire facias in her own name, instead of in the name of the original plaintiff, for her use, or was this such an irregularity as is protected from attack?

One of the tests which can be applied to determine whether a judgment is void is whether it can be set aside by motion in arrest of judgment. If the judgment can be arrested by motion, it is always void. But a third person, not a party to the record, cannot move to set aside a judgment not against him. This right appertains only to a party to the case. Civ. Code 1895, § 5362; Merchants' Bank v. Haiman, 80 Ga. 624, 5 S. E. 795. Chapman, then, could not have made a motion in arrest as to the judgment transferred to Mrs. Taliaferro, because he was no party to it, and therefore this test cannot be applied in this case; but, if he had been a party, the motion in arrest could be sustained only for defects appearing on the face of the pleadings, which could not be cured by amendment nor aided by verdict. The pleadings must be so defective that no legal judgment can be rendered thereon. Merritt v. Bagwell, 70 Ga. 578. If, then, Chapman had during the term moved to arrest the judgment, and had been a party thereto, he would not have succeeded, because the scire facias was amendable by substituting the name of the original plaintiff, suing for the use of the transferee. Civ. Code 1895, §§ 5105-5108. It is conceded that the superior court of Gordon county had jurisdiction, and hence the judgment was not voided on that account.

The rule for determining whether this revived judgment is or is not void, it would seem, should be analogous to the decision in Dunn v. Brogden, 68 Ga. 63, which says that "so long as the judgment of revival is unreversed, the same having been rendered by the court having jurisdiction, the fact that the original judgment was dormant, whether true or false, is res adjudicata, and is not open to question on a motion to distribute money arising from the sale of defendant's property." It is true that the subject of attack in the case cited was whether the judgment was more than 10 years old (and the same question was passed on in Wiley v. Kelsey, 9 Ga. 117, Kelsey v. Wiley, 10 Ga. 371, and Wiley v. Kelsey, 13 Ga. 223); whereas, in this case the objection made is that the scire facias proceeded contrary to section 5384 of the Code, and judgment was revived in behalf of the wrong plaintiff. But the principle is the same. By the provisions of section 3761 of the Code, and the ruling in Selbels v. Hodges, 65 Ga. 245, it is absolutely necessary that a dormant judgment shall be revived in three years from its dormancy, just as much so as it is required by section 5384 that the plaintiff in scire facias (where the judgment has been transferred) shall be the original plaintiff for the use of the transferee. After judgment the failure to comply with either of these requirements in a given case does not render the judgment void, but it is to be treated as an irregularity which can be reached and taken advantage of only in a proceeding brought for that express purpose. The plaintiff in error relies on section 5371, and insists that creditors may attack a judgment for any defect appearing on the face of the record where it interferes with their right. In Stanford v. Bradford, 45 Ga. 98, Judge McCay, construing section 5371 (then section 3596), says: "Does this mean that a creditor or bona fide purchaser may attack a judgment, etc., for a mere irregularity? That, in one sense of the word, is a defect, it is true; but this section is to be taken with section 5356, which provides that judgments shall not be attacked collaterally for a mere irregularity. It was not the intent of the codifiers to change the old law. And in construing the Code this intention ought not to be assumed. The rule on this subject has long been well settled. For want of jurisdiction a judgment may be attacked collaterally. This may also be done by a stranger if the judgment be so defective as that it is null and void. The distinction between a mere irregularity and a defect which renders the judgment void is not very definitely established. The best marked distinction we take to be this: A mere irregularity is amendable; under our law, is cured by a judgment; and anything which, if objected to, could have been amended, does not render the judgment void. McNamara on Nullities and Irregularities, 6." "To set aside a judgment rendered by a court having jurisdiction to adjudicate a question, a direct proceeding must be had." Dunagan v. Stadler, 101 Ga. 479, 29 S. E. 440. To the same effect are the rulings in Dill v. Jones, 3 Ga. 79; Steers v. Morgan, 66 Ga. 552, 555; Moss v. Stokeley, 95 Ga. 675, 678, 22 S. E. 692; Artope v. Macon R. Co., 110 Ga. 346, 348, 35 S. E. 657. From the above it appears that the decision of the justice's court, in awarding the fund to the plaintiff in error, was wrong; and the judgment of the superior court, sustaining the certiorari, was right.

Judgment affirmed.

ANDREWS v. JOHN CHURCH CO. (No. 250.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. April 4, 1907.)

1. WRIT OF ERROR—DISMISSAL—DEFECTS IN PROCEEDINGS FOR REVIEW.

A writ of error will not be dismissed by this court for mere informality or lack of formal statements, where the alleged errors sought to be corrected can be clearly gathered from the bill of exceptions alone, or from an examination of the bill of exceptions and the record transmitted therewith.

2. EVIDENCE—PAROL EVIDENCE—CONTRADICTION OF WRITTEN CONTRACT.

A demurrer to a plea of a defendant in an action on a written contract promising to pay a stated sum of money, which plea set up a parol contract made before the execution of the written contract, by the terms of which payments on said contract were to be made in specifics, and not in money, was properly sustained.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 20, Evidence, §§ 2030, 2048.]

3. ASSIGNMENTS—RIGHTS AND LIABILITIES OF PARTIES—SUFFICIENCY OF ASSIGNMENT.

The title of the holder of a conditional contract of sale, transferred or indorsed in writing, cannot be inquired into unless it appears that the inquiry would in some way protect the defendant or let in a meritorious defense; but an entry on the contract in these words, "For value received, we hereby guarantee the payment of the within conditional purchase contract, and waive presentation, demand, protest, notice of nonpayment, and notice of protest," is not a transfer nor an indorsement. These words conveyed no title either in the paper or the property described therein, did not make the plaintiff a holder of the instrument in question, and gave the plaintiff no right of action against the maker.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 4, Assignments, §§ 78, 232.]

4. SAME.

Consequently it was error to admit such contract in evidence, and to direct a verdict for the plaintiff.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Atlanta; Reid, Judge.

Action by the John Church Company against one Andrews on a contract of sale of a piano. Judgment for plaintiff and defendant brings error. Reversed.

T. C. Battle, for plaintiff in error. W. A. Fuller, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. 1. The defendant in error made a motion to dismiss the writ of error, upon the ground that the assignment of error is too general to be considered by the court, and upon the further ground that the bill of exceptions does not plainly specify the decisions complained of and the errors alleged. The whole question on a motion to dismiss is whether the errors complained of are so presented as to be clearly understood by this court in determining the rights of the parties. We do not think there is any merit in the motion to dismiss. It is true that the bill of exceptions does not set forth a brief of the evidence eo nomine, and, for that reason, we cannot know or consider as evidence that which is not presented; but as to all the rulings of the court which are material to be considered the bill of exceptions is both clear and full, and the plaintiff in error, after a very minute recital of her various contentions and objections as defendant in the court below, with a distinct statement of the ruling of the court as to each, "assigns as error the rulings of the court heretofore specifically set out, refusing to allow him to introduce evidence heretofore set out, and upon the close of the case directing a verdict and entering up judgment, both special and general." The bill of exceptions is really unnecessarily full. It purports to give verbatim the greater number of the questions asked by defendant's counsel, his objections and contentions, and to quote (as certified to be true) the exact language used by the judge in his various rulings. Certainly we are not able to say, having an exact reproduction or photograph of what occurred at the trial before us, and these different matters assigned as error, that there is not enough in the record to enable us to determine the errors complained of. It is true that there is no formal statement that exception was taken to the rulings of the court at the time of the trial or of the ruling. But this is purely formal. Under Civ. Code 1895, § 5569, the real question which determines whether a bill of exceptions is or is not able to resist a motion to dismiss is whether or not there is such an assignment of error as will enable this court to know what are the specific grounds of complaint, and whether there is enough in the bill of exceptions alone, or in the bill of exceptions and the record taken together, to enable this court to pass upon the questions at issue. There is no difficulty in this case in determining either what errors are complained of, or whether the complaints are justified by law. Especially is this true as to the error in admitting in evidence the instrument upon which the action is based, and the written entry thereon, over defendant's specific objection that such entry was neither an indorsement nor a transfer, and showed no title in the plaintiff. The motion to dismiss is therefore overruled.

2-4. The John Church Company brought suit against Mrs. Andrews on a contract of sale of a piano, which was as follows: "This contract is given subject to the approval of McArthur & Sons Co. No agent is authorized to make any contract or verbal promise differing in any wise from that written and printed herein, or to collect money thereon, unless he presents proper authority from McArthur & Sons Co. $350.00. Atlanta, Ga., Aug. 20, 1903. Received of McArthur & Sons Co., under conditional contract for the sale thereof, as hereinafter stated, one Harvard Piano, Style G, No. 13507, on which I have this day paid ten dollars, and in addition hereby promise to pay McArthur & Sons Co., or order, the sum of three hundred and forty dollars, with interest from maturity at 6 per cent. per annum, in instalments of eight dollars per month * * * payable on the 15th day of each month, until the above named sum, with interest, shall have been paid in full; said payments to be forwarded by postal money order, draft or registered letter, at my expense, to McArthur & Sons Co., waiving all valuation and appraisal laws of Ga. This contract is given for the conditional purchase of Harvard Style, No. 13507, the conditions of which are that the said piano shall remain the property of McArthur & Sons Co. or its assigns, until this contract is paid in full; and at any time after default of payment of any of the instalments, or in said case piano is removed from the residence I now occupy, before the payment of this contract, without the written consent of McArthur & Sons Co., the said McArthur & Sons Co. may resume possession of and remove the said piano without being required to refund anything which may have been paid previously on it, and the said payment shall be retained by McArthur & Sons Co., or its assigns, as rent and liquidated damages. By mutual agreement between the bargainor and the bargainee, the sale of said instrument in case same is replevied is hereby waived. Loss in case of fire or other accident to be borne by the undersigned. And it is agreed, if this conditional contract is placed in the hands of an attorney at law for collection, or has to be sued on, that I will pay ten per cent. attorney's fees in addition to the principal and interest, which fees shall be added to and become part of the judgment. And it is further agreed that upon failure to make the payments as they become due, as stated above, the total amount of this conditional contract shall become due and payable. [Signed] Mrs. Sarah E. Andrews."

The plaintiff alleged that the bill of sale had been transferred to it for value received. It further alleged that $111 had been paid, and that nine installments of $8 each were then due, and it elected, under the terms of the contract, to declare the full amount of the balance to be due—that is, $239—besides interest, and asked a general and special judgment. The defendant pleaded that the contract was not the property of the John Church Company, and that it cannot legally sue on said contract. She further pleaded that she had paid $123 and made all payments promptly, under the terms of the trade as made by her with the parties from whom she purchased the piano; that she was to pay said $350, not in money, but in board of employes of McArthur & Sons Company; that she purchased the piano upon that understanding; and that said terms of purchase were ratified by McArthur & Sons Company. On demurrer the court struck all of defendant's pleas except the one which set up that the contract was not the property of the John Church Company, and, after the introduction of the contract and the so-called transfer, directed a verdict for the plaintiff. The question presented for our determination is whether the court erred in restricting the case to this one issue, and, finally, in directing a verdict for the plaintiff.

The defendant's answer did not deny the execution of the instrument which was the foundation of the suit; and, as the court could not legally allow the terms of the written instrument to be varied by the introduction of parol evidence in regard to the payment of the installments by board instead of money, the plea of the defendant, which set up a parol contract totally at variance with that sued upon, which was in writing, was properly stricken. It appears that the court thereafter throughout the trial dealt with the case upon the assumption that the written contract of sale had been transferred and that all rights thereunder had been assigned to the bearer by McArthur & Sons Co., and that, for that reason, the John Church Company had the right, in its own name, to maintain an action upon it. If the trial judge had been right in supposing that the paper was really transferred, his subsequent rulings and his final disposition of the case would have been right; for all of the evidence offered by the defendant on the trial and rejected by the court tended to question the title of the plaintiff, the holder of the paper upon which suit was brought; and, while a defendant can always inquire into the title of a holder of a contract on which he is being sued, if it be to his interest, still that title cannot be inquired into unless it appears that the inquiry would in some way protect the defendant or let in a meritorious defense. If there had been a transfer of the instrument in question, the title of the holder could not properly have been inquired into; for, the payee having parted with all its title and interest in the contract by a written indorsement and physical delivery of the paper, a transfer or an indorsement would have carried with it the idea of negotiation, and the negotiated instrument, when payment therefor has been made to the holder, becomes functus officio. The original payee, having received value for his indorsement to the holder, has been satisfied, and his rights are at an end; and by payment to the holder she would be fully protected against any legitimate consequences or liabilities assumed by her in entering into the contract. If there had been a transfer (as the plaintiff admitted the execution of the contract and does not contend that she has not been allowed credit for all payments made thereon), the trial judge would have been right in holding that the defendant was not hurt by the judgment, and that all of the evidence offered on the subject of title was immaterial. Had there been a transfer or an assignment in writing, as the learned judge supposed, this case would be practically identical with that of Johnson v. Cobb, 100 Ga. 139, 28 S. E. 72, and the ruling in that case would be applicable in this. But we think the learned trial judge was in error in admitting the contract in evidence over defendant's objection, and in holding that the entry thereon was either such assignment or indorsement of the instrument in question as could evidence title in the plaintiff or entitle it to maintain an action thereon. The so-called indorsement is in these words: "For value received, we hereby guarantee the payment of the within conditional purchase contract, and waive presentation, demand, protest, notice of nonpayment and notice of protest." These words amount to nothing except to guarantee payment. They do not import any transfer of the title, either in the legal instrument, the contract, or the physical instrument therein described, and to which title is reserved by the vendor. Because they do not convey the title to the legal instrument the plaintiff was not entitled to its general judgment; and, for consequent failure of title in the musical instrument, the special judgment is out of tune. The objection of the defendant to the evidence, as certified in the bill of exceptions—that the contract offered in evidence did not show title in the plaintiff, for the reason that the entry thereon was neither a transfer nor an indorsement—was well taken, and should have been sustained.

We confess that during the oral argument of this case this court fell into the same error as did the learned trial judge, but after a more thorough investigation and mature consideration we have no hesitancy in holding that the written entry of the words quoted above on the contract submitted in evidence gave the plaintiff, the John Church Company, no right whatever to maintain this action. Counsel for defendant in error cites the case of Vanzant v. Arnold, 31 Ga. 212, and says that "an indorsement worded almost exactly as that involved in the case at bar was held to be not merely a guaranty, but such an indorsement as would render the indorsers liable as such." We see no similarity whatever in the case cited and the present case, except that there was a guarantee in the Vanzant Case as well as a transfer of title. As there was a transfer, the guaranty was immaterial. The words of the transfer in the Vanzant Case were clear and explicit: "For value received we assign the within notes to Arnold, Johnson & Hamilton and to H. E. Diblee & Company, waiving demand and notice, and guarantee the payment of the same." While there was a guaranty, the case turned on the fact that there was a written assignment which operated to transfer title, and the guaranty of payment was considered by the Supreme Court merely as defining the liability of the indorsement, as expressed in the word "assign." This is evident from the language of the decision on this subject, as appears on page 212: "We think the defendants are indorsers. Their written engagement on the back of the note has the legal effect of an indorsement in Georgia of notes not payable or intended for negotiation in banks. That they stipulate therein to guarantee the payment of the notes does not the less make them indorsers under the act of 1826, * * * for by it they have the right to define their liability; and thus may be guarantors, and yet indorsers, within the meaning and provisions of that act."

There is no question that a promissory note not containing any words of negotiability is so far negotiable by indorsement of the payee in blank as to pass the title to a bona fide holder and enable him to sue the maker in his own name. Shelley v. Baker, 125 Ga. 663, 54 S. E. 653. But this is not a case of indorsement in blank; because the very words used import a guaranty, and exclude the presumption of indorsement which arises where one signs his name across a contract. The cases of Habersham v. Lehman, 63 Ga. 383, Heard v. De Loach, 105 Ga. 500, 30 S. E. 940, and National Bank v. Leonard, 91 Ga. 805, 18 S. E. 32, as well as the Shelley Case, above cited, are none of them applicable in this case, because they all deal with indorsements in blank. The decision in Geiser Co. v. Jones, 90 Ga. 309, 17 S. E. 81, is conclusive of the fact that the entry on the contract in this case is a mere guaranty. And while the words quoted by counsel for defendant in error, "had the payee of these notes signed [such a] contract upon them with a third person, and * * * afterwards negotiated them to such third person, [the payee] could, under our law, be sued and made answerable as indorser," appear in the opinion in that case, this point was not involved in the case, and the language quoted is in conflict with the rest of the decision, and is therefore clearly obiter dictum. On the contrary, words similar to those used in the contract now under our consideration were there held to constitute the signers not indorsers, but guarantors. "On each note was the following, without date, signed by Jones & Toole: 'For a consideration not herein named, we guarantee the payment of this claim to the Geiser Manufacturing Company.'" The case was dismissed as to Jones & Toole, and the plaintiff excepted. In rendering the opinion, Chief Justice Bleckley says: "Whether the present case falls within this exception [Civ. Code 1895, § 5873] depends on the question whether Jones & Toole, declared against as indorsers, are such in fact, or whether the terms of their contract render them liable to the plaintiffs, not as indorsers, but as guarantors only. By its very nature a contract of indorsement cannot be entered into with the payee of a promissory note as indorsee, but a contract of guaranty can be made with him as well as with any subsequent holder. Nor does the mere indorsement of a contract upon a note render the signer of the contract an indorser, within the legal and proper meaning of the term. It is true that in a physical sense he is an indorser by the mere position of his name on the paper; but we apprehend that the Constitution intends by the term 'indorser' to refer to a person who has entered into a contract of indorsement as distinguished from contracts of a different class. * * * A contract of indorsement is one of negotiation. Where there is no negotiation, either real or apparent—that is, either in substance or in form—there can be no such contract. * * * Why should it not be held that the parties, one and all, contemplated the class of contract which the words they employed, naturally and fairly construed, import, to wit, a contract of guaranty? This is the better and safer construction. Jones & Toole, being guarantors, not indorsers, were exempt from suit in any county of the state, except in Troup where they resided." See, also, Trust Co. v. National Bank, 101 U. S. 68, 25 L. Ed. 876.

PERKINS et al. v. TERRELL, Governor.
(No. 79.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Feb. 20, 1907.)

1. BAIL—SURRENDER—WHAT CONSTITUTES.

"Bail may surrender their principal in vacation to the sheriff or in open court, in discharge of themselves from liability." Penal Code 1895, § 935. Producing or presenting a principal in court is not all that is required to discharge the obligation and relieve securities from their liability under a criminal bond. In order for a surrender of the principal in open court to be effective, the attention of the court must be called to the presence of the defendant principal, and the intention to surrender him must be definitely expressed and understood.

(a) The highest evidence of surrender is an exoneretur entered upon the minutes.

(b) "There is no evidence here at all of a surrender into custody. Being in court is one thing, being in custody another." Williams v. Jenkins, 53 Ga. 167.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 5, Bail, § 331.]

2. SAME—FORFEITURE—SCIRE FACIAS.

A proceeding by scire facias to forfeit a criminal recognizance is a civil case, distinctly separate from the criminal indictment, and ancillary thereto for one purpose only—the securing of the defendant's presence. The rule nisi and scire facias may be disposed of by a judgment of dismissal, with judgment for costs only, without invalidating the appearance bond of the defendant or relieving his securities.

3. SAME.

If the defendant is called in court on the sounding of his case, the uttering and repeating of the ancient and customary words of formal forfeiture becomes a useless and perfunctory ceremonial. The real beginning of the proceeding to forfeit a recognizance being the issuance of the rule nisi and its signature by the judge, a dismissal of the rule nisi, or a discharge therefrom by the court in passing upon the answer, will not prevent a subsequent forfeiture of the bond, where the sureties have neither surrendered their principal nor paid the costs.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Washington; Hardeman, Judge.

Action by Terrell, Governor, against Perkins and others on a recognizance. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Affirmed.

F. W. Gilbert and W. A. Slaton, for plaintiffs in error. R. C. Norman, Sol., for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. Perkins was indicted by the grand jury of Wilkes county and was arrested on a bench warrant, and Hill and Crouch, as his securities, entered into a recognizance by which they bound themselves to be responsible for the appearance of their principal, Perkins, at the next superior court, and "from day to day and term to term," to answer to the indictment, and "not to depart thence without the leave of said court." The indictment was transferred to the city court of Washington, and the recognizance or appearance bond went with it as matter of law. At the October term, 1904, of said city court, the defendant, Perkins, failed to appear, his bond was formally forfeited, and a rule nisi, in usual form, issued and was signed by the judge. The rule nisi, after reciting the making of the bond, its terms, and its formal forfeiture, called upon Perkins, principal, and Hill and Crouch, securities, to show cause at the next term of court why this order should not be made final, and scire facias was ordered to issue. The securities were each served personally with copy of the scire facias. It cannot be determined from the record whether Perkins appeared at the next quarterly term, in January, 1905, or not. However, from the fact that no judgment absolute was taken at the January term, 1905, it may be assumed that he was then present in court, though no action was taken by the court on the rule nisi. At the April term, 1905, the court considered the rule nisi (and presumably the answer of the defendants thereto, though no answer was sent up), and on April 18th entered up the first one of the two judgments which have been brought to our consideration by the writ of error. At the October term, 1905, the defendant again failed to appear; and the court allowed the same bond upon which a rule nisi was granted October 18, 1904, and on which scire facias had been issued and judgment for costs had been rendered, to be again formally forfeited. Another rule in the same language as the first was granted and scire facias again ordered to issue. Thereupon the securities answered, by their attorneys, and pleaded a discharge from any and all liability as securities on the appearance bond of their principal, Perkins, and insisted that by reason of the judgment of April 18, 1905, heretofore referred to, their bond could not again be forfeited, the body of their principal having been produced to the court and the costs paid in accordance with its prior judgment. The issue thus formed (there being no traverse of the answer) was submitted to the court without a jury, his honor Judge S. H. Hardeman presiding, who found against the defendant securities and entered up judgment against them, by rule absolute on the bond, for the full amount of the recognizance and costs.

The bill of exceptions excepts to the judgment on six grounds, and in each assigns error as follows: (1) That said judgment is contrary to law. (2) That said judgment is contrary to the evidence, against the weight of the evidence, and is without evidence to support it. (3) That it appearing, from the evidence and the admissions of counsel for plaintiff, that the bond sought to be forfeited in this proceeding had been once forfeited before, and that defendants John J. Hill and J. S. Crouch had produced the body of their principal, W. D. Perkins, in answer to a rule nisi, before final judgment, and had been relieved from further liability on said first rule nisi, the judgment of the city court of Washington discharging said securities from further liability on said first scire facias and rule nisi discharged said securities absolutely, and they are not liable on a second forfeiture of said bond. (4) That a second forfeiture of the same bond given for the appearance of the accused is illegal and void. (5) That the order of Judge William H. Toombs on the first forfeiture of said bond discharged said securities absolutely from further liability on said bond. (6) That it appearing from the record of said city court of Washington, properly introduced in evidence, that said securities had produced the body of their principal to the court in answer to a rule nisi and scire facias forfeiting their bond, the said securities were discharged by said act, and were not further liable on said bond. The consideration of the last four grounds will dispose of the first two, which are formal only. And relieving assignments 3, 4, 5, and 6 of useless verbiage, they can be satisfactorily determined by grouping their subject-matter in an interrogative form, into two inquiries, and correctly answering these questions: (1) Were these securities relieved and discharged from further liability on the bond because they produced their principal at court in response to the scire facias, before the judgment rendered on the first nisi? (2) Were the securities discharged from liability by the former judgment of the court? The answer to both questions, in our opinion, depends almost wholly on the terms and meaning of the order or judgment for costs. Its terms are as follows: "It appearing to the court that the principal in the within recognizance has been produced, it is ordered and adjudged that the securities upon said recognizance be discharged from liability upon this rule nisi upon payment of the costs of rule nisi and scire facias. It is further ordered and adjudged that the officers of the city court of Washington do recover of the said W. D. Perkins, principal, and Jno. J. Hill and J. S. Crouch, securities, the sum of twelve and  $\frac{50}{100}$  dollars, costs of this rule nisi and scire facias. This 18th April, 1905. W. H. Toombs, Judge C. C. W." "Cost paid this 25 day of Nov. 1905. E. G. Binns, Clerk." Its meaning is made more clear by reference to the purpose of the rule nisi, as shown by the words employed therein (after the statement of the principal's absence and the formal forfeiture): "It is therefore ordered by the court that the said W. D. Perkins, principal, and Jno. J. Hill and J. S. Crouch, securities, forfeit their obligation, and that the said J. M. Terrell, Governor, or his successor, recover against the said W. D. Perkins principal, and Jno. J. Hill and J. S. Crouch, securities, the sum of one hundred dollars, the amount of their obligation so forfeited as aforesaid, unless at the next term of this court they show sufficient cause why this order should not be made final," etc.

It must be borne in mind that the forfeiture of a criminal bond (including rule nisi, scire facias, answer, and final judgment or rule absolute) is not a part of the criminal case, but a distinct civil proceeding ancillary to the criminal for only one purpose—to procure the presence of the accused. The rule nisi is a mere warning—an order to show cause why the defendant is absent. If good and sufficient cause is shown, the court may dismiss the rule without costs. If sufficient cause for the absence of the defendant principal is shown, but the showing could, by the exercise of proper diligence, have been presented sooner, and the cause thereby have been continued without the annoyance, delay, and expense which has attached by reason of lack of a more timely showing, the court may dismiss the rule nisi, but adjudge the costs against the defendants, as penalty for their dilatoriness and so as not to deprive the officers of the just reward of their services. Neither depends upon or infers a surrender of the principal, though, if the principal has been surrendered, the action of the court would not be different. And the principal is not required to be in the custody of the sheriff, if the court, at the time of passing the judgment, is satisfied the principal is within reach of the court, in the custody of his bondsmen. Either course is in the discretion of the court, unless the defendant is again absent, when, unless the scire facias be continued, upon showing as in other causes, judgment absolute will be rendered for the amount of the bond and costs.

We can only make our answer to the first question by the record. The rule nisi summoned principal and securities to offer their excuse, if they had any, for the absence of the principal. The securities present the principal, produce him, so as to prevent a judgment absolute for the full amount of the obligation. The presence or production absolutely prevents any further present proceeding as to the principal sum mentioned in the obligation, for the court can now, if he wishes, try the defendant. But naturally says the law, "Why were you absent, and why were the court and officers put to trouble and labor by your former absence?" This is all that is left to the civil proceeding by rule nisi and scire facias. If the principal had an imperative excuse for his absence, the court will excuse him by dismissing the rule without the costs. If his excuse presents no good reason for his absence, the most the court can do, so far as that separate civil suit or scire facias is concerned, is to have judgment entered against the principal and his bondsmen for costs. The purpose of the rule nisi being to warn the securities that unless the defendant appear the bond will be finally forfeited, forfeiture is prevented either by the appearance of the principal or by showing good excuse why he was absent; but the bond is not annulled or its status changed. To do this, by section 935 of the Penal Code of 1895, the principal must be surrendered. The word used in the judgment for costs is the defendant was "produced." The order in question is not an exoneration, and therefore not an evidence of a surrender. It in nowise gives defendant "leave to depart." "It appearing to the court that the principal has been produced" cannot be construed as evidence of a surrender into custody. To produce or show a person or thing is not synonymous with "surrender." "Produce," according to Webster's International Dictionary, means "to bring forward; to lead forth; to offer to view or notice; to exhibit; to show"—while "surrender" the same authority defines: "To yield to the power of another; to give or deliver up possession of (anything) upon compulsion or demand; as, to surrender one's person to an enemy or an officer; * * * to yield; to render or deliver up; to give up; as, a principal surrendered by his bail." In Williams v. Jenkins, 53 Ga. 167, the court held that an entry of the Solicitor General reciting payment of costs and that the defendant appeared in court was no discharge of the bond or satisfaction of the estreatment. In that case Judge McCay says: "There is no evidence here at all of a surrender into custody. Being in court is one thing, being in custody is another." The securities in their answer do not aver that they surrendered Perkins, or relinquished that custody the law vested in them as sureties, or that it was their desire or intention to surrender him. They merely aver that they are discharged from liability because they produced him in response to the rule nisi of the court, when they had already obligated themselves to do this by their bond. So that there is no evidence of a surrender, because there is no exoneration shown. Griffin v. Moore, 2 Ga. 331; Dennard v. State, 2 Ga. 137. We are compelled, therefore, to answer the first question in the negative and take up the second interrogatory.

Did the judgment operate to discharge the sureties? We hardly think that the familiar doctrine insisted upon by counsel for plaintiff in error and embodied in Civ. Code 1895, § 2972, has any application in this case. The judgments of courts are not upon the same plane as the acts of individuals, in such sense as that the surety on a bail bond can be said to be injured and his risk increased by a judgment. If he did not understand it, he could except to it. Counsel for plaintiff in error, in his brief, says: "Under the facts of this case, was the risk of the sureties increased by the action of the court? These sureties were not men versed in the law. They did not have the legal ability necessary to draw the distinction between releasing them from further liability on that scire facias, and releasing them from further liability on the bond, which they believed to be satisfied by the judgment. They understood themselves to be released from further liability, and sought to keep the principal within their reach no longer. Except for that judgment they probably could and would have kept him within reach of the court, and have saved themselves by producing him when called on to do so." In reply to this we can only say (even if we could go outside of the record to construe the judgment) that a discharge from a rule nisi and a discharge from liability on a criminal recognizance are so different that knowledge of the difference has to be assumed on the same principle that ignorance of the law is no excuse or protection. So far from being an exoneration on the bond, the judgment of Judge Toombs expressly confines the release to the rule nisi. The judgment contains no hidden force within it that can so expand it as to make it embrace more than it expresses. It has no effect beyond its plain terms and meaning.

Expressio unius est exclusio alterius. The securities are excepted from a discharge by the unmistakable terms of the judgment. Furthermore, the dismissal of the rule nisi was predicated on payment of the costs, and it appears from the record that the prerequisite was not complied with until November 25, 1905, more than a month after the issuance of the second rule nisi. This would have defeated a discharge and have allowed the rendition of judgment absolute on the first rule, if not on the second. Pen. Code 1895, § 935; Ward v. Colquitt, 62 Ga. 267. So that the judgment for costs on the rule nisi, April 18, 1905, did not discharge or relieve the securities on the bond.

Another question is presented by the briefs to which we will direct our attention. It is the inquiry whether a bond can be formally forfeited and rule nisi be issued more than once. As stated in briefs of counsel for both parties, the question has never been expressly decided. But, bearing in mind the fact that the formal words of forfeiture by which the defendant is orally called in court by the sheriff, who, repeating after the state's counsel, likewise warns the securities by name to produce the body of the principal as they are bound to do, etc., is merely an ancient formality, now virtually of no service, and that the forfeiture really begins with the judge's signature to the rule nisi, and considering further that the function of this rule, as before stated, is merely to notify the bondsmen, it is clear to our minds that there is no reason why numerous rules nisi and scire facias may not issue without affecting its validity, or its binding force as regards the sureties. The bond does not become functus officii until there has been entered on the minutes a rearrest of the defendant under order of the judge at his discretion (Smith v. Kitchens, 51 Ga. 160, 21 Am. Rep. 232), or unless there has been a surrender of the principal, or a judgment absolute for the amount of the obligation, or there has been a rearrest of the defendant by an order entered in pursuance of a motion to strengthen the bond by additional security. The scire facias is a civil suit. No one would insist that to bring a suit on a note, and, for any one of various reasons, to dismiss it, would avoid the note and prevent a subsequent action. The rule nisi and scire facias constitute the beginning of a suit on the criminal bond, and can be dismissed without prejudicing or preventing a subsequent forfeiture.

Counsel for plaintiff in error insists that the law applicable to sureties under ordinary circumstances applies to sureties on a recognizance, and any act of the law, or its machinery, the court or its officers, which increases the risk of the sureties, will relieve them. Under Civ. Code 1895, § 2972, acts of "the creditor"—the opposite party—are those that relieve. Certain acts of the Solicitor

General representing the state—the opposite party—can relieve sureties, but the court in rendering a judgment is in no sense the opposite party. If his acts are erroneous, they can be taken advantage of only in the manner provided by law for review. Certainly the authorities cited do not support the contention of plaintiff in error. In Lamb v. State, 73 Ga. 587, the case in which the principal was bound to appear and answer had been continued, and the bond did not (as in the present case) obligate the securities to produce the principal from "term to term." Likewise in Colquitt v. Smith, 65 Ga. 341, the bond, not being from term to term, was not forfeitable, because functus officii—it had served its day. In Roberts v. Gordon, 86 Ga. 386, 12 S. E. 648, the principal had been tried, convicted, and sentenced, and the court was obliged to hold that after sentence he ought to have been, and hence was presumed to be, in the custody of the sheriff. Bethune v. Dozier, 10 Ga. 235, was not a case of forfeiture of a criminal bond. The most that can appear from that case to be applicable even as argument in this is the principle that, "the undertaking of a surety being stricti juris, he cannot * * * be bound further than the very terms of his contract; and, if the principal and obligee change the terms of it without his consent, the surety is discharged." While the state, in the name of the Governor, is the obligee, the judge is not even officially a party thereto, and, as we have stated above, a judgment of the court cannot be treated as in the class with the acts of individuals by which, the risk of a surety being increased, he is released. The actions of a court are subject-matter of review.

We conclude, therefore, that the judgment of the city court of Washington was right. None of the exceptions are well taken, and therefore the judgment is affirmed.

SEABOARD AIR LINE RY. v. BOSTOCK. (No. 63.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Feb. 13, 1907.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT—ACTION FOR INJURIES—DECLARATION—SUFFICIENCY.

The declaration as amended is good as against a general demurrer.

2. TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—LAW APPLICABLE TO PARTICULAR THEORIES.

The principle of law contained in Civ. Code 1895, § 3830, that, "if the plaintiff by ordinary care could have avoided the consequences to himself caused by the defendant's negligence, he is not entitled to recover," having been clearly and distinctly raised by the answer and the evidence, it was reversible error for the court not to have given this law in charge to the jury, even without any request to do so. Atlanta Ry. Co. v. Gardner, 49 S. E. 818, 122 Ga. 92, 93 (7).

3. WRIT OF ERROR—OBJECTIONS BELOW—MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL—GROUNDS—AUTHENTICATION OF STATEMENT.

Where one of the grounds in the motion for new trial is the failure of the court to charge the above principle of law, and the question is made before this court that there is no sufficient verification of this ground, the court will examine the record and bill of exceptions to ascertain if such is the fact; and where it appears from the record that said ground of the motion was presented to the trial court, considered, and overruled, and it further appears that the entire charge delivered to the jury had been approved by the judge, and was at that time a part of the record, and, from an examination thereof, it is manifest that the court did not give in charge the foregoing principle, such facts, taken together, will be considered by this court as a sufficient verification of said ground of the motion. Colson v. Meyers, 5 S. E. 504, 80 Ga. 499 (3).

4. TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—LAW APPLICABLE TO PARTICULAR THEORIES.

The error of the court set out in the second headnote requiring a new trial, a decision on the other assignments of error is not necessary.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Savannah; Norwood, Judge.

Action by one Bostock against the Seaboard Air Line Railway for personal injuries. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

The plaintiff alleged that he was employed by the defendant company as a switchman, and while so engaged it became his duty to place against the wheel of a box car a chock, being a piece of scantling four by four inches square, and four or five feet long; that the railroad track ran east and west, and the chock was placed on the south rail of the track, 10 or 12 inches of the end of the chock being between the rails, and the longer part pointing south and being held in its position by being pressed against the car wheel; that he adopted the proper and usual method of chocking the wheel to prevent the car from rolling west and to cause it to remain stationary; that the object in chocking the wheel was to enable other servants of the company to couple a train to this box car; that it was the duty of the engineer of the train to have so backed it as to avoid coming in contact with the box car with unusual force and violence, but he backed the train against the box car with such great and unusual force and violence that the wheel of the moving train ran upon the chock and threw the projecting end of it around, so that it struck the plaintiff on the right leg near the knee, throwing him to the ground and producing a wound that has resulted in permanent injury to him (describing it, and alleging the damages sustained); that he did not know, and could not by ordinary care have known, that the engineer was about to strike the stationary car and the projecting scantling with great and unusual force and violence, but had reason to believe that he would have caused the train to back slowly and with due care. By its answer the defendant alleged that the injuries complained of were not caused by any negligence on its part, but were caused by the plaintiff's negligence, or arose from one of the risks of the business in which he was engaged; that by the exercise of ordinary care he could have avoided the injuries, and he did not exercise such care. There was a verdict for the plaintiff; and the defendant excepted to the overruling of its general demurrer to the petition, and of its motion for a new trial. The other material facts sufficiently appear in the headnotes.

CHAPMAN v. CONWELL. (No. 81.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Feb. 14. Rehearing Denied March 2, 1907.)

1. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE—MISTRIAL.

A justice of the peace has the right to declare a mistrial, where the jury cannot agree on a verdict. Even if this right did not exist as an inherent right in the court, its exercise would not result in preventing the further prosecution of the case which had been withdrawn from the consideration of the jury by the declaration of a mistrial.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 31, Justices of the Peace, § 365.]

2. SAME—FORM OF ACTION.

A. sued B. in a justice's court "in an action of debt due on an account." The evidence showed that B.'s liability was based on an agreement made with A. to pay for the property represented by the account, in the event of its destruction by fire while A.'s house was occupied by B.'s servant. A. fully performed his part of the contract, and nothing remained to be done by B., except to pay for the property which was destroyed by fire while the house was occupied by his servant. Held, that such an action was properly brought, although there was an express contract between the parties on the subject-matter from which the debt arose. The contract in question was evidence of the debt. Johnson v. Quin, 52 Ga. 485; Hill v. Balkcom, 5 S. E. 200, 79 Ga. 444; Tumlin v. Bass Furnace Co., 20 S. E. 44, 93 Ga. 599.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 31, Justices of the Peace, § 228.]

3. FRAUDS, STATUTE OF—ORIGINAL UNDERTAKING.

The contract in this case was an original undertaking, and not within the statute of frauds.

4. SAME—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

The value of the personal property destroyed by fire, for which the defendant had expressly agreed to pay, was substantially shown by the evidence.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Elbert County; Holden, Judge.

Action by G. E. Conwell against M. H. Chapman. Judgment for plaintiff. From an order dismissing a writ of certiorari, defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Z. B. Rogers, for plaintiff in error. O. Roberts, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. Conwell brought suit against Chapman in the justice's court for a "debt due on an account." A copy of the account attached to the summons was as follows: "M. E. Chapman to G. E. Conwell, debtor. Jan. 2d, 1904. To 2 horse-loads of crab-grass hay, 3000 lbs, at $15.00, $22.50; 6 one-horse loads pea vine hay, 2 1/2 tons, $33.75; 1500 bundles fodder at $2 per 100, $30.00.—$86.25. Georgia, Elbert County. Personally comes G. E. Conwell, who on oath says that the above account is just, true, due and unpaid. G. E. Conwell." "Sworn to and subscribed before me, this 14th day of —, 1904. T. J. Cleveland, J. P." The defendant answered the suit by a general denial of the indebtedness, and by stating that, if he did owe any part or all of said account, "the charges are excessive, and that plaintiff has included in his account items that should not be." Before filing his answer, the defendant filed two special pleas: First, a plea to the jurisdiction; second, a plea in abatement. Both of said special pleas averred that at a previous trial of said case in the justice's court the presiding justice had declared a mistrial and dismissed the jury which had said case under consideration, said mistrial having been declared by the justice without the knowledge or consent of the defendant; and it was averred that the justice had no authority under the law to declare a mistrial, and that said suit should be dismissed. The justice overruled both of said special pleas, and the case proceeded to trial before a jury, which found a verdict for the plaintiff, in the sum of $82.50; and judgment was entered accordingly. The defendant filed his petition to the superior court for the writ of certiorari, which was sanctioned, and the writ issued. On the hearing of the certiorari in the superior court, it was overruled and a new trial refused, and the case comes to this court for review.

An understanding of the errors insisted on in this court makes necessary a consideration of the evidence adduced on the trial in the justice's court. This evidence may be substantially stated as follows: The defendant had employed a negro woman, for whom he wanted to get a house to live in until his own was ready for her occupation. He asked the plaintiff to let him put her in his house, and the plaintiff agreed to do so, provided the defendant would be responsible for the destruction by fire of certain agricultural products which he had stored in said house, being the same for which suit is brought. The defendant made the promise and agreement, and put his servant in the house. The house burnt down, and the said personal property was destroyed by the fire. After the fire the plaintiff went to the defendant and demanded that he perform his agreement and pay for the products so destroyed. This the defendant agreed to do, stating that "he would be as good as his word, and would pay for the stuff." This promise, however, seems to have been "made to the ear and broken to the hope," for the defendant did not pay; and hence the suit. The assignments of error insisted upon before this court are: (1) That the pleas in abatement and to the jurisdiction should have been sustained by the justice, and the case dismissed. (2) If the plaintiff in the justice court had any rights upon which he could recover, they were based upon an express contract and not upon an open account, and the suit should have been based upon the contract. (3) That the evidence showed that the cause of action sued on was a parol promise to answer for the debt, default, or miscarriage of another. (4) That the verdict was without evidence to support it, as it failed to show any value of the agricultural products, which had been destroyed by the fire.

1. We think a justice of the peace has a right to declare a mistrial. Even if such right is not expressly given by statute, it must exist as an inherent right of all courts where jury trials obtain. If, however, the justice should exercise such right without authority, we cannot agree with our learned Brother who represents the plaintiff in error that the result would be to destroy the right of action or abate the suit.

2. The second ground of error is not without difficulty. But, under the liberal rules of pleading applicable to suits in justice's courts, we think this suit can be upheld. The bill of particulars attached to the summons called upon the defendant to pay for the value of certain agricultural products. It is true he had not received any of the goods sued for, but he had expressly agreed to pay for them in the event of their destruction by fire while his servant was occupying the plaintiff's house, where the goods were stored. This was a contract between the parties which the plaintiff had fully performed on his part, to wit, he had turned his house over to the servant of the defendant, with an express agreement with the defendant that he would pay for the personal property if the same was destroyed by fire while the servant occupied the house. The event happened which fixed the liability of the defendant, and there was nothing left to be performed but payment by the defendant of the loss incurred. Under these facts an action on the account will lie to recover the value of the property destroyed, and the contract is evidence of the debt. Dobbins v. Pyrolusite Co., 75 Ga. 450; Hill v. Balkcom, 79 Ga. 444, 5 S. E. 200; Hancock v. Ross, 18 Ga. 364.

3. The facts in this case show that the agreement to pay, made by the defendant, was an original undertaking, and not within the statute of frauds.

4. The value of the agricultural products destroyed by the fire was substantially shown by the evidence. The bill of particulars sets forth the value of each kind of product destroyed, and the plaintiff testified that the account was correct, as set out by said bill of particulars.

For the reasons given, we hold that the judgment of the superior court, overruling the certiorari and refusing to remand the case for a new trial, was correct.

Judgment affirmed.

MASON v. STATE. (No. 262.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. March 28, 1907.)

1. INTOXICATING LIQUORS—STATUTES—REPEAL BY IMPLICATION.

Act 1877, p. 189, making unlawful the sale of intoxicating liquors within three miles of the Masonic Academy in the town of Swainsboro, was not repealed by section 26 of the charter of the city of Swainsboro, approved December 6, 1900.

2. INFORMATION—SUFFICIENCY—PLACE OF OFFENSE.

The words, "in Swainsboro, Georgia," used in a criminal accusation, are apt words to convey the meaning that the acts alleged occurred within the territorial limits of the municipal corporation bearing that name.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 27, Indictment and Information, § 234.]

3. INTOXICATING LIQUORS—OFFENSES—SALES AT PROHIBITED PLACES.

The mere fact that the school formerly taught in the Masonic Academy, which was designated as the center of a three-mile area in which a local prohibition act became effective, is no longer taught in the original building, but in a new house a short distance away, does not invalidate the conviction, under that act, of one who is guilty of selling intoxicating liquor within three miles of both the original and the subsequent location of the school.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 29, Intoxicating Liquors, § 178.]

4. CRIMINAL LAW—EVIDENCE—BEST EVIDENCE.

Oral testimony tending to prove that a given act occurred within three miles of a certain Masonic Academy is not subject to the objection that the charter of the academy is the highest evidence.

5. INTOXICATING LIQUORS—DEFINED—MEDICINAL PREPARATIONS—PATENT MEDICINES.

The expression "intoxicating liquors," as used in statutes, in the absence of other words tending to limit the meaning, may be defined as including any liquid intended for use as a beverage or capable of being so used containing alcohol, obtained either by fermentation or distillation, or both, in such a proportion that it will produce intoxication when taken in such quantities as may practically be drunk.

(a) Medicinal, toilet, and culinary preparations, recognized as such by standard authority (such as the United States Dispensatory) and not reasonably capable of use as intoxicating beverages—e. g., tincture of gentian, paregoric, bay rum, cologne, essence of lemon, wood alcohol—are not ordinarily to be regarded as being within the meaning of the expression "intoxicating liquors," though such articles are liquid, contain alcohol, and may produce intoxication.

(b) Patent medicines, cordials, bitters, tonics, and other articles not recognized by standard authority as being within the class just mentioned are to be regarded as being intoxicating liquors if they are capable of being used as a beverage and contain such a percentage of al-cobol as that, if drunk to excess, they will produce intoxication.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 29, Intoxicating Liquors, §§ 142-146.]

6. CRIMINAL LAW—TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—DUTY TO SUBMIT DEFENSES.

While the evidence was amply sufficient to support the verdict, yet, since the defendant made the specific contention that the particular patent medicine which he was accused of selling was not capable of being used as a beverage, and introduced proof tending to show this fact, and the trial judge, in his instructions to the jury, entirely ignored this defense, the exception upon this ground must be sustained.

Henry R. Daniel, Sol., for the State.

POWELL, J. In 1877 a local act was passed making it penal to sell "spirituuous or intoxicating liquors, schnapps, or bitters," within three miles of the Masonic Academy in the town of Swainsboro, Emanuel county, Acts 1877, p. 189. The defendant was convicted under an accusation charging that he "did sell in Swainsboro, Georgia, within and in less than one mile of the Masonic Academy, for valuable consideration, a certain quantity of intoxicating liquor, commonly known as 'Rutona.'" Upon the trial the State proved, by several witnesses, that they had bought Rutona of the defendant at his drug store in Swainsboro; that they had drunk it, and that its effects were similar to those of whisky; that it was intoxicating. It is described as tasting like whisky with something bitter in it. One witness says: "I do not know what Rutona is made of. I don't know a single ingredient in it, but there must be some alcohol in it from the effects it has. I never drank much of it, but on one or two occasions, when I had drunk too much whisky, and whisky was out, and I was feeling sick, I drank this. After a man has been on a drunk and he is nervous, he will drink most anything that is intoxicating, if he can't get whisky. I drank this Rutona, and I know it will get up steam in a little while. It will quiet the nerves and put the blood to circulating, and make you feel good again." The defendant introduced, among other witnesses, the president and the secretary of the Columbia Drug Company, the corporation by which Rutona is manufactured. The president testified that he was a chemist by profession, and that the percentage of alcohol in Rutona is 22 per cent. in maceration, but that by the time it is through evaporating there is not over 18 to 20 per cent. left. Formerly the percentage of alcohol was higher, but, by experiment, the amount had been reduced, and the above was the mini-num amount which would preserve the alkaloïds and keep the active ingredients in solution; that quinine is the active principle of Rutona; that it is a medicine, is not manufactured or sold as a beverage, is not an intoxicating liquor; that, if a person were to take enough of the medicine to be affected by the alcohol, "he would be in a bad fix, he would not have any head left." The secretary of the Columbia Drug Company also testified that the percentage of alcohol in Rutona was 22 per cent. The medicine is obtained by allowing the alcohol to percolate through Peruvian cinchona bark and other crude drugs. Only so much alcohol is used as is absolutely necessary to hold the drugs in solution. It is intensely bitter, does not contain one-fourth as much alcohol as cheap whisky, is incapable of being used as a beverage. If a man were to drink enough of it to cause him to be affected by the alcohol, he would be positively stupefied. It contains less alcohol than a great many of the household remedies now on the market. Another witness testified, for the defendant, that he had bought a bottle of Rutona and had used it according to directions, and that it did him good; but this witness evinced his impartiality by testifying on cross-examination: "Good old rye whisky will do me good too, any tonic will do me good, and I expect it [referring to Rutona] would make you drunk." The defendant stated that he had sold Rutona along with other patent medicines in his store, not as a beverage, and with no intention of violating the law. Two bottles of the Rutona were introduced in evidence and submitted to the consideration of the jury, but, as none of this was transmitted to this court with the record, we are unable to give any more accurate description of it than we have been able to summarize from the evidence as above. The building known as the Masonic Academy in Swainsboro is no longer used for school purposes, though the Masonic lodge is still located there. The school has been moved to a new building just a short distance away. The drug store of the defendant, where the sales took place, was within a few hundred yards of both the old and the new location of the school.

1. By demurrer the point was raised that the act of 1877 is no longer in effect; that it has been repealed by the charter of the city of Swainsboro, approved December 6, 1900. The 26th section of that charter (Acts 1900, p. 435) is as follows: "That the city council shall have complete control of the manufacturing, wholesaling, and retailing of spirituous or malt liquors or any intoxicants in the city; provided, the license for retailing such shall not be less than one thousand dollars per annum; to prohibit the storage or keeping of wine, beer, malt, alcoholic or intoxicating liquors of any kind for illegal purposes, or prohibit the same from being brought into said city, and to punish within the limits prescribed by this charter any person or persons violating the same." The repealing of statutes by implication is not favored. We construe this clause of the charter as giving the city authorities control of the retailing only of such liquors as may now or hereafter be lawfully sold in Swainsboro, if there are now, for any reason, or shall hereafter be, by the repeal of the statute of 1877 or otherwise, any liquors which may be lawfully sold there.

2. Another demurrer to the accusation makes the point that in the act of 1877 the language used in describing the Masonic Academy is "in the town of Swainsboro, in Emanuel county," while the accusation merely uses the words "in Swainsboro, Georgia." There is nothing in the point. Sessions v. State, 115 Ga. 18, 41 S. E. 259; Mayor of Smithville v. Dispensary Commissioners, 125 Ga. 559, 54 S. E. 539; Murphy v. Waycross, 90 Ga. 36, 15 S. E. 817.

3. The plaintiff in error contends that, since the school formerly taught in the Masonic Academy has been moved into another house near by, the act of 1877 is no longer of force. It is unnecessary for us to decide whether the act in question could be repealed even by the destruction of the building named therein and the total discontinuance of both the Masonic lodge and the school located therein at the time of the passage of the act, or whether the center of the three-mile territory to be affected has shifted by the removal of the school, since the acts for which the defendant was tried occurred within three miles of both the new and the old location of the school. We cannot hold that the slight difference in the present, from the former, location of the school, operated to repeal the statute. Compare Allen v. Lytle, 114 Ga. 275, 40 S. E. 238.

4. The holding in the fourth headnote seems obvious.

5. The definition of intoxicating liquors, contained in the fifth headnote, rests upon the authority of Black on Intoxicating Liquors, §§ 2, 3; Intoxicating Liquor Cases, 25 Kan. 751, 37 Am. Rep. 284; Colwell v. State, 112 Ga. 75, 37 S. E. 129.

6. We think that the verdict would have been authorized, although not absolutely demanded, not only by the state's testimony, but also by the evidence submitted by the defendant himself. Under the testimony of the manufacturers, Rutona contains 18 to 22 per cent. alcohol. Although one of the witnesses states that there is not one-fourth as much alcohol in this preparation as there is in cheap whisky, common knowledge contradicts him. Proof-spirit, or, as it is commonly called, hundred-proof, liquor, the United States government's basis for revenue tax, is defined by the Standard Dictionary to be "an alcoholic liquor that contains half its volume of alcohol." Very little whisky is hundred proof. Most of it, especially the cheaper grades, runs from seventy, and even lower, to ninety, proof; that is to say, contains 35 to 45 per cent. alcohol. Commercial alcohol itself is only 188 proof. Beers and wines usually contain only 4 to 10 per cent. of alcohol. So that a preparation containing 22 per cent. of alcohol would be intoxicating even if taken in reasonably small quantities. The mere fact that a mixture may have medicinal virtues does not take it from under the ban of the law against the sale of intoxicants. Whisky itself is a stimulant, and has some good qualities as a medicine. The theory of prohibitory statutes is that it is better to forego the legitimate uses of these alcoholic mixtures than to risk the dangers of their abuses. However, in an alcoholic preparation, the alcohol may be so denatured as to render the mixture totally incapable of being used as a beverage; and such preparations are not within the purview of laws against the sale of intoxicating liquors. There was evidence from which the jury might have found that the preparation in question belongs to this class, and upon this contention the defendant mainly rested his defense. The trial court ignored this question and in effect charged to the contrary. The defendant was entitled to have this defense submitted for whatever it was worth, in the light of all the testimony. For this alone we grant a new trial.

Judgment reversed.

HARDAWAY v. STATE. (No. 176.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Feb. 5, 1907.)

GAME—SHOOTING ON POSTED LAND—INDICTMENT.

An indictment under the act of 1903 (Acts 1903, p. 44) amending the Pen. Code 1895, § 221 (which provides "for the posting of lands and for the punishment of persons hunting thereon"), alleging that the accused did on the 1st day of "December, 1905, * * * hunt with firearms upon the land of [A], said lands being then and there posted by having two cards on said land * * * forbidding all persons to hunt on said lands, and the said [A] having registered his name in the register for posting lands in the clerk's office in said county as required by law," is defective, and sets forth no offense under the statute, and should have been quashed on demurrer. Under the requirements of the above act, the indictment should allege that the notice had been posted by the landowner in two or more places on each tract of land; that the landowner had registered his name in "the register for posting lands," after first having stated, etc., that said two notices had been posted; and that at the time of registering he gave a description of the lands, by giving the district in which the lands were located, the number of the lots, or other description sufficient to put the public on notice of the lands referred to.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Greene County; Lewis, Judge.

Tom Hardaway was convicted of hunting on posted lands, and brings error. Reversed.

James B. & Noel P. Park, for plaintiff in error. Joseph E. Pottle, Sol. Gen., and James Davison, for the State.

HILL, C. J. Tom Hardaway was indicted in the superior court of Greene county for a misdemeanor, the indictment charging that he "did on the first day of December, 1905, in said county, hunt with firearms upon the land of C. J. Thornton, said lands being then and there posted by having two cards on said lands, and one of said cards being then and there posted at the courthouse door in said county, forbidding all persons hunting on said lands, and the said C. J. Thornton having registered his name in the register for posting lands in the clerk's office in said county as required by law." Said indictment was transferred to the county court of Greene county. The defendant demurred to the indictment on various grounds, and the demurrer was overruled; whereupon the defendant "waived formal arraignment, trial by jury, and pleaded not guilty." After hearing the evidence the court found the defendant guilty. The defendant presented his petition for certiorari, alleging "that said demurrer should have been sustained by the county judge, that certain evidence was erroneously admitted, that his conviction was illegal, contrary to law, and without evidence to support it." The petition was sanctioned and the writ of certiorari issued. On hearing the certiorari, the judge of the superior court overruled the same and affirmed the judgment of the court below. To this judgment of the court the defendant excepted, and assigns the same as error.

The first and second grounds of the demurrer can well be considered together. The second ground of the demurrer is that the indictment is defective, in that it does not put the defendant upon notice as to what lands of C. J. Thornton are meant, and that said lands are not sufficiently described, nor does said indictment allege what district they are in. By reference to the act of 1903 (Acts 1903, p. 44), amending section 221 of the Penal Code of 1895, it will be seen under what conditions the law makes hunting upon the lands of another a misdemeanor. Section 1 of this act declares that "It shall be the duty of the landowners to post a notice in two or more places on each tract of land * * * forbidding all persons to hunt thereon." Section 2 of the act requires that the landowner, in addition to posting the notice aforesaid "in two or more places on each tract of land," shall register his or her name in a book to be known as "the register for posting lands," in the office of the clerk of the superior court, after having first stated, etc., that the two notices have already been posted upon said landowner's land as required by section 1 of this act. Section 4 (page 45) of this act provides that "at the time of the registering of the name of the landowner he shall also register a description of the lands that have been posted, giving the district in which said lands are located, and either the numbers of the lots or other description of the lands sufficient to put the public on notice of the land referred to."

Construing all these sections of the act together, we think it clear that, before it becomes an offense to hunt on the lands of another, the following facts must exist: First. The landowner shall post a notice in two or more places on each tract of land forbidding all persons to hunt thereon. Second. Said landowner shall register his name in the register for posting lands, stating in the presence of the officers in charge of said book that the two notices have already been posted upon each tract of land. Third. At the time of the registering of the name of the landowner and the posting of the land, the landowner shall also register a description of the land that has been posted, giving the district in which said land is located, and either the numbers of the lots or other description of the land, sufficient to put the public on notice of the land referred to. What the act requires shall be done to constitute the offense should be alleged in the indictment and shown by the evidence. The omission of either one of these essential allegations is fatal to the indictment. We therefore hold that the court erred in not sustaining the demurrer on the first and second grounds, and that the judgment of the superior court in overruling the certiorari was error.

Judgment reversed.

HARALSON v. SPEER. (No. 109.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. April 11, 1907.)

1. LOGS AND LOGGING — LIENS — ENFORCEMENTS — ACTIONS — ALLEGATIONS.

There was no error in refusing to quash the affidavit and fi. fa., or to dismiss the levy, in this case. Nor was it error to overrule the demurrer to the plaintiff's petition as amended. Demand after the debt became due was alleged by amendment, and it was impossible to aver the completion of the contract.

2. SAME.

In the foreclosure of liens under Civ. Code 1895, § 2816, it is not essential that it be alleged or proved that the contract was fully completed by the party claiming the lien, if compliance with the contract was either waived or prevented by the defendant. In presenting the issue of lien or no lien, a proper averment that the promisor was prevented by the promisee from completing his contract as a sawmillman is a good substitute for a statement that the obligations of the contract have been fully met, and (if sustained by sufficient evidence satisfactory to the jury) is equivalent to completion, as a remedial element.

3. SAME.

Though full performance of the contract on the part of the plaintiff be essential to the establishment of the liens provided by section 2816 of the Civil Code of 1895, yet, where it appears that the defendant himself prevented the completion of a contract partly performed, and rendered full compliance therewith impossible, the defendant will not be allowed to take advantage of his own wrong, so as to defeat the lien for the services already rendered. It will in such a case be presumed that there was a novation of the original contract between the parties, and that by subsequent agreement the parties have substituted a new contract in such terms as require, for its full performance, exactly that which the plaintiff has already performed, and no more.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 33, Logs and Logging, §§ 60-66.]

4. SAME — ENFORCEMENT — EVIDENCE — SUFFICIENCY.

The evidence, though conflicting, authorized the verdict, and there was no error in refusing a new trial.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of La Grange; Harwell, Judge.

Action by one Speer against one Haralson. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

A. H. Thompson, for plaintiff in error. W. T. Tuggle and Hatton Lovejoy, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. Speer, a sawmillman, foreclosed his lien against Haralson, and levied on certain lumber sawed by him for the defendant. Haralson gave bond for the lumber, instead of a replevy bond. On the trial Haralson moved to quash the affidavit and fi. fa., and to dismiss the levy, and by a demurrer set up, as reasons why the affidavit and fi. fa. should be quashed and the levy dismissed, (1) that the affidavit does not allege that the contract is complete, nor state any reason why the plaintiff did not complete it; (2) no demand and refusal to pay is alleged; (3) the affidavit does not allege the debt to be due, but distinctly denies it is due; (4) no legal reason is averred why demand was not made on the owner; (5) the affidavit does not state when or by whom demand was made. Thereupon the plaintiff amended his affidavit by alleging that he demanded the amount due of the defendant after it became due; and, further, that after he had cut the lumber upon which the lien was claimed, and while he was preparing to complete the sawing, the defendant hired his fireman and his stock cutter without his consent; that without these hands affiant was unable to carry on the sawing; and that he tried to get hands to take the place of his fireman and stock cutter, but was unable to do so. The trial judge overruled the demurrer, and the defendant excepted pendente lite. The case then proceeded to trial, and the jury rendered a verdict for the plaintiff. The defendant (now plaintiff in error) excepts to the overruling of his demurrer and to the refusal of his motion for a new trial. The demurrer raised all the issues of law which are pertinent in this case, and the grounds thereof are properly presented here for adjudication.

If the court was right in overruling these demurrers, the verdict cannot be disturbed, for there is evidence to support it. If the judge should have sustained the demurrers and motion to quash, the plaintiff could not foreclose his lien as a sawmillman then, and never could in the future. It is true that the learned counsel for plaintiff in error insists in his brief that the verdict is contrary to evidence, against the weight of evidence, and without evidence to support it; but this contention rests, it will be found upon investigation, wholly upon counsel's view of the law, and upon the theory that the evidence showing why the sawing was not completed should not be considered. Summarizing the motion to quash the affidavit of foreclosure, the affidavit is attacked on three grounds: (1) That it does not show that the contract of sawing has been completed; or (2) that the amount claimed is due; or (3) that a demand has been made. The objection that no proper demand was legally set forth in the affidavit (and which, in different forms, was the burden of three grounds of the demurrer) was met by amendment detailing that the demand was made on the defendant by plaintiff in person, and after the debt became due. This met the motion to quash; and as to this ground the motion was properly overruled. On the trial there was proof of demand, though this was not necessary, as demand was not denied by the counter affidavit. Langston v. Anderson, 69 Ga. 65. The affidavit as amended also shows that it is distinctly alleged that the debt for the sawing, on which a lien is claimed, is due. So that the real controlling question is whether this owner of the sawmill, even if he was prevented by the owner of the timber (who hired his two indispensable employes, whose positions he could not fill with other help) from complying with his contract, shall be deprived, though himself free from fault, of just compensation for the labor already done, and of the lien attached to such service by law. It may be said that he could, by suit, recover judgment for the amount of his services; and he might also recover damages for the breach of the contract. But in many instances the special lien allowed by law is the only security or guarantee for the collection of the sum due, which might otherwise be merely included in a noncollectible judgment.

It is well settled that the lien laws are in derogation of the common law and are to be strictly construed. And generally before one can claim a lien for services, material or labor, it is incumbent on him to show that he has complied with and performed a contract declared on. This is the express statute with reference to such liens enforceable against real estate; and, in Faircloth v. Webb, 125 Ga. 231, 53 S. E. 592 (5), the same rule seems to be applied to liens sought to be enforced on personalty, the court holding that, "in order to establish his lien, it is incumbent upon the laborer to show that he complied with and performed the contract declared on." In Tanxley v. Lampkin, 113 Ga. 1007, 39 S. E. 473, it was held that a verdict for the defendant is demanded, where a laborer institutes a suit to foreclose a lien which he claims against real estate, and where there is no testimony to show that he has completed his contract of labor. But the point now before us was not involved in either of those cases; and though it is generally essential to allege, and, when alleged, to prove, that a contract has been complied with and fully performed, this rule is subject to exceptions, where the complete performance is prevented by the opposite party to the contract. The principle involved in the maxim that the law will allow no one to take advantage of his own wrong is more binding than the requirement that the completion of the contract be alleged. To hold otherwise would be to require, in some cases, an impossibility. And the law never imposes this burden on any one.

According to the allegations of the affidavit (which for the purposes of demurrer are assumed to be true), it clearly appears that the sawing of the full amount of lumber, according to the terms of the contract, was prevented by Haralson himself; and, if the demurrer is well taken, Speer could not foreclose his lien for the full amount of the lumber, or even for that which had been sawed. Speer set forth in his affidavit, and the amendments thereto, that Haralson hired two of his hands at the sawmill; that other hands could not be secured, though he made every effort to do so; and that the mill was thereby forced to stop sawing. One man was his fireman, the other was the stock cutter. Without these the mill could not be run, and Speer could not replace them with others. Haralson having caused the mill to shut down, he cannot be heard to complain that Speer did not go on sawing. This would allow him to take advantage of his own wrong. As the fundamental principles of the law will not permit this, we have no difficulty in holding that, where one party is prevented from completing his contract by the other party to the contract, the first party retains his lien for the work already done. If this be sound principle, such a party has the right to allege the reasons why he has not completed the contract instead of averring its completion; and consequently this demurrer to the affidavit was properly overruled, and evidence on the subject properly admitted.

Proof of the completion of a contract in cases of lien may be dispensed with either where compliance with the contract is prevented by the action of the defendant or where the defendant waives compliance. We have examined at least two cases in our own state which are directly in point. In Hart v. Hirsch, 74 Ga. 799, the plaintiff sued out a laborer's lien. It was admitted that the contract had not been fully completed; but the plaintiff gave as a reason therefor that the defendant had refused to pay him the amount due monthly for wages, and, in violation of his contract, had removed the plaintiff's goods from his house. And in that case the court refused a request to charge the jury as follows: "In order for the plaintiff to prevail in this case, it is necessary that he must show that he completed his contract of labor." The Supreme Court affirmed a judgment denying a new trial, expressly holding that no error was made in refusing to charge as requested. In Lewis v. Owens, 124 Ga. 223, 52 S. E. 333, it was held that a cropper was entitled to a laborer's lien, although he did not complete his crop, being prevented from doing so by the levy thereon of a distress warrant against his employer. If the fact that the contract has not been completed will not defeat the lien where a third party—a stranger to the contract—prevents its completion, still less will it be defeated when the employer in person takes steps to prevent his employé from complying. And the authorities in our own state are re-enforced by decisions from the courts of last resort in every section of the Union, sustaining the principle that a statutory lien is not lost by noncompliance with the contract where the lienor is prevented by the other party from completing his contract.

In Bohem v. Seabury, 141 Pa. 594, 21 Atl. 674, it is held that in foreclosing a mechanic's lien it is necessary to allege completion of the contract or that the owner had prevented the completion; thus recognizing the doctrine stated above, that prevention from complying is a good substitute for compliance and completion. In Pardue v. Missouri R. Co., 52 Neb. 201, 71 N. W. 1022, 66 Am. St. Rep. 489, it is decided that, where a contractor has been wrongfully interrupted by the owner and prevented from completing the work, the contractor is entitled to his lien for the work done and material furnished. In Smith v. Fleischman, 48 N. Y. Supp. 234, 23 App. Div. 355, it was held that "a contractor's right to a lien cannot be defeated upon the ground that he failed to complete his contract within the specified time, when the failure was due to interference by the owner." In Orr v. Fuller, 172 Mass. 597, 52 N. E. 1091, it was held that "a contractor has a lien for the portion of work done on a house when the contract is broken by the owner after part performance." We think it settled, therefore, where one, who would have a lien at the completion of the contract, is prevented by the act of the other party from completing his contract, and is himself free from fault, such a one would still be entitled to his lien to such an extent as he had complied with the contract. It was held in Hawkins v. Chambliss, 120 Ga. 615, 48 S. E. 169, that there could be such a waiver of compliance with the contract as would preserve the lien as to the portion of the work done, although the contract was not completed.

We have, in part, based our ruling in this case upon the principle underlying the holding in the case last above cited—the presumption of a novation of the original contract. Based upon this principle, there is no conflict between our decision in this case and the long line of decisions which make the completion of the contract one of the essential prerequisites to the existence of a lien. As they who make contracts, have by mutual consent the right to alter them, and as he who prevents a thing from being done shall not avail himself of the nonperformance which he himself occasioned, the breach of the contract by the one party may be assented to by the other at his option; and, if assented to, it becomes a mutual agreement, which presumes a new contract, the operation of which extends to that which has been performed by the lienor up to the time of the assent, and no further, and becomes an executed or completed contract. In this view of the case, Haralson, when he broke the contract, by preventing Speer from sawing, thereby proposed that the contract be reduced from one of sawing 100,000 feet of lumber to one for sawing 61,000. Speer had the option to agree to this change if he saw fit. By his suit he did agree, and the contract became complete, and he was therefore authorized to enforce his lien.

A remedy at law, as in medical science, is prescribed, designed, and administered so as to cure, or, at least, relieve, the ills from which the patient suffers. Sometimes the proper remedy is elementary in substance; sometimes a prescription requires compound; and generally, in law, the remedy is the mingling of several rights, compounded to make a panacea which shall relieve the party's wrongs and restore his rights to free and healthful action. In law, as in medicine, there is frequently more than one formula by which a remedy can be compounded and perfected. Sometimes the remedy is composed of certain remedial ingredients, and at other times new and different curatives are either added or omitted, to suit the case. Frequently, for the lack of one sanative, the law substitutes another, which will produce a like healing effect. Relief, both in law and medicine, is the object sought. The sawmillman needed a remedy to put his lien in healthy action. One of the ingredients of that remedy must be a proper affidavit, and the proper presentation of the issue of lien or no lien. According to the usual formula of the prescription, full compliance with the contract must be stated. That particular narcotic is not available, but the doctor finds a balm in Gilead in a proper averment that the promisor was prevented by the promisee from completing his contract as a sawmillman. With this change the prescription can be compounded, because a good substitute has been found for the statement that the obligations of the contractor have been fully met. The pleadings are complete. A substitute averment, if sustained, as in this case, by sufficient evidence which was satisfactory to the jury, is equivalent to completion, as a remedial element.

Judgment affirmed.

(7 S. C. 351)

STATE ex rel. SPENCER v. McCaw et al.
(Supreme Court of South Carolina. July 11, 1907.)

1. STATUTES—LOCAL ACTS—SCHOOL DISTRICTS—CHANGE OF BOUNDARIES.

25 St. at Large, p. 731, amending 20 St. at Large, p. 246, creating the school district of Yorkville, by extending its boundaries, is not in violation of Const. art. 3, § 34, subd. 4, prohibiting the General Assembly from enacting local laws to incorporate educational societies; that section applying to institutions of learning, and not to school districts.

2. SAME.

25 St. at Large, p. 731, amending 20 St. at Large, p. 246, creating the school district of Yorkville, by extending its boundaries, is not in violation of Const. art. 3, § 34, subd. 5, prohibiting incorporating of school districts by special law, as such act does not incorporate a district, but only amends a previous statute of incorporation.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 44, Statutes, § 107.]

3. SAME.

Const. art. 3, § 34, subd. 11, prohibiting special laws in all cases where a general law can be made applicable, must be construed in connection with article 11, § 5, providing that the General Assembly shall establish public schools and divide counties into suitable school districts; and, so construed, a special act extending the boundaries of a school district already created may be regarded as a special provision to a general law, and therefore not unconstitutional.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 44, Statutes, § 107.]

4. SAME—CHANGE OF CORPORATE CHARTER.

Const. art. 9, § 2, providing that no charter of incorporation shall be granted, changed, or amended by a special law, relates to private or quasi public corporations, and not to school districts.

Application by the state, on the relation of C. E. Spencer, for writ of mandamus against W. B. McCaw and others. Writ denied.

C. E. Spencer, in pro. per. W. B. McCaw, for respondents.

GARY, A. J. This is an application to the court in the exercise of its original jurisdiction, for an order of injunction restraining the respondent from ordering and holding an election in the school district of Yorkville. The said school district was incorporated by an act, entitled "An act to create the school district of Yorkville, in York county, and enable it to organize a system of free schools, and to levy a tax in support of the same, and to purchase and hold property," approved 22d December, 1888. 20 St. at Large, p. 246. This statute embraced an area of one mile, extending from the intersection of Congress and Liberty streets. On the 15th of February, 1907, an act was passed, entitled "An act to enlarge the area of the school district of Yorkville to two and one-half miles" (25 St. at Large, p. 731), which provides: "That after the approval of this act, the territory embraced within the area extending two and one-half miles, from the intersection of Congress and Liberty streets, in the town of Yorkville, in said state, be declared a separate school district, and to be known as the 'School District of Yorkville,' and that it be invested with such corporate powers as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of its organization, as now declared by law heretofore creating the same, and acts supplementary or amendatory thereto."

The petitioner alleges that this act is unconstitutional on the following grounds, to wit: "(a) In that it is in violation of and is repugnant to article 3, § 34, subds. 4, 5, 11, of the Constitution of South Carolina. (1) The school district of Yorkville, whose charter is hereby amended, is not an educational institution under the control of the state. (2) It is a new school district, the creation of which is expressly prohibited. (3) A special law has been enacted where a general law could have been made applicable. (b) In that it is in violation of and repugnant to article 9, § 2, of the Constitution of South Carolina, in that the Yorkville school district, the corporation whose charter has been amended by said act of the General Assembly, is not one of the excepted corporations enumerated in article 9, § 2, of the Constitution, namely, 'such charitable, penal, educational or reformatory corporations, as may be under the control of the state,' but, on the contrary, is a corporation whose charter cannot be amended by special law, save only under the proviso to article 9, § 2, of the Constitution, which provides 'that the General Assembly may by a two-thirds vote of each house, on a concurrent resolution, allow a bill for a special charter to be introduced, and may pass the same as other bills'; but in this connection petitioner avers and charges that no such two-thirds vote of each house was taken on a concurrent resolution allowing the introduction and passage of the bill into the act herein assailed."

We proceed to consider, first, the grounds upon which it is contended the statute is obnoxious to certain provisions of article 3, § 34, of the Constitution, which is as follows: "The General Assembly of this state shall not enact local or special laws concerning any of the following subjects, or for any of the following purposes, to wit: (1) To change the names of persons or places. (2) To lay out, open, alter or work roads or highways. (3) To incorporate cities, towns or villages, or change, amend or extend the charter thereof. (4) To incorporate educational, religious, charitable, social, manufacturing or banking institutions not under control of the state, or amend the charters thereof. (5) To incorporate school districts. (6) To authorize the adoption or legitimation of children. (7) To provide for the protection of game. (8) To summon and empanel grand or petit jurors. (9) To provide for the age at which citizens shall be subject to road or other public duty. (10) To fix the amount or manner of compensation to be paid to any county officer, except that the laws may be so made as to grade the compensation in proportion to the population and necessary service required. (11) In all other cases, where a general law can be made applicable, no special law shall be enacted. (12) The General Assembly shall forthwith enact general laws concerning said subjects for said purposes, which shall be uniform in their operation: provided, that nothing contained in this section shall prohibit the General Assembly from enacting special provisions in general laws. (13) The provisions of this section shall not apply to charitable and educational corporations, where, under the terms of a gift, devise or will, special incorporation may be required."

1. The statute does not violate subdivision 4 of that section, for the reason that a school district is not an educational institution, and therefore that provision is inapplicable. It has reference to institutions of learning, such as colleges. Nor is it repugnant to subdivision 5 of that section, as the statute does not incorporate the school district, but is in effect only an amendment of a previous statute of incorporation. It will be observed that the General Assembly is not only prohibited from enacting local or special laws of incorporation, concerning any of the subjects enumerated in subdivisions 3 and 4, but likewise from amending or extending charters already in existence. In subdivision 5, however, there is only a prohibition against the incorporation of a school district, but there is no inhibition against amending or extending a charter granted prior to the adoption of the Constitution.

2. The next question is whether the statute was obnoxious to subdivision 11. This subdivision must be construed in connection with article 11, § 5, which provides that "the General Assembly shall provide for a liberal system of free public schools for all children between the ages of six and twenty-one years, and for the division of the counties into suitable school districts, as compact in form as practicable, having regard to natural boundaries, and not to exceed forty-nine, nor be less than nine square miles in area: * * * provided, further, that nothing in this article contained shall be construed as a repeal of the laws, under which the several graded school districts of this state are organized. The present division of the counties into school districts and the provisions of law now governing the same shall remain until changed by the General Assembly." In granting general laws concerning school districts which shall be uniform in their operation, the General Assembly, in providing for the division of counties into suitable school districts as compact in form as possible, has the power in each instance to regard natural boundaries, and to determine the number of miles in area a school district shall contain, provided it shall not exceed 49 nor be less than 9 square miles. This could unquestionably be enacted as a special provision in a general law. A statute, therefore, which could be enacted as a special provision in a general law will not be declared unconstitutional merely because it is in form a separate act, but will be regarded as an amendment of the general law upon the subject. Grocery Co. v. Burnet, 61 S. C. 205, 39 S. E. 381, 58 L. E. A. 687. In that case the court uses this language: "We think it safe to say that if it be competent for the Legislature, while enacting a general law, to enact special provisions therein, it is also competent to enact similar special provisions by way of amending a general law. The former power would necessarily include the latter."

3. The last objection urged against the constitutionality of the statute is that it is violative of article 9, § 2, which is as follows: "No charter of incorporation shall be granted, changed or amended by special law, except in the case of such charitable, educational, penal or reformatory corporations as may be under the control of the state, or may be provided for in this Constitution, but the General Assembly shall provide by general laws for changing or amending existing charters, and for the organizations of all corporations hereafter to be created, and any such law so passed, as well as all charters now existing or hereafter created shall be subject to future repeal or alteration: provided, that the General Assembly may by a two-thirds vote of each house on a concurrent resolution, allow a bill for a special charter to be introduced, and when so introduced, may pass the same as other bills." We have already shown that the statute was not a special law, but in effect an amendment to a general law, as it merely contained a special provision that could have been enacted in a general law. Furthermore, section 1 of that article, which provides that "the term 'corporation,' as used in this article, includes all associations and joint-stock companies, having powers and privileges not possessed by individuals or partnerships, and excludes municipal corporations," has no reference to corporations such as a school district having the public and corporate purpose of education. The article relates to private or quasi public corporations. This objection must likewise be overruled.

The judgment of this court dismissing the petition has already been filed.

CITIZENS' & MAINE BANK v. WITCOVER.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. July 29, 1907.)

APPEAL—APPEALABLE ORDER.

No appeal lies from an order refusing to strike out an answer as sham.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 2, Appeal and Error, § 704.]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Marion County; Watts, Judge.

Action by the Citizens' & Maine Bank against one Witcover. From an order refusing to strike out the answer as sham, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Montgomery & Lide, for appellant. Jas. W. Johnson, for respondent.

WOODS, J. This appeal is from an order refusing to strike out defendant's answer as sham and irrelevant. The complaint alleges the making by the defendant of two notes, for $180 and $500, dated April 21, 1906, payable to the order of J. G. Latimer, 60 days after date, the indorsement of the note by the plaintiff before maturity, the present ownership by the plaintiff, demand for payment, and failure to pay. Defendant answered as follows: "(1) He denies each and every allegation of the complaint not herein-after admitted. (2) He admits that he executed the notes described in the complaint, but denies that they were given for any valuable or other consideration; but, on the contrary, he alleges that they were given solely for the accommodation of one J. G. Latimer, and were without consideration, which fact plaintiff well knew at the time it took said notes; that defendant is informed and believes that when said notes became due the said J. G. Latimer substituted his own note, with O. M. Latimer as indorser, for said notes in said bank, and said bank accepted same in lieu of this defendant's notes, thus releasing him from all liability to said bank on account of said notes. (3) He admits the allegations contained in paragraphs 1 and 4 of plaintiff's first cause of action, and the allegations contained in 1 and 4 of plaintiff's second cause of action."

The motion to strike out was made on the pleadings; the affidavits of W. E. Vest, cashier of the plaintiff bank, denying the substitution of Latimer's notes for the notes in suit, and asserting the bank's ownership of the notes; the affidavit of W. J. Montgomery, Esq., setting forth separate admissions of liability by the defendant after the notes had come into his hands; and a number of letters of the defendant to the bank, written after the maturity of the notes, asking for indulgence, and making no allusion to any defense set up in the answer. The circuit judge thus states his conclusions of law and fact: "No contrary showing was made by the defendant, his counsel taking the position that by his answer he had denied a material allegation of the complaint, viz., that the plaintiff is the legal owner and holder of the notes sued on, and therefore the answer could not be disposed of on motion. In my opinion this position is unsound, because the defenses set up are in themselves admissions of title in the plaintiff. At the hearing before me, defendant's attorney abandoned the defense that the notes were accommodation paper. I am satisfied from the showing made by the plaintiff that the answer made by the defendant is sham and irrelevant, and intended merely for delay; but as the answer raises one issuable fact, viz., whether or not the plaintiff took the notes indorsed by O. M. Latimer in substitution for the note of the defendant, I do not think I have the power to strike out the answer as sham and irrelevant on affidavits."

Section 173, Code Civ. Proc. 1902, provides: "Sham and irrelevant answers and defenses may be stricken out on motion, and upon such terms as the court may, in its discretion, impose." The exceptions raise the question whether the remedy provided is available when the sham of the answer is not to be seen on the face of the record, but can be made to appear beyond doubt by affidavits or other evidence. Inasmuch as the motion to strike out was denied, the order is not appealable, and we are precluded from consideration of the important and interesting question. Harbert v. Railway Co., 74 S. C. 13, 53 S. E. 1001.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

GREEN v. CATAWBA POWER CO.

MASTER AND SERVANT—INJURIES TO SERVANT—SAFE PLACE TO WORK.

In an action for injuries to a servant, alleged to have been caused by failure of a master to provide a safe place to work, before the master can escape liability he must show that the servant had assumed the duty of adjusting the proper appliances which he furnished, and where this is not admitted, and the evidence admits of any other inference, the issue is for the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 34, Master and Servant, §§ 1000, 1001.]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of York County; Prince, Judge.

Action by Ben Green against the Catawba Power Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

See 55 S. E. 125.

Wilson & Wilson and Russell G. Lucas, for appellant. Green & Hines and Mr. McDow, for respondent.

GARY, A. J. This is an action for damages alleged to have been sustained by the plaintiff in consequence of the falling of a battle post, which he was assisting to raise and place in position, as a part of the bench of a bridge, by means of a jim pole. The acts of negligence specified in the complaint are: (1) That the defendant failed to brace properly the bottom of the jim pole, or otherwise fix it securely; (2) that it failed to warn plaintiff of the extra hazard by reason of the erection of the jim pole in an unsafe manner; (3) that it caused the block and tackle to be fastened by a chain to the bottom of the jim pole, instead of fastening it to a secure object; and (4) that it failed properly to inspect the jim pole and superintend its erection. The defendant denied the allegations of negligence, and set up the defenses of contributory negligence and assumption of risk. At the close of the plaintiff's testimony the defendant made a motion for a nonsuit on the following grounds: "(1) That the evidence fails to show any negligence on the part of the defendant company, causing or being the proximate cause of the injury to the plaintiff. (2) Upon the ground that the evidence shows that, if the plaintiff's injury was due to negligence, it was the negligence of a fellow servant or fellow servants." The motion was refused. The jury rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, and the defendant appealed.

The first and second exceptions are as follows: "(1) Because his honor erred in refusing the defendant's motion for a nonsuit on the ground that the evidence failed to show any negligence on the part of the defendant, causing or being the proximate cause of the injury to the plaintiff; the error consisting in his not finding that the injury to the plaintiff was caused by the falling of a battle post, which was being raised by a jim pole to which was attached ropes and blocks and tackle, and that the fall of such battle post was due to the failure of Roseman (the foreman), or other members of the gang at work, to secure, guy, or fasten the bottom of said jim pole, or to adjust said ropes, blocks, and tackle, and that the duty to so secure, guy, and fasten such jim pole, and to properly arrange, attach, and adjust the said ropes, blocks, and tackle, was a duty resting upon the servants of the defendant who were working with the same, and was a mere detail incident to the work, and was not a part of any duty that the defendant owed to the plaintiff, and that consequently there was no such breach of any duty owed plaintiff by the defendant, and no negligence was shown on the part of the defendant. (2) Because his honor erred in refusing defendant's motion for nonsuit on the ground that the testimony showed that the plaintiff sustained his injury through the negligence of his fellow servant; his error consisting in not finding that the testimony showed that Roseman was the fellow servant of the plaintiff at the time of the acts causing the injury to plaintiff." The third exception is substantially the same as the second. These exceptions will be considered together.

The first point which the appellant's attorneys make in their argument is as follows: "Defendant furnished a sufficient supply of safe and suitable appliances. The negligence, if any, was in the adjustment, setting up, and adaptation of the appliances to the work in hand. It is well settled that the adjustment and adaptation of implements to the work in hand, according to its various needs, is the duty of a servant, and not of the master, and negligence on defendant's part cannot be predicated upon the failure to use due care in that regard." They cited numerous authorities which amply sustain said proposition, provided it appears, either from the express language of the contract entered into between the master and servant or by implication, that the servant agreed to adjust the appliances as the occasion required during the progress of the work, or no other inference could be drawn from the evidence. Unless this fact is admitted, the court cannot say, as matter of law, that the servant undertook to discharge this duty, and must submit the question to the jury. In 2 Labatt on Master & Servant, § 615, the rule is thus stated: "The limits of a master's liability for an injury caused by a scaffold or other appliance, constructed or adjusted as a part of the work, are determined upon the hypothesis that it is his duty, in the alternative, to furnish either a suitable platform or scaffold for doing the work that the plaintiff and his employes were required to do, or proper and suitable materials for the construction of such a platform." Under the general principle stated in section 594, supra, the question whether the one or the other of these duties was chargeable to the master is primarily one for the jury, under proper instructions. * * *

The starting point of one of these lines of investigation may be said to be in the question whether the construction or adjustment of the defective instrumentality was a function which the master was justified in leaving to the servants themselves. * * *

The virtual effect of the authorities is that, whenever the defective scaffold or other appliance was essentially one of a temporary character, constructed or adjusted with a view to some particular piece of work, the master cannot be held negligent merely for the reason that he left such construction or adjustment to the servants themselves. Accordingly, whenever the instrumentality is one of this character, the burden of proof lies on the servant to overcome the presumption of nonculpability by adducing some positive evidence from which an obligation on the master's part to furnish such instrumentality in a completed state is reasonably inferable. On the other hand, it is also clear, both upon principle and authority, that the fact of an appliance being ordinarily prepared by the plaintiff's fellow servants is not necessarily a bar to the action. Since the duty to furnish safe appliances rests upon the master, he must discharge his duty in the premises. * * *

The essential question to be determined, if we choose the alternative line of investigation, is whether the master as a matter of fact assumed to furnish the scaffold or other instrumentality in a completed form, or merely furnished the materials and left them to be used by the servants themselves. Clearly, if such assumption is established, the master will be liable as for negligence, even if the circumstances were such that he would have been justified in leaving the servants to prepare the defective instrumentality themselves. The case is for the jury where the evidence is conflicting, or reasonably consistent either with the hypothesis that the defective appliance was constructed by the fellow servant of the injured person out of the materials furnished by the master or with the hypothesis that it was constructed under the direction of the defendant or his representative." In a note to that section, on page 1784, we find the following: "Donnelly v. Booth Bros. & H. I. Granite Co. (1897), 90 Me. 110, 37 Atl. 874 (negligence here was in the erection and support of a run for large stones and in the selection of the gear), citing Arkerson v. Dennison (1875), 117 Mass. 407, where the general rule was laid down as follows: 'When the preparation of the appliances is neither intrusted to nor assumed by them, the master may be held guilty of negligence if defective appliances are furnished, even though the workmen themselves are employed in the preparation of them. In such case, negligence appearing, it is a question of fact for the jury whether that negligence was in respect of what was done or undertaken by the fellow workmen or was the negligence of the master.'" In the case of Charming v. Toxaway Mills, 70 S. C. 470, 50 S. E. 186, the facts were that the plaintiff was standing on a scaffold, which is a temporary structure, working for defendant as a carpenter. The cross-beam of the scaffold broke, and the plaintiff was thrown to the ground and injured. The basis of the action for damages was the alleged failure of the defendant to provide the plaintiff, his employé, a safe place to work. The court said, at page 476 of 70 S. C., page 188 of 50 S. E.: "There is no doubt that the master is liable when injury comes to a servant from being put in a place or furnished with appliances which the master, by the use of reasonable diligence, ought to have known to be unsafe, as well as when he had actual knowledge of the defects."

There was testimony sustaining the following allegations of the complaint: That on the 8th of February, 1904, the defendant was engaged in the construction of a public road and bridge over the creek therein mentioned; that on the said day the plaintiff was employed by defendant as a common laborer, and as such was engaged with a grading gang, which was constructing a roadway, approaching a point where the bridge was being constructed; that James Roseman, the foreman in charge of defendant's works, was engaged in erecting the benches for the bridge; that James Roseman, while superintending the erection of one of the benches, summoned the plaintiff from the work of grading the road and ordered him to assist in the erection of the bench, known as a "battle post," which plaintiff at once proceeded to do, as his duty to defendant required. If Roseman, the foreman, alone had been intrusted with the duty of adjusting the jim pole, as became necessary in the erection of the bridge, and through a defective adjustment the place where he worked was rendered unsafe, in consequence of which he was injured, he would not have been entitled to damages. Keys v. Granite Co., 72 S. C. 97, 51 S. E. 549. The same principle would apply where other servants also agree to arrange the appliances so as to form a completed machine, although it might render the place where they worked unsafe by reason of the negligent manner in which the appliances were adjusted. The reason is that the injury would be attributable to the misconduct of the fellow servant. But, before the master can escape liability for failing to provide a safe place to work, he must show that the servant had taken upon himself the duty of adjusting the appliances (in which case the principle for which the appellant's attorneys contend would apply). This may be shown by express agreement or by implication, and, unless admitted, presents a question of fact to be determined by the jury. In the present case it does not appear from the testimony that the plaintiff even had any knowledge that he was supposed to have undertaken to adjust the appliances, and it cannot be said, as a matter of law, that he entered into such an agreement.

The fourth exception assigns error in refusing the motion for a nonsuit on the ground that the testimony showed that the plaintiff assumed the risk in consequence of which he was injured. Rule 18 (33 S. E. viii) of the circuit court is as follows: "A motion for a nonsuit must be reduced to writing by the moving counsel, or by the stenographer, under the direction of the court, stating the grounds of the motion." The intention of the rule is that the grounds be stated specifically. It will be seen by reference to the grounds of the motion for nonsuit that this ground was not relied upon. But, waiving this objection, the testimony alone of James Roseman, a witness for the appellant, is sufficient to show that this exception should be overruled.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

ANDERSON v. SOUTH CAROLINA & G.
R. CO.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. July 27, 1907.)

1. CARRIERS—INJURY TO PASSENGER—ASSAULT BY FELLOW PASSENGER.

In an action for injuries to a passenger from the violence of a fellow passenger, an instruction that, if the injury complained of was so unexpected that defendant's employés could not have seen and prevented it by the highest degree of care, plaintiff could not recover, was proper.

2. SAME—INSTRUCTIONS.

An instruction that, when a passenger is injured on a train without fault on his part while being transported by a carrier, a presumption arises from this fact alone that there was negligence on the part of the carrier, which presumption the carrier is bound to rebut, or it will be liable in damages without further proof, is erroneous, in that no such presumption can arise from mere injury, unless caused by some instrumentality in the charge of the carrier, and notice of the threatened violence or impending danger must be brought home to the carrier before negligence can be imputed.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Aiken County.

Action by B. J. Anderson against the South Carolina & Georgia Railroad Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Hendersons, for appellant. Croft & Salley and Sawyer & Owens, for appellee.

JONES, J. Plaintiff recovered a judgment of $1,250 against defendant for alleged negligence in failing to supply sufficient coaches to accommodate the passengers on its train from Augusta, Ga., to Langley, S. C., on the afternoon of June 28, 1902, in permitting white and colored passengers to ride in the same coach, in not having a sufficient force of employes upon the train, and in failing to protect plaintiff—a passenger—from violence on the part of a fellow passenger, as the result of which negligence plaintiff received a pistol shot wound in the leg, inflicted, without fault on his part, by one of the negro passengers in the coach immediately in front of the car in which plaintiff was riding. This appeal questions the correctness of the charge to the jury.

The defendant requested the court to charge that if the injury complained of was caused by another passenger, and was so sudden and unexpected that the defendant's employes could not have foreseen and prevented it by the exercise of due care, then the defendant would not be liable. The court charged the request, except that the words "the highest degree of care" were substituted for the words "of due care." This modification of the request and the general charge that a railroad company must exercise the highest degree of care in the protection of passengers from injury or violence form the basis of the first and second exceptions. The charge as given correctly stated the law as to the degree of care to be exercised by carriers of passengers. Steele v. Southern Railway, 55 S. C. 393, 33 S. E. 509, 74 Am. St. Rep. 756; Latour v. Southern Railway, 71 S. C. 543, 51 S. E. 265; Franklin v. Railway Co., 4 S. C. 332, 54 S. E. 578.

The third exception complains of error in charging "that the obligation of a common carrier for safe transportation is one arising from contract imposing duties growing out of the relation between the parties, involving trust and confidence, requiring extraordinary care, and whenever a passenger is injured on a train, without fault on his part, while being transported by a carrier, a presumption arises from this fact alone that there was negligence in the management of the road, which presumption the carrier is bound to rebut, or it will be liable in damages without further proof"—the error being that no presumption of negligence can arise from the mere injury of a passenger unless it is shown that the injury was caused by some instrumentality in the charge of or under the control of the carrier, and that some notice of the threatened violence or impending danger must be brought home to the carrier before negligence can be imputed. This exception is well taken. According to the rule in this state, there is no presumption of negligence on the part of the carrier from the bare fact that a passenger has been injured while on the carrier's train, but that such presumption does arise on proof of such injury as the result of some agency or instrumentality of the carrier, some act of omission or commission of the servants of the carrier, or some defect in the instrumentalities of transportation. Steele v. Railroad Co., 55 S. C. 389, 33 S. E. 509, 74 Am. St. Rep. 756; Jarrell v. Railroad Co., 58 S. C. 494, 36 S. E. 910; Doolittle v. Railroad Co., 62 S. C. 139, 40 S. E. 133; Stembridge v. Railroad Co., 65 S. C. 447, 43 S. E. 968; Hunter v. Railroad Co., 72 S. C. 340, 51 S. E. 800. The charge was harmful, as in this case the injury was not caused by any agency or instrumentality of the defendant, but by the direct act of a fellow passenger. In such case "knowledge of the existence of the danger or of the facts and circumstances from which the danger may be reasonably anticipated is necessary to fix a liability upon the carrier for damages sustained in consequence of failure to guard against it." 1 Fetter on Carriers, § 96, quoted with approval in Franklin v. Railway Co., 74 S. C. 335, 54 S. E. 578. Numerous cases in other jurisdictions support this rule, but we cite only Tall v. Baltimore S. P. Co., 90 Md. 248, 44 Atl. 1007, 47 L. R. A. 120, wherein the subject is well considered.

It is not deemed necessary to consider the remaining exceptions to the charge.

The judgment of the circuit court is reversed, and the case remanded for a new trial.

(77 S. C. 437.)

MORAGNE v. CHARLESTON & W. C. RY. CO.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. July 27, 1907.)

RAILROADS—PRIVATE CROSSING—REPAIR.

Where a road leads from the public road across a railroad to a house, and is used only by the owner and by the tenant of a neighbor, it is a private way, and the railroad is not required to keep the crossing over such private way in repair, under Civ. Code 1902, § 2183, providing that a railroad crossing a highway shall protect its rails, so as to procure a safe passage across the road.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Abbeville County; Purdy, Judge.

Action by J. P. Moragne against the Charleston & Western Carolina Railway Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Wm. N. Graydon, for appellant. Wm. P. Greene, for respondent.

POPE, C. J. Plaintiff, T. P. Moragne, brought this action against the defendant railway company to recover damages for injury to a mule alleged to have been caused by a defective crossing on its road. Defendant denied its liability on the ground that the road was a private way, and not such a crossing as it was required by law to keep up. The facts are as follows: Some time after the road was built defendant established the crossing in question. The road leads from plaintiff's home across the railroad to the public road and certain farm lands, and is used by plaintiff's family, the family of the tenant of one Porter, and, according to the testimony of the plaintiff, "every one who had business in there, coming or going to my house," or going to Mr. Porter's place. The crossing had been bad for several years, but defendant, although frequently requested to do so, had neglected to fix it and refused to allow plaintiff to do so. On February 22, 1906, plaintiff was crossing with a load of fertilizer, and his mule's foot was caught between a projecting spike and the rail, thus throwing it forward and crippling it, according to his testimony, permanently. The case was heard at the March, 1907, term of court for Abbeville county, and resulted in the direction of a verdict by the presiding judge, Hon. R. O. Purdy, for the defendant; the ground being that it was a private crossing. Plaintiff appeals.

The question of roads has more than once been discussed in this state, and the law on the subject is well settled. State v. Hardin, 11 S. C. 366; State v. Tyler, 54 S. C. 204, 32 S. E. 422; Kirby v. Railway, 63 S. C. 500, 41 S. E. 765. According to these decisions there are three kinds of roads, viz., highways, composing two classes, public roads, and private paths, or neighborhood roads, and private ways. The first two classes named are public in contradistinction from the last which is private. State v. Harden, supra. The three classes are very clearly distinguished in the case of Kirby v. Railway, supra; the distinction between private paths or neighborhood roads and private ways, the two classes germane to this discussion, being that the former runs from one public road to another public road, or from a public road to some other public place, or from one public place to another, while the latter does not connect any public road or public places at all. Again, to acquire a right to the former, use for 20 years is all that is necessary, while in the latter case adverse use must be shown. From the distinctions as made by the court, however, we do not think that only those are neighborhood roads which run from one public road to another public road, or from a public road to a public place, or from one public place to another. Conceivably a road might be an outlet of a community numbering hundreds of people, and yet connect only at one end with a public road or other public place. Will it be contended that such a road is less a public way than one that leads off to a church or mill? Certainly not. On the other hand, not every road connecting with a public road is a neighborhood road, as, for instance, roads leading up to residences, such as avenues and outlets to roads. These are clearly private. The distinction must rest on the facts of the various cases. The road now under consideration falls under the class last alluded to, being only a way up to plaintiff's house and for his convenience, and for the use of the tenant of Mr. Porter, and running across their property. The evidence most favorable to plaintiff was that it was an outlet for himself and tenants of Mr. Porter, and such people as desired to visit their homes. If this were all that was required to be shown in order to establish the fact of a public road, whenever occasion demanded it, any avenue or road leading up from the public road to a private house could easily be shown to be a neighborhood road. We think the circuit judge was correct in holding that the only inference from the testimony here produced was that the road was a private way.

The appellant contends, however, that section 2183 of the Civil Code of 1902 gives him a right to recover, even though it be a private way. That section provides: "A railroad corporation whose road is crossed by a highway or other way on a level therewith shall, at its own expense, so guard or protect its rails by plank, timber, or otherwise, as to secure a safe and easy passage across its road; and if, in the opinion of the county board of commissioners, or if such highway or other way be within the corporate limits of any city, town or village, then the proper municipal authorities thereof, any subsequent alteration of the highway or other way, or any additional safeguards, are required at the crossing, they may order the corporation to establish the same." This contention, we think, cannot be sustained. Aside from any implication of the act, the only reasonable construction would be that it applied only to public roads. Carried to the conclusion contended for by the appellant, a railroad company would be required to provide for every crossing or path across its roadbed, whether public or private. Even at ways where the statutory signals are not required the company would have to provide for crossing. Such a construction cannot be legitimate. The railroad company is owner in fee of its right of way, and its right to control it is analogous to the right of individuals to control individual property. As in the case of property owned by a person, so must the right of a railway give place to a public right when the welfare of the public demands it. When, however, private advantage is sought to be gained, there is no power of condemnation. One of the very foundation elements of all civilization is the right to hold property and exercise control over it. Even governments themselves cannot legitimately rob one person of his property and give it to another. Recognizing this principle, the framers of our Constitution provided therein that private property should not be taken for private use without the consent of the owner. Clearly, therefore, this being a private way, the use would be private. The Legislature, then, has no power to place the burden on railways of keeping up such crossings. Mays v. Seaboard Railway, 75 S. C. 455, 56 S. E. 30. But, aside from this consideration, the clear implication of the act is that it is to apply only to such roads as are under the authority of the county commissioners or under the control of the municipal authorities. Such roads alone would come under their observation. Not being responsible for private ways, it is hardly reasonable to suppose, even if the user thereof did not object, that the commissioners would interest themselves to the extent of examining private crossings. In the case now under consideration, it does not appear that the commissioners were even cognizant of the crossing. It was established merely as an accommodation, and was used with the road's consent. There was absolutely no evidence of adverse possession.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

Error from Superior Court, Muscogee County; W. A. Little, Judge.

Action by C. M. Woolfolk against the Columbus Railroad Company. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Woolfolk brought suit to recover the value of a dog alleged to have been willfully and wantonly killed by the running of a street car on defendant's line of road. It is alleged that plaintiff's dog came on the track about 150 feet in front of said car, and in full view of the motorman in charge thereof, and that said motorman immediately, and "with intent to kill said dog, increased the speed of said car, and did willfully, wantonly, maliciously, and unlawfully run down said dog," and killed him. The defendant demurred to the petition generally as setting forth no cause of action against it, and because "said petition does not allege that said act of wantonness and malice was done under the command or with the consent of the defendant." It demurred specially to the paragraph which alleged the value of the dog to be $200. The court overruled both general and special demurrers, and the defendant excepted.

Garrard & Garrard and W. Cecil Neill, for plaintiff in error. Slade & Swift, for defendant in error.

BECK, J. (after stating the facts). 1. "By the common law a dog is property, for an injury to which an action will lie. Wright v. Ramscot, 1 Saund. 84; 2 Bl. Comm. 293." Uhlein v. Cromack, 109 Mass. 273; St. Louis Ry. Co. v. Stanfield, 63 Ark. 643, 40 S. W. 126, 37 L. R. A. 659; 2 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 347; 4 Bl. Comm. 236. As was said by the court in the case of Graham v. Smith, 100 Ga. 434, 28 S. E. 225, 40 L. R. A. 503, 62 Am. St. Rep. 323 the property of the owner in a dog "seems to be better defined at common law than it is by the construction which this court has put upon our statutes." The decision in Jemison v. Railroad Co., 75 Ga. 444, 58 Am. Rep. 476 holding that a suit cannot be maintained against a railroad company for the "unintentional, though negligent," killing of a dog, was affirmed in the case of Strong v. Ga. Electric Co., 118 Ga. 515, 45 S. E. 366. In the latter case five justices held that inasmuch as the rule in the Jemison Case "has stood as good law since December 1, 1885, and the General Assembly has passed no act changing the same, * * * the rule should not now be changed by overruling that case." Fish, P. J., and Cobb, J., concurred in the opinion in the Strong Case solely on the ground that it was controlled by the Jemison Case. Cobb, J., in his concurring opinion, said: "The trend of modern decisions seems to be in favor of treating the dog as property to the same extent that other domestic animals are treated"—and cites as authority the very elaborate monograph note in 40 L. R. A. 503, to the case of Graham v. Smith, supra; also the note in 37 L. R. A. 659, to the case of St. Louis Ry. Co. v. Stanfield, 68 Ark. 643, 40 S. W. 126. In the Jemison Case, supra, while holding that an owner cannot recover for the "negligent" destruction of his dog, the court expressly ruled that such owner "may maintain an action of trespass vi et armis for the wanton and malicious killing of his dog." Inasmuch as the killing of the plaintiff's dog in the present case is alleged to have been the result of the "willful, wanton, and malicious" conduct of the defendant company's employé, we might safely rest our affirmance of the judgment of the court below upon the authority of the Jemison Case.

But it is contended by counsel for the plaintiff in error that "the ruling of the court in that case (that an action would lie for the wanton and malicious killing of a dog) is purely obiter dicta," and that it is not consistent with the other laws of the state. It is true that the question of the liability of the defendant for the wanton and malicious killing of plaintiff's dog was not before the court in the Jemison Case; but we are unable to assent to the other proposition that such a rule is inconsistent with the other decisions of this court, or with any of the statutes of the state. The case, cited by plaintiff in error, of Moss v. Augusta, 93 Ga. 797, 20 S. E. 653, the same being an action against the city for the wanton killing of plaintiff's dog by an officer of the city, was decided upon the ground that "a city is not liable for the illegal and tortious acts of its police officers." And the case of Patton v. State, 93 Ga. 111, 19 S. E. 734, 24 L. R. A. 732, holding that the willful and malicious killing of a dog is not an indictable trespass under Pen. Code, § 729, was based upon the ground that "that section relates to the injury or destruction of inanimate property, and does not apply to injuring or killing animals of any kind." In the case of Wilcox v. State, 101 Ga. 563, 28 S. E. 981, 39 L. R. A. 709, it was expressly held that a dog is a "domestic animal." Under Civ. Code 1895, § 3822, the owner is made liable for certain acts of his dog, "thus recognizing that the dog has an owner, and consequently that the thing owned is property." People v. Maloney, 1 Parker, Cr. R. (N. Y.) 598. Under the Constitution of the state (Civ. Code 1895, § 5883) dogs are treated as property, and the General Assembly is authorized to impose a tax upon them; and Pen. Code 1895, § 164, makes the dog a subject of simple larceny, and an indictment for simple larceny, even of a thing specified by statute, must allege both the ownership of the property stolen and its value. Davis v. State, 40 Ga. 229; Thomas v. State, 96 Ga. 311, 22 S. E. 956. It must, therefore, be concluded that the criminal branch of the law recognizes the dog as private property, and also as a "thing of value."

In the Strong Case, supra, Cobb, J., in his concurring opinion, quotes the language of a decision rendered by the then presiding judge of the Atlanta circuit, holding that a dog was property subject to levy and sale. That question, however, has never come before this court, and is no part of the opinion in the Strong Case; but the reasoning of the learned circuit judge there, quoted is so cogent that we refer to it here as throwing a flood of light upon the question of the true status of the dog in this state. In the case of Graham v. Smith, supra, it was held that "the owner of a dog has such a property in it as will enable him to maintain an action of trover for its recovery in case of its wrongful conversion." In the well-considered opinion it is expressly declared that a dog is property. It should also be remembered that in a trover case the plaintiff has the option of taking a verdict for the property or a money verdict. It seems to us, therefore, that the principles enunciated in the Graham Case control the case at bar; for it would be a strange inconsistency in the law to permit the plaintiff in a trover case to take a money verdict for the value of a dog wrongfully converted, and yet deny him the right to recover the value of a dog wantonly and maliciously killed. True, it has been held in this state that "a dog is not property, except in a qualified sense." Jemison's Case, supra. But even under the common law, where it was likewise declared that the property in a dog was "base property," and where he was not the subject of larceny, such property was nevertheless held to be sufficient to maintain a civil action for its loss. It would appear, therefore, that the rule in the Jemison Case, which declares that the owner cannot recover for the "unintentional, though negligent, destruction" of his dog, is extremely technical, and has no sound basis to rest upon. And while this court has followed the ruling in the Jemison Case, so far as to hold that there can be no recovery for the "unintentional, though negligent," killing of a dog, we feel no desire to extend that rule. The Jemison Case expressly recognizes that the owner may maintain an action for the "wanton and malicious killing of his dog"; and, as the allegations of the plaintiff's petition bring this case squarely within the rule last announced, we hold that the petition was good as against a general demurrer.

2. The fifth paragraph of the petition alleges that "said dog was of the value of $200." Defendant demurred specially to this paragraph, on the ground that "the measure of damages would not be based upon the value of the dog, as a dog has no market value in contemplation of law." It is true that it was said in the Jemison Case that "dogs seem to have no market value, and the rule of damages in the case of live stock killed by the running of trains could not be applied to them. In case of their wanton and malicious killing or injury, a different rule for ascertaining damages obtains. The act is one which may be compensated by general or exemplary damages." But this was merely obiter, and is not supported by the latest and best authorities. "Large amounts of money are now invested in dogs, and they are largely the subject of trade and traffic." Mullaly v. People, 86 N. Y. 365. "It is common knowledge that many dogs have an actual commercial and market value." Strong's Case, supra. The better rule, therefore, for ascertaining the measure of damages, seems to be: "The value of a dog may be proved, as that of any other property, by evidence that he was of a particular breed, and had certain qualities, and by witnesses who knew the market value of such animal, if any market value be shown. * * * This was so at common law, yet it was held at common law that the absence of any value was the reason that prevented a prosecution for larceny of a dog." Note in 40 L. R. A. 518, and see numerous cases cited.

3. The principle announced in the third headnote has been frequently ruled by this court, and disposes of all the other assignments of error. Central Ry. Co. v. Brown, 113 Ga. 414, 38 S. E. 989, 84 Am. St. Rep. 250.

CENTRAL OF GEORGIA RY. CO. v.
HUNTER.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 10, 1907.)

1. PLEADING—AMENDMENT—NEW CAUSE OF ACTION.

A petition in a suit against a railroad company alleged that the defendant was the owner of the building which it used for depot purposes, and thereby invited persons having business to transact with the defendant to visit the same, and that the plaintiff went to the building for the purpose of transacting business with the defendant, and while there was injured by a defect in the floor of the building, which the defendant had negligently allowed to exist. An amendment was allowed, which alleged that the defendant permitted the express company to carry on its business in the building, and that the post office of the town was also situated therein, and that one person occupied all of the positions of railroad agent, express agent, and postmaster, and that plaintiff visited the building to transact business with such person as agent of the express company. Held, that the amendment did not set forth a new cause of action.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Taylor County; E. J. Reagan, Judge.

Action by Martha Hunter against the Central of Georgia Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Mrs. Martha Hunter brought suit against the Central of Georgia Railway Company, alleging: That the defendant was a corporation operating a line of railroads in the county of Taylor and had damaged her in the sum of $10,000. The plaintiff visited the depot of the defendant at the station of Howard, in the county named, "for the purpose of transacting business with the defendant." While she was leaving the depot she stepped upon a plank in the floor of the depot, and the plank gave way, causing her to fall into the hole. The depot was a place designed for public use, and was used by the public. It was designed for the use of those who transacted business with the defendant, and was so used. The plank on which she stepped was loose, and was so placed that any one stepping upon it would cause it to tilt and be precipitated into a hole thereunder. The insecure condition of the place was known to the defendant, or by the exercise of ordinary care could have been known. The negligence alleged is in allowing the depot to become insecure and unsafe in the manner above referred to, and in failing to repair the same after notice of the fact that the same was out of repair. The petition in detail alleged the character of the injuries sustained, which were serious and permanent. The plaintiff offered an amendment to the petition, alleging, in substance, that the express company was permitted by the defendant to carry on its business in the depot, that she went to the depot for the purpose of transacting business with the agent of the express company, who was also the agent of the defendant, and that the post office of the town was also situated in the depot building, and the agent of the defendant was also the postmaster. The purpose for which the plaintiff entered the depot is alleged to have been to pay the agent of the express company for a package which had been forwarded by him for her. The defendant objected to the amendment, upon the ground that it added a new and distinct cause of action, changing the legal status of the parties and the character and nature of the liability of the defendant, and that the averments of the amendment were in no way germane to the cause as laid in the original petition. The court allowed the amendment, and the defendant excepted pendente lite. The defendant filed an answer, in which it admitted that its depot, or a part thereof, was intended and designed for the use of those who had business to transact with it, but denied that it was designed for public use, or was used by the public, except in the manner above referred to. When the case came on for a trial, at the conclusion of the plaintiff's testimony, the defendant made a motion for a nonsuit, which was overruled, and the defendant excepted pendente lite. The trial resulted in a verdict in favor of the plaintiff. The defendant made a motion for a new trial, which being overruled, it excepted.

Charlton E. Battle, for plaintiff in error. Smith, Berner, Smith & Hastings and R. S. Foy, for defendant in error.

COBB, P. J. (after stating the facts). 1. The original petition unquestionably set forth a cause of action. It was alleged that the defendant railroad company was the owner of a building used as a depot, and invited people having business with the company to come to the building and transact such business. The plaintiff, in response to this invitation, repaired to the building to transact business with the company, and was injured while there by a defect in the floor of the building, which the defendant negligently permitted to exist. The cause of action as originally alleged grew out of the ownership by the railroad company of the building, and its continuing it in a use which necessarily implied an invitation to all who had business with it to resort there for such purpose. The exact character of the business is not alleged. The character of the business that the owner or occupier of lands carries on therein is, in a case of the character now under consideration, material only in determining whether it is of a nature which implies an invitation to others to resort to such place. The use by a railroad company of a building by them for a freight and passenger depot carries with it an implied invitation to any one who may have business with it in its capacity as a carrier of freight or a carrier of passengers. "When the owner or occupier of land, by invitation, express or implied, induces or leads others to come upon its premises for any lawful purpose, he is liable in damages to such persons for injuries occasioned by the unsafe condition of the land or its approaches, and, under such an express or implied invitation, he must exercise ordinary care and prudence to render the premises reasonably safe for the visit." Atlanta Oil Mills v. Coffey, 80 Ga. 145, 4 S. E. 759 (2), 12 Am. St. Rep. 244; Civ. Code 1895, § 3824. The liability of a railroad company as the owner or occupier of land, engaged in business, is the same as that of any person in like circumstances. Central Railroad v. Gleason, 72 Ga. 742.

It is now to be determined whether the amendment was a departure from the cause of action alleged in the original petition; that is, to use the language of our law, did the amendment set forth a new and distinct cause of action? What were the new facts alleged? That the railroad company, in its building, permitted the express company to carry on its business, and also permitted the United States government to carry on its postal business, and that the postmaster, the agent of the express company, and the agent of the defendant were one and the same person, and that the plaintiff went to the depot for the purpose of transacting business with the express company. The company transacted its own business therein, and invited the people to come to the building for that purpose. The amendment simply alleged that it permitted the express company to also transact business therein, and therefore invited people to visit the building for the purpose of transacting business with that company, and, having allowed the government to use a portion of the building for a post office, an invitation to the public to repair to the building for any lawful matter connected with the post office department resulted. There was no change in the allegation as to the ownership of the building. In the amendment, however, the invitation was broader than it was in the original petition. In the original petition it embraced only one class, those who had business to transact with the company. In the amendment it embraced those who had business to transact with the express company as well as with the postmaster. The cause of action results from an injury to one who had been invited to the building by the defendant. The original petition alleged the acceptance of the invitation to visit the building for the purpose of transacting business with the defendant. The amendment alleged the acceptance of the invitation to the same building to transact business with a company which the defendant permitted to carry on business therein. The duty to keep the building in a safe condition was the same in each instance; that is, it was the duty owing to all who were invited there to transact business with the defendant, or with any one whom the defendant permitted to carry on its business therein. In Plummer v. Dill, 156 Mass. 426, 31 N. E. 128, 32 Am. St. Rep. 463, it is said: "To come under an implied invitation, as distinguished from a mere license, the visitor must come for a purpose connected with the business in which the occupant is engaged, or which he permits to be carried on there. There must at least be some mutuality of interest in the subject to which the visitor's business relates, although the particular thing which is the subject of the visit may not be for the benefit of the occupant." This language was quoted with approval in King v. Central Ry. Co., 107 Ga. 760, 33 S. E. 839. One who owns a building and occupies a portion thereof for the transaction of his own business, and permits others to occupy parts of the same for the transaction of their business, impliedly invites all persons having any business with any of the occupants to come to the building, and, as a consequence of the invitation held out, is under a duty to render the building reasonably safe for all who visit it in response thereto. The cause of action in the original petition rested upon the ownership of the building and devoting it to uses which impliedly gave an invitation to others to approach and use the same. The amendment simply alleged that the invitation was broader in its scope than that alleged in the original petition. We do not think that the amendment constituted a departure from the cause of action as originally laid.

There is nothing in our present ruling to conflict with the ruling in Central Ry. Co. v. Williams, 105 Ga. 70, 31 S. E. 134. In that case the original petition alleged that the plaintiff was an employé and servant of the defendant, and that he was injured on account of a defective platform on which he was engaged in work; and the amendment sought to convert the action into one against the railroad company as the owner of the premises and as the landlord of the plaintiff's employer. Under the original petition the duty grew out of the relationship of master and servant. Under the amended petition the duty grew out of the obligation of the landlord to the tenant and the tenant's servants to keep the premises in repair. It is said, though, that in the present case the relation of landlord and tenant existed between the railroad company and the express company, and that therefore the Williams Case is, in principle, controlling, if not precisely in point. The difference between the cases is that in the present case the invitation was the same, and the duty was the same, whether the plaintiff went to the depot to transact business with the railroad company or with the express company. The liability arose out of the same state of facts—the ownership of the building and the invitation to others to visit the same. In the Williams Case, under the original petition, the liability charged grew out of one relationship, and the liability charged in the amendment grew out of an entirely separate and distinct relation. Speaking for myself, I doubt very much the soundness of the decision in the Williams Case, when it is considered in the light of the broad and salutary ruling made in the case of City of Columbus v. Anglin, 120 Ga. 785, 48 S. E. 318. For similar reasons, there is no conflict between the present ruling and the case of Helms v. S. F. & W. Ry. Co., 114 Ga. 678, 40 S. E. 710. Even if there were, that case is in conflict with the case of Central Railroad v. Whitehead, 74 Ga. 441. See the remarks of Mr. Justice Lumpkin, in Georgia Railroad Co. v. Haas, 127 Ga. 197, 58 S. E. 313. There was no error in allowing the amendment.

2. Those assignments of error in the motion for a new trial relating to the charges which were excepted to, and the requests to charge which the court refused, are disposed of by what has been said in the preceding division of this opinion. The evidence shows that the depot building contains several rooms devoted to different purposes. There was a door leading to the post office, which could be used by persons having business to transact with the postmaster, or with the express agent, or with the railroad agent. There was also a door which led into the waiting room, and this room was connected by another door with that portion of the building in which the agent of the railroad company and the agent of the express company transacted the business of his different positions. It appears that the plaintiff entered the building by the door leading to the portion set apart for the post office, where the agent of the railroad and express companies attended to his business, and, having completed her business, she did not return in this way, but walked through the agent's office, through the door to the waiting room, and from there out of the door to the platform, where she received the injuries complained of. While it appears from the evidence that it was usual and customary for persons having business with the agent or with the postmaster to enter and depart from the building through the door the plaintiff entered, the manner in which the business was carried on in the building in the various rooms and the doors connecting the same was such that an inference could be drawn that one entering the building upon any business connected with the persons therein was at liberty to use any of the doors as means of ingress and egress. It distinctly appears that the door leading from the agent's office into the waiting room, and the door leading from the waiting room to the platform, were open, and there is nothing to indicate that it was against the rules of the company for one having business with the agent in any of his three capacities to leave the building by this route. The defendant owed to the plaintiff a duty to have its building, and the means of ingress and egress, and the platform, in a reasonably safe condition at all places that were held out by it, according to the way it conducted its business, as a place to transact business therein, or as a way to approach and depart therefrom. On every material issue the evidence authorized the finding in favor of the plaintiff. We see no sufficient reason for reversing the judgment.

1. INJUNCTION — PETITION — VERIFICATION — DIVORCE — CROSS-PETITION — AMENDMENT.

An equitable petition praying for an injunction should be verified. Civ. Code 1895, §§ 4965-4967; Boykin v. Epstein, 13 S. E. 15, 87 Ga. 25. Where a suit for divorce was filed by a husband against his wife, and she filed an answer in which she also, by way of cross-petition, prayed for alimony and injunction, this should have been verified; and in so far as it prayed for extraordinary equitable relief it was subject to be stricken for want of verification. But where the judge issued an order nisi upon it, and it was then amended, setting up additional grounds and an additional prayer for injunction, and an affidavit was attached to the amendment stating that "the facts stated in the above and foregoing amended plea are true," there was no error in overruling a demurrer to the cross-petition as a whole for want of verification.

TEMPLE BAPTIST CHURCH v. GEORGIA TERMINAL CO.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 11, 1907.)

1. WRIT OF ERROR—HEARING—TIME FOR—CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISIONS.

The Constitution imperatively requires that all cases brought to the Supreme Court shall be heard at the first term, unless continued for providential cause, and that all cases shall be decided at a time not later than the end of the term following that at which they are heard. In order to comply with this constitutional requirement according to its true intent and spirit, it is necessary that the docket of each term should be made up in such manner as to fix with definiteness, as nearly as may be, the volume of the business for the term.

2. SAME.

In the absence of a constitutional provision or a valid statute regulating the method of docketing cases, the term at which they shall be heard is to be determined by the Supreme Court, keeping in view the constitutional requirement referred to in the preceding note.

3. SAME.

The Supreme Court, from its very origin, has exercised the power to close the docket of the term at some time during the term and before final adjournment, so far as relates to the entering of cases thereon.

4. SAME.

The statutes regulating the practice in the Supreme Court, when construed in pari materia and in the light of the history of the practice of closing the docket, contain nothing which, properly construed, denies this power, but, on the contrary, impliedly recognize the existence of the same.

5. SAME.

The bill of exceptions and record in the present case having been filed in the office of the clerk of the Supreme Court after the date that the docket of the term had been closed by order of the court, the case must be placed on the docket of the next term.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Action by the Temple Baptist Church against the Georgia Terminal Company for an injunction and other relief. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Motion by plaintiff in error to docket the cause at the then term. Motion overruled.

The Temple Baptist Church filed a petition in equity against the Georgia Terminal Company, praying for an injunction and other relief. After the hearing the judge refused to grant the injunction, and the plaintiff excepted. The record and the bill of exceptions were filed in the office of the clerk of the Supreme Court on July 6, 1907. The Supreme Court had, on June 12, 1907, passed the following order: "It is ordered that the civil docket for the present term be this day closed, and that the criminal docket for said term be closed on Monday, July 1, 1907." On the same date that the record and the bill of exceptions above referred to were filed in the office of the clerk of the Supreme Court, the plaintiff filed a motion in which it was asked that the case be entered upon the docket of the present term for a hearing. The grounds of this motion were as follows: "The act of 1870, now incorporated in Civ. Code 1895, § 5558, provides that on the receipt of any fast writ by the clerk he shall place it immediately upon the docket of the circuit to which it belongs, and at the request of either party the court shall hear the case without delay and without respect to the order of the circuits; the spirit and purpose of the act being to insure a speedy hearing of such writ. It is contended that the court has no authority to pass an order to prevent or restrict the hearing of such writs; but, on the contrary, it is made the duty of the court to provide for a hearing without delay. The only power given to the court by statute in regard to the making of rules is the authority to make the hearing more speedy and systematic than the statute provides. The statute enlarges the power of the court for this purpose, but it does not authorize the court to restrict or limit such hearings. It is contemplated by the act that, so long as the court is in session, it shall hear such writs and continue to hear the same until adjournment. The present term of the court will continue for a sufficient time to hear and determine the case, and the parties thereto are willing to make all waivers necessary to secure a hearing. The case involves a vast outlay of money in a public improvement incident to the exercise of the right of eminent domain, affecting the rights of the public at large, as well as the rights of private parties, to a public street in the city of Atlanta. The nature of the case is such that it should be heard at once. The petition was filed to enjoin the closing of a public street by the defendant under an illegal order of the authorities of the city of Atlanta. At the hearing on June 8, 1907, the judge held that the plaintiff was estopped, and for this reason refused the injunction. This was four days before the passage of the order by the court closing the docket for entering fast writs of error for the present term. When the judgment refusing the injunction was rendered, the plaintiff gave notice of its intention to apply for a writ of error; and an order was granted by the judge, superseding this judgment, to allow the filing of the bill of exceptions. When the bill of exceptions was filed the judge granted an additional supersedeas, suspending the judgment until August 6, 1907. This was done to allow a hearing of the case at the present term. The whole proceeding is in the utmost good faith, and it is the desire of the plaintiff to have its rights determined at once. If the case is not heard at the present term, the defendant will, as soon as the supersedeas has lapsed, proceed to excavate the street; and before a hearing of the case at the next term the excavation will be accomplished and a reversal of the judgment will be of no advantage, and it will be impossible to restore the street. The damage cannot be estimated in money, and the only protection that can benefit the plaintiff is to stop the excavation, and, under the present conditions, this can only be done by a hearing at the present term." The petition was signed by counsel and verified by affidavit.

Berner, Smith & Hastings, for movant.

COBB, P. J. (after stating the facts). The act establishing the Supreme Court of Georgia divided the state into five supreme judicial districts, and a term of court was held twice in each year in every district. The court sat at two places in each district, except the fifth, where all of its sessions were held at the seat of the government in the city of Milledgeville. In order to carry a case to the Supreme Court it was necessary for the losing party to tender the bill of exceptions to the judge within four days after the trial. When the bill of exceptions was tendered, if true, the judge was required to certify the same. Within 10 days thereafter notice was required to be served upon the opposite party or his counsel, and when such bill of exceptions and evidence of service was filed in the office of the clerk of the trial court it was the duty of that officer to certify and send up to the Supreme Court a complete transcript of the entire record in the case within 10 days after he received the original notice with a return of service thereon. Cobb's Dig. p. 451, §§ 8, 9 (1 Ga. viii, ix). Provision was made by the rules of the court for writs of error, citation, assignments of error on the bill of exceptions, etc. Rule 19 et seq., 1 Ga. xiv et seq. The rules of court provided: "All cases returned to this court shall be entered on the bench docket and numbered, on or before the court meets on the first day of the term to which they are respectively returned, and the cases first received by the clerk shall be first entered." Rule 7, 1 Ga. xii. It will be noted that it was by a rule of the court, and not by a statute, that the Supreme Court first determined when the docket should be closed for the entry of cases for the term. The docket was closed on the first day of the term, and records and bills of exceptions thereafter received were docketed to the next term of the court. In 1855 an act was passed requiring the clerk of the Supreme Court to arrange the cases on the docket by circuits, and to give notice, by publication in a newspaper at the place where the court was to be held, of the order in which the circuits were arranged; it being also in this act provided that, if a case reached the office of the clerk in time to be entered upon the docket before all the cases from that circuit were heard, the same should be construed as being docketed in time for that term, and that error might be assigned and issue joined at any time before such case was called. Acts 1855-56, p. 198. The several separate judicial districts of the state were abolished by the Constitution of 1865, and the entire state was, in effect, declared to be one supreme judicial district, and the court was required to sit at the seat of the government at such time in each year as the General Assembly should prescribe. Code 1868, § 4961. In pursuance of this change made by the Constitution in the act organizing the Supreme Court, the General Assembly, in 1866, passed an act providing that the sessions of the Supreme Court should be held at Milledgeville on the first Mondays of June and December in each and every year, and that such sessions should be continued until the business before the court should be disposed of. It also provided that all bills of exceptions should be filed in the office of the clerk of the Supreme Court at least 20 days before the commencement of the term at which the same was to be heard, and bills of exceptions filed within less than 10 days should be docketed for the next succeeding term. Acts 1866, p. 46.

The practice prescribed by this act, of making the case returnable to the term which began not less than 20 days from the time that the record or bill of exceptions was filed in the office of the clerk of the Supreme Court, continued until 1890, when the decision in the case of Logan v. W. & A. R. Co., 86 Ga. 493, 12 S. E. 586, was rendered. In that case Mr. Chief Justice Bleckley, after reviewing the various statutes in reference to bringing cases to the Supreme Court, laid down the rule that the return term fixed by law for all ordinary bills of exceptions is the first term which begins after the expiration of 30 days from the filing of such bills of exceptions in the office of the clerk of the trial court. Under this rule the term to which a case was returnable was not fixed by the date on which the record and bill of exceptions reached the office of the clerk of the Supreme Court, but by the date on which the bill of exceptions was filed in the office of the clerk of the trial court. This was a decision by a unanimous court, and was followed in the case of Bank of Culloden v. Bank of Forsyth, 119 Ga. 351, 46 S. E. 424, which was also by a unanimous court. By an act approved October 28, 1870, it was provided that if a case had been transmitted in time to reach the clerk of the Supreme Court 20 days before the first day of the term, and should fail to so reach the clerk, either party, on the first day of the term, if the record had then arrived, might move the court to have it entered and heard in its order at that term, and if the court was satisfied that it was so transmitted in time, and if not so transmitted that it was by reason of some act of the defendant in error to produce delay, the motion should be granted. Acts 1870, p. 48. On October 28, 1870, the very same day that the act last referred to was approved, another act was approved which provided that bills of exceptions in cases of applications for injunction should be tendered and signed within 10 days from the date of the decision, and the opposite party be served within 5 days, and the clerk of the trial court, within 5 days from the date of service, was required to make a transcript of the record and transmit the same immediately to the Supreme Court then in session, and, if not in session, then to the very next session; and its arrival by the first day of the term, or at any time thereafter during the term, was declared to be sufficient to insure a hearing. If the record being returned to the court then in session shall fail, after due diligence, to arrive in time for hearing before adjournment, then it should stand over until the next term. The clerk of the Supreme Court was required, immediately upon receipt of such cases, to place the same upon the docket of the circuit to which it belonged; but, at the request of either party, the Supreme Court was required to hear the case without delay and without respect to the order of circuits, or their order in the circuits, unless some rule for a more speedy and systematic hearing of such cases was adopted in compliance with the spirit of the act, giving them precedence. Acts 1870, p. 405; Civ. Code 1895, § 5558.

This court had held that neither the granting of an ex parte application for an injunction at chambers, nor the dissolution of an injunction so granted, were such judgments, decisions, or decrees of the judge, heard at chambers, as to authorize a writ of error to this court while the case was pending in the trial court. Johnson v. Stewart, 40 Ga. 167; Nacoochee Mining Co. v. Davis, 40 Ga. 809. These decisions were rendered in 1869, and the act of 1870 was evidently passed by the General Assembly to remedy the defect then existing in the law with reference to the hearing of such applications by the Supreme Court. The effect of this act was, so far as applications for injunction were concerned, to allow a party to the case in the trial court to bring under review by the Supreme Court a mere interlocutory decision of the judge. This was not permissible under the original act establishing the Supreme Court, which founded the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court upon the fact that the case had been finally disposed of in the trial court. This act brings into the practice what is now commonly known as the "fast writ of error," originally applicable only in cases of applications for injunction, but subsequently extended to a large class of cases. See Civ. Code 1895, § 5540; Gordon v. Gordon, 109 Ga. 262, 34 S. E. 324. In 1877 an act was passed providing that no case should be dismissed by the Supreme Court, or the hearing thereof postponed, by reason of the failure of the clerk of the trial court to transmit the record and the bill of exceptions to the clerk of the Supreme Court, provided the bill of exceptions and record reached the office of the clerk of the Supreme Court before arguments on the circuit to which it belonged had been concluded; and when a case so reached the office of the clerk it was his duty to enter it on the docket of cases for the circuit, and the case was then to be heard at the term to which it should have been returned "after all of the cases on the entire docket for that term had been heard." This act provides, also, that, if the bill of exceptions and record do not reach the office of the clerk of the Supreme Court until after the arguments on the circuit have been concluded, it shall be docketed to the next term, and then heard with the cases from the circuit. Acts 1877, p. 99; Civ. Code 1895, § 5571. The latter part of this act, providing for the docketing of delayed cases reaching the court after the circuit to which they belonged had been passed, was declared unconstitutional, for the reason that the case was returnable to the preceding term, and, under the Constitution, the General Assembly had no authority to make it returnable to the next term. Davis v. Bennett, 72 Ga. 762.

In 1880 an act was passed which provided that no writ of error should be dismissed on any ground which could be removed during the term to which the writ was returnable, and making it the duty of the Supreme Court "to give such time during said term, even to the end of the same, as may be necessary to remove said ground if it can be removed during said term." Acts 1880-81, p. 123. In the case of Davis v. Bennett, supra, the case was called for argument on April 25, 1884. That was the last day for argument during the term. The case was transmitted too late for a hearing on the circuit to which it belonged. A diminution of the record was suggested, and a motion to dismiss was made. The record was defective, and time was asked, under the act above referred to, to complete the record. In the opinion delivered on the day following the court says: "By the act of 1880—Code 1895, § 4272 (c)—no writ of error can be dismissed on any ground which can be removed during the term to which it is returnable, even to the end of it. This cannot be removed. The end of the term is here to-day." The writ of error was dismissed on that day, notwithstanding the court, according to the minutes, continued in session until June 10th, consulting and deciding cases which had been argued prior to April 25th. This was a distinct ruling by the court to the effect that the words "end of the term," in the act of 1880, were to be properly construed, as to remedying defects in the record, as being the last day on which argument was to be heard during that term. The court must have necessarily drawn a distinction between the "end of the term," within the meaning of the act providing for remedying defects in the record, and the "final adjournment of the term," which would follow thereafter at such time as the court, in its discretion, should fix.

It appears from the foregoing history of the practice in this court that at its origin it fixed by rule the time that the docket should be made up and closed for the term. The General Assembly thereafter saw fit to regulate the matter by providing that certain cases should be treated as of the term, although not within the operation of this rule; that is, cases arriving after the first day of the term, but before arguments on the circuit to which they belonged had been finished. The General Assembly recognized, even by the passage of this act, that there must be some way to fix the business of the term and ascertain the time when the docketing of cases should stop. The original rule provided that docketing of cases should stop on the first day of the term. The General Assembly, recognizing that there must be some rule in reference to this matter, simply provided that cases reaching the court during the term might be added to the docket of that term, provided arguments on the circuit had not been concluded when the bill of exceptions and record were filed in the clerk's office. The act of 1870, in reference to applications for injunction, brought into existence a class of cases before unknown to the practice of the court; that is, bills of exceptions and records that were being filed from time to time during the term, subject to be disposed of at the term when filed. The whole policy of the act was to provide speedy hearings for these cases; but there was nothing in the act, construing the language in the light of the past history of the court, which undertook to take away from the court the right to fix a docket of cases for the term and to provide when such docket should be no longer open for the entry of cases. So long as the docket was open for the entry of cases, cases within the operation of the act of 1870 were to be expedited; but there is nothing to indicate that it was the purpose of the General Assembly to deprive the court of the power to fix a time for closing the docket of the term, or to require the court to hold the docket open until the very day of final adjournment, in order to speed any case or class of cases. The court, as it was constituted at the time of the passage of this act, construed the act as having no effect whatever upon the power of the court to fix the time for closing the docket of the term, and the practice originated at that time, when Mr. Chief Justice Warner was the presiding officer of the court, to close the docket for the entry of cases when the last case, in its regular order, was called. From that time no other cases were entered on the docket, and the court then proceeded to hear and determine those cases which had been passed to the heel of the entire docket.

The formal manner in which the able and venerable Chief Justice actually closed the book and gave instructions to the clerk to make no further entry of cases thereon during the term, is in the recollection of some of those still connected with the court in different capacities. In his formal and solemn way he would close the lids of the book, lay his hand upon the same, remark to the clerk that the docket of the term is now closed, and then, with equal formality and solemnity, he would reopen the book and proceed to call the cases which had been passed to the heel of the entire docket. This was the construction of the law by the court as it was then constituted, and of the meaning to be given to the act of 1870 in this particular. And this court, though it has changed often in personnel, followed the practice thus instituted without variation until 1891, when the act providing for the speedy hearing of criminal cases became the law. Acts 1890-91, p. 108. During this period Mr. Chief Justice Jackson and Mr. Chief Justice Bleckley were the presiding officers of the court, and the court, though differently constituted as to associate justices, followed without hesitation and without doubt the practice instituted almost simultaneously with the passage of the act of 1870. After criminal cases were put in the class of fast writs of error, the court, on January 18, 1892, passed a rule providing for the speedy hearing of such cases, and in the rule recognized that the court had authority to close the docket as to the entry of such cases, and provided for the disposition of cases which reached the court during the term but too late to be docketed for the term then in session. On January 21, 1895, this rule was amended, and the right to close the docket was again distinctly recognized by the court. On February 15, 1898, there appears upon the minutes an order directing the docket closed after a given date, so far as the entry of criminal cases was concerned. While this is the first formal order appearing on the minutes, an examination into the manner in which the court dealt with criminal cases from the date of the passage of the act of 1891 evidences the fact that oral orders must have been made in reference to the disposition of such cases; for it distinctly appears that records in such cases arriving during the term were docketed to the next term of the court. When the court was reorganized in 1897 the right of the court to close the docket was recognized in the rules then adopted; the language of the rule being: "Criminal cases filed after the docket of the term has been closed will be heard at the next term in advance of all other business, and in the order of their filing." Rule 22, 97 Ga. xii, 36 S. E. v. This rule was amended in February, 1900, and the following appears in the amended rule: "Unless otherwise specially ordered, the criminal docket for each October term will stand closed on the last Saturday but one before the third Monday in the month of February following the beginning of such term. The criminal docket of each March term will be closed by special order."

Under the recent rules of the Supreme Court, adopted January 14, 1907, the authority of the court to close the criminal docket by special order is distinctly recognized. Rule 27, 126 Ga. xii. From necessity the court must have the authority to close the docket, and thus fix a limit to the business of the term. Otherwise it would be impracticable, if not impossible, to dispose of the business of the court according to the true intent and spirit of the Constitution and the laws. When the time for adjournment of the term arrives, the court loses jurisdiction of all cases heard at the preceding term, and affirmances by operation of law result. If the power exists, then the time when the docket shall be closed must necessarily be left to the discretion of the court. According to the practice instituted by Mr. Chief Justice Warner and his associates, this time was fixed when the last case on the regular call of the docket had been argued. When criminal cases were required to be given speedy hearing, the time of closing the docket as to those cases was fixed in the manner above referred to; that is, by an automatic rule fixing a certain time during one term, and by a special order fixing a given date during another term—it being practicable in the one instance, on account of the terms overlapping, to fix the time automatically, and not being practicable at the March term, which has not, and should never, overlap the October term, to fix the closing of the docket in any other way than by special order designating a particular day for this purpose. On June 22, 1906, an order was passed closing both the civil and criminal dockets of the March term, 1906, on July 7th. This appears to be the first time that the civil docket was ever closed by special order; but it has been, as has been shown, the practice to close the criminal docket in this manner for a long time prior thereto. The fast writs that are placed upon the civil docket come to this court in the same way as those which are placed upon the criminal docket. A fast writ of error is a fast writ of error, without reference to the character of the case which the record discloses. If this court has no power to close the civil docket it is also without authority to close the criminal docket. The time in which either docket is to be closed is a matter within the discretion of the court, if it can be shown that the power to close under any circumstances exists.

While the manner in which the docket was closed has varied, there is nothing to indicate, either in the practice of the court or the utterances of its members, which brings up one single doubt as to the authority of the court to provide what shall be the business of a given term as to the cases brought under the system inaugurated under the act of 1870. For nearly 40 years the court has exercised this power, without dissent from any one who has been a member of the court during that long period of its history. During this period the authority of the court has, up to the present time, been recognized by the acquiescence of the bar in the practice which it has followed. For the first time is the authority of the court in reference to the matter brought in question. This court, and all other courts, will recognize the practice of co-ordinate departments of government, and allow the construction placed by the officers in such department upon statutes, and even the Constitution, to be operative, where there is room for construction. The long-continued practice of the executive or the legislative department will be treated as persuasive authority by the courts, and has, in numerous cases, been followed, although the individuals composing the court at the time would have doubt as to the true construction if the question were left unaffected by the construction placed upon it by another department of government. If this deference is shown by the courts to the practice of other departments of government, how much more are we authorized to show deference to the practice of our own department, unchallenged by any one who ever was a member of the department, even though there has been no express utterance that such practice is authorized by the Constitution and by the laws. There was, under the Constitution of 1868, and possibly under the present Constitution, the gravest doubt as to whether the Governor has any authority to approve a bill after the adjournment of the General Assembly. This doubt was voiced by Judge Warner in Solomon v. Commissioners, 41 Ga. 157; but the right of the Governor was recognized solely for the reason that the past history of the state showed the practice of the Governor to take five days after the adjournment of the General Assembly for the revision of bills, and this practice of the executive department of the government was followed by the courts, notwithstanding the doubt as to the true interpretation of the Constitution. Even if we should allow ourselves to settle into a condition of doubt as to the right of the court to close its docket for the term, we would not only be authorized, but we would be almost constrained, to follow in the footsteps of our predecessors and continue the practice which was in existence so long, and which has been sanctified by the reputation and character of our predecessors who inaugurated as well as those who have followed it without hesitation or misgiving.

Let us for a moment consider what would be the consequences if this power did not exist and were not exercised. The court would be compelled to postpone its final adjournment until all of the cases of the preceding term have been decided. Since the docket was closed, on June 12th, 14 cases brought to this court by fast writs of error have reached the clerk's office, including the one now under consideration. If the docket is reopened, and this case placed thereon, the other cases must be given the same direction. Other cases are being almost daily received. There are now to be disposed of, by this court, more than 60 cases which the Constitution imperatively declares shall be decided during the present term; and then there are more than 170 cases of the present term, many of them brought to this term on fast writs of error, which are entitled to consideration at the earliest possible moment. If the power to close the docket does not exist, not only the cases now in the clerk's office must be heard, but all others that reach there between now and the first Monday in October. It is impracticable to dispose of the business of the court under the constitutional requirement, unless the business of the term can be fixed in some way which is reasonable and just, and proper to the litigants whose cases are before the court and the judges who have imposed upon them, under their oaths, the duty of deciding them. If the docket is not closed, on the first and third Mondays in July, August, and September the court must, under the rules, hear all fast writs of error as they are received from day to day by the clerk. It is not reasonable, it is not just, it is not practicable, for the court to transact its business unless it has the power which it has exercised. If there is no authority in the court to close the docket for the entering of cases, then it is not only impracticable, but it is impossible, to carry into effect the provisions of the act of 1877, as contained in Civ. Code 1895, § 5571. This section relates to delayed cases, and it is provided that such cases shall be heard "after all of the cases on the entire docket for the term have been heard." As long as cases can be entered on the docket for the term, these delayed cases are not subject to call for argument; and if the docket must remain open until the day of the final adjournment there will be no time for the hearing of the delayed cases. If the docket cannot be closed prior to the date of final adjournment, any case entered thereon before final adjournment is a case on the docket for that term, and the delayed cases must await the hearing of all such cases. Not only must the delayed cases await the last day of the term, but the last moment of the last day.

This act indicates, by the strongest implication, that the Legislature contemplated that the court should exercise the power which it has always exercised from the date of its origin, and fix reasonable rules and regulations as to the docket of the term and the business to be disposed of thereon. The law authorizes it to exercise this power. As authority for this statement we simply cite the name of every Chief Justice and every Associate of this court who has presided here from 1870 down to the present time; and, as highly persuasive authority, we call attention to the unbroken acquiescence of the bar during that long period of time. When in 1906 the General Assembly proposed an amendment to the Constitution creating the Court of Appeals, it inserted in this amendment this language: "All writs of error in the Court of Appeals, when received by its clerk during the term of the court and before the docket of the term is, by order of the court, closed, shall be entered thereon, and when received at any other time shall be entered on the docket of the next term, and they shall stand for hearing at the term for which they are so entered, under such rules as the court may prescribe, until otherwise provided by law." Acts 1906, p. 26; 128 Ga. xviii, xix. The language of this amendment is in entire consonance with the long-continued practice of the Supreme Court. It is reasonable to presume that the General Assembly, in using the language above quoted in the amendment to the Constitution, intended to approve the practice of the Supreme Court in reference to closing its docket, and make it a part of the law governing the Court of Appeals. A casual reading of the amendment will indicate that the purpose of the General Assembly was to have the Court of Appeals, as nearly as may be, a court of last resort, for cases within its jurisdiction, of the same character as the Supreme Court. It not only makes the provisions of the Constitution and the statute relating to the Supreme Court applicable to that court, but in this instance expressly conferred upon that court the power which the General Assembly knew had always been exercised by the Supreme Court practically during its entire history. We recognize the importance of the case involved in this ruling. We also recognize the importance of all the other cases. We do not know what is in these other records. But every case which reaches this court is an important case to the litigant, and this case will not be the first by which an injury may have resulted from the fact that the docket has been closed and a delay in the hearing brought about. While we regret that the administration of the law is such that great injustice sometimes results from following established procedure, it is far better that established procedure should exist, and the individual sustain loss as a consequence thereof, than that chaos should prevail in the administration of the law and many suffer in consequence thereof.

The motion to docket the case at the present term must be overruled. All the Justices concur.

GRAND LODGE KNIGHTS OF PYTHIAS OF GEORGIA v. CRESWELL et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 19, 1907.)

1. PARTIES—AMENDMENT—OPERATION AND EFFECT.

When an equitable petition was filed by certain members and officers of a fraternal order not incorporated in this state, on behalf of themselves and other members, and on demurrer raising, among other points, the point of want of proper parties, and that it appeared that the Supreme Lodge of the order was a corporation of the District of Columbia and was not made a party, an amendment was presented for the purpose of making it a party, adding other allegations, and by order of the court the amendment was allowed, the Supreme Lodge was made a party, and the case was directed to proceed on behalf of both it and the original plaintiffs, to which order no exception was taken, this operated as an adjudication that there was an action pending with sufficient parties to authorize amendment, and that the party added was a proper party.

2. INJUNCTIONS—PRELIMINARY INJUNCTION—GROUNDS—CORPORATIONS—INFRINGEMENT OF NAME.

Inasmuch as some of the plaintiffs are members and officers of an unincorporated fraternal association of this state, and proceeding by equitable petition filed by themselves and others of the class, and another plaintiff is the Supreme Lodge of the organization incorporated in the District of Columbia, and the defendants have been operating and are seeking to be incorporated in this state under a name which is claimed to be an infringement of the name of the plaintiff's association, and the question is involved whether and how far the plaintiff, which is a foreign corporation, might be affected by the state's granting a charter to the defendants as a domestic corporation in the name and for the purpose asked, and also whether there is a fraudulent purpose or design to so infringe, under all the evidence the presiding judge should have enjoined the defendants from obtaining the charter applied for, so as to preserve the status in respect thereto until, on final jury trial, all of the questions of law and fact can be fully adjudicated.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 27, Injunction, §§ 304-306.]

3. SAME.

Having determined that the court erred in refusing to grant an injunction as to the charter applied for, we allow the ruling of the chancellor denying the injunction in other matters to stand until the final trial or further order of court, leaving open all the other questions for future determination. See Foster v. Blood Balm Co., 3 S. E. 284, 77 Ga. 216.

4. SAME.

The rulings here made do not conclude any questions of law or fact on the final trial of the case, except as ruled above, and all are left open to be then determined.

BROWN v. CENTRAL OF GEORGIA RY. CO.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 11, 1907.)

CARRIERS—EXPULSION OF PASSENGER—EVIDENCE.

Where a passenger boarded a railroad train at Fort Valley for the purpose of going to Smithville, and tendered in payment of his transportation a mileage book, which, upon examination, was found not to contain sufficient mileage for the journey, but only sufficient to carry the passenger to Marshallville, and the conductor informed the passenger that he intended to stop at Marshallville, that the ticket office would be open, and that the passenger could buy a ticket from the agent at that point, and on arriving at Marshallville the passenger left the train immediately for the purpose of purchasing a ticket, and found the ticket office open, but the agent, engaged in other business than selling tickets, did not wait on plaintiff immediately, and where it appeared nia Gairdner, guardian. It was dated December 6, 1900, and expressed a consideration of $243.40. Lavonia Gairdner, as guardian for James P. Gairdner, brought suit against Blackwell, as administrator of Hester, alleging: That up to December 6, 1900, she had advanced to Hester the sum of $243.40, and that on said date she took an absolute deed from him to secure the payment of the sum named. That after the date of the deed she advanced to the decedent $158.99 in the aggregate. "Said sum was advanced under the agreement with said Edmunds, alias Hester, that all such sums so advanced to him should be secured by said deed, and that your petitioner should not deed said land back until all of said moneys were fully paid petitioner." The giving of notice of an intention to sue in order to claim attorney's fees was alleged, in accordance with the act of 1900. The plaintiff prayed for a general judgment for the sum of $470, besides interest, that the judgment should be a special lien upon the land described in the deed, that the plaintiff be allowed to make to the administrator a deed, and that the land be sold as the property of the estate for the purpose of first paying this debt and then being administered. The plaintiff amended her petition by alleging as follows: "At the time said deed was given said Anderson Hester owed petitioner the amounts of said notes, and in order to secure said notes said Hester gave said deed, and also to secure whatever might be advanced by petitioner subsequent thereto. Since the making of said deed and said notes, petitioner has advanced said sum of $158.99 under the agreement that said deed should secure all future advancements made to said Anderson Hester by petitioner, and at the time said deed was made said Gairdner, plaintiff, agreed to make further advances." Plaintiff further amended by striking from the original petition every thing in conflict with this amendment. Matilda Hester, the widow of the decedent, alleged that the equity of redemption in the land had been set apart to her as a year's support, and she was made a party defendant. She filed a demurrer to the petition, which was overruled. She also filed an answer, in which she denied that the plaintiff was entitled to a lien upon the land for an amount in excess of $243.40, with interest. She also denied that the plaintiff was entitled to recover attorney's fees, because the law under which the plaintiff gave the notice and claimed attorney's fees was not in force when the note sued on was given. On the trial, at the close of the evidence, the presiding judge directed a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $423.79 principal and $112.56 interest. Defendant moved for a new trial. It was overruled, upon the plaintiff's writing off part of the recovery. Defendant Hester excepted.

C. P. Harris, for plaintiff in error. Joseph N. Worley, for defendant in error.

LUMPKIN, J. (after stating the facts).

1. The demurrer was without merit, and was properly overruled.

2. Objection was made to the admission of parol evidence offered for the purpose of showing that when the deed was made Hester and the agent of the plaintiff agreed that it was to secure, not only the amount of money already advanced, but also that which might be subsequently advanced, and that the plaintiff was not to convey the land back to Hester so long as any part of the money that might be subsequently advanced by her to him should remain unpaid. This was objected to on the ground that it tended to establish a parol agreement made contemporaneously with the deed, and thereby to add to the deed terms not expressed in it. The objection was overruled. Of course, the general rule is that a written contract cannot be varied by parol evidence. The deed here involved was on its face an ordinary warranty deed. It described no debt and contained no provision for any reconveyance. There was nothing to show that any bond for title, or written contract to reconvey title upon the payment of any particular debt or amount, was made. "A deed or bill of sale, absolute on its face and accompanied with possession of the property, shall not be proved (at the instance of the parties) by parol evidence to be a mortgage only, unless fraud in its procurement is the issue to be tried." Civ. Code 1895, § 2725. If the debtor remained in possession, he or his widow, who took a year's support in the property, could show that the conveyance was only intended to secure a debt, and thus to operate as an equitable mortgage. Carter v. Hallahan, 61 Ga. 314. The creditor could bring ejectment on such a title; or, if the creditor chose, the deed could be foreclosed in equity as such a mortgage. Bateman v. Archer, 65 Ga. 271. It does not appear that the possession was surrendered to the grantee. The grantee did not claim the property as absolute owner, but claimed only that she held the title to secure an indebtedness. The defendant did not contest this fact, but only the amount of the indebtedness thus secured. The exact question, therefore, is whether the amount expressed as the consideration of the deed was conclusive as to the entire amount of the indebtedness secured, or whether it was competent to show by parol that the consideration of the deed included the securing, not only of the amount named, but also of other advances to be made.

If a deed is made to secure a particular debt, it cannot be extended by a subsequent parol agreement so as to secure other debts. This may be done by written contract. But to allow a deed to be extended by parol, so as to include an indebtedness which was not secured by it when made, would be, in effect, to change or add new conditions or purposes to a deed by parol. Pierce v. Parrish, 111

Ga. 725, 730, 37 S. E. 79; Wylly v. Screven, 98 Ga. 213, 25 S. E. 435; Johnson v. Anderson, 30 Ark. 745; Stoddard v. Hart, 23 N. Y. 556. But where there is nothing in the written contract between the parties limiting the security to a particular amount or debt, and the only amount stated is as a consideration for a deed which is in form an ordinary warranty deed, the actual consideration of such deed existing at the time of its making may be shown by parol. At common law the weight of authority was to the effect that the recital in a deed of conveyance of the payment of the consideration money could not be denied by parol; but even there the judges sometimes expressed doubt on the subject. See Rountree v. Jacob, 2 Taunt. 141; Lampon v. Corke, 5 Barn. & Ald. 606; Baker v. Dewey, 1 Barn. & C. 704. The weight of authority in America is to the contrary, and treats the recital of the payment of the purchase money like the mention of the date of the deed and other matters incidental and collateral to the principal thing, and holds that, while the grantor is estopped from denying the conveyance, yet the recital is considered at most but prima facie evidence only of payment, in an action of assumpsit to recover the price which is yet unpaid. At an early date it was held by this court that the recital of the payment of the consideration money in a deed does not fall within the rule by which a party is estopped to deny it. Harwell v. Fitts, 20 Ga. 723. In Martin v. Gordon, 24 Ga. 533, it was ruled that upon a suit for damages for a breach of warranty the amount of consideration money recited in the deed could be inquired into. Two of the judges held that this could be done, not only against the grantee of the warranty, but against any subsequent grantee. Judge McDonald dissented, urging that a grantor ought not to be allowed to name a consideration in his deed, and thus induce subsequent purchasers to rely on it, and afterwards prove that it was untrue, to the prejudice of a bona fide purchaser without notice. It was declared in the original Code, and has been preserved in each of the succeeding Codes, that "the consideration of a deed may always be inquired into when the principles of justice require it." Civ. Code 1895, § 3599. The exact meaning of the expression "when the principles of justice require it" has not been determined. In the case before us the deed was admittedly made to secure an indebtedness. An amount was stated as the consideration of it; and it was claimed that parol evidence could not be introduced to show, as a part of the consideration, the securing of advances beyond the amount so named. In Dawson v. Briscoe, 97 Ga. 408, 24 S. E. 157, where a deed to realty of considerable value purported on its face to be executed upon a nominal money consideration only, it was held that it could be supported by evidence showing that the grantee was the grantor's daughter, and that the real consideration was love and affection. In Thompson v. Cody, 100 Ga. 771, 28 S. E. 669, it was held that, where the consideration of the deed was expressed as being love and affection, it was, nevertheless, competent to support it by evidence tending to show that there was an additional valuable consideration moving the grantor to its execution. We think, therefore, that it would be competent to introduce evidence to show that the actual consideration of the deed at the time of its execution covered, not only the securing of the debt then due, but also the securing of future advances to be made. But if, when the deed was made, it was to secure a particular debt, it could not be made a security for other debts by a subsequent parol agreement. See, also, on the general subject of parol evidence, Atlanta & West Point R. Co. v. Hodnett, 36 Ga. 690; Johnson v. McComb, 49 Ga. 123; Stone v. Minter, 111 Ga. 45, 36 S. E. 321, 50 L. R. A. 356; Carter v. Griffin, 114 Ga. 321, 40 S. E. 290; Harkless v. Smith, 115 Ga. 350, 41 S. E. 634.

On the admissibility of parol evidence to explain the consideration or identify the debt to be secured by a mortgage, there have been numerous decisions. In Sutton v. Sutton, 25 Ga. 383, it was held that "a discrepancy between the debt and the mortgage given to secure it may be explained by parol proof." In Gunn v. Jones, 67 Ga. 398, the same ruling was made, and it was added: "But a draft having no apparent connection with a mortgage will not be admitted without explanation." The leading case on the subject is that of Shirras v. Caig (U. S.) 7 Cranch, 34, 3 L. Ed. 260. It was there held that "it is not necessary to the validity of a mortgage that it should truly state the debt it is intended to secure; but it will stand as a security for the real equitable claims of the mortgagees, whether they existed at the date of the mortgage, or arose afterwards, upon the faith of the mortgage, before notice of the defendant's equity." In the opinion Marshall, C. J. (page 50 of 7 Cranch), said: "It is true that the real transaction does not appear on the face of the mortgage. The deed purports to secure a debt of £30,000 sterling, due to all the mortgagees. It was really intended to secure different sums, due at the time from particular mortgagees, advances afterwards to be made, and liabilities to be incurred to an uncertain amount. It is not to be denied that a deed which misrepresents the transaction it recites and the consideration on which it is executed is liable to suspicion. It must sustain a rigorous examination. It is certainly always advisable fairly and plainly to state the truth. But if, upon investigation, the real transaction shall appear to be fair, though somewhat variant from that which is described, it would seem to be unjust and unprecedented to deprive the person claiming under the deed of his real equitable rights, unless it be in favor of a person who has been in fact injured and deceived by the misrepresentation." This ruling has been generally followed. McKinster v. Babcock, 26 N. Y. 378; Miller v. Lockwood, 32 N. Y. 293; Stover v. Herrington, 7 Ala. 142, 41 Am. Dec. 86; Wilkerson v. Tillman, 66 Ala. 532; Bray v. Comer, 82 Ala. 183, 1 South. 77; Hendon v. Morris, 110 Ala. 106, 20 South. 27; Wilson v. Russell, 13 Md. 495, 71 Am. Dec. 645; Hendrix v. Gore, 8 Or. 407; Summers v. Roos, 42 Miss. 749, 2 Am. Rep. 653; Nicklin v. Betts Spring Company, 11 Or. 406, 5 Pac. 51, 50 Am. Rep. 477; Hall v. Tay, 131 Mass. 192; Tully v. Harloe, 35 Cal. 302, 95 Am. Dec. 102. In most, if not all, of these cases, the amount for which a foreclosure was sought was less than the amount expressed in the face of the mortgage. The exact question as to whether, if a mortgage expresses a certain amount which it is made to secure, this amount can be increased by parol evidence, has seldom been dealt with. In Edwards v. Dwight, 68 Ala. 389, it was said that this was very doubtful; but the point was not decided. In the later Alabama cases above cited this distinction was not suggested. In 1 Jones on Mortgages (6th Ed.) § 374, it is said: "It is not necessary that the mortgage should express on its face that it is given to secure future advances. It may be given for a specific sum, and it will then be security for a debt to that amount. This definite sum will then limit the extent of the lien." But see section 384. Some of the decisions seem to hold otherwise. See Bell v. Radcliff, 32 Ark. 645; Johnson v. Bratton, 112 Mich. 319, 70 N. W. 1021; Johns v. Church, 12 Pick. 557, 23 Am. Dec. 651. In the section of Jones on Mortgages above cited (section 1067) it is also said: "An absolute conveyance may be used to secure future advances, or to secure an existing debt and also future advances. The agreement to reconvey when the advances are repaid is sufficient, although it exists in parol only."

As to a mortgage, the Code says it must "specify the debt to secure which it is given." Civ. Code 1895, § 2724. It may be doubtful whether, if a sum be thus specified as part of the agreement as to the amount to be secured, it can be enlarged by parol. One or two authorities have come to the notice of the writer in which a distinction is drawn between increasing by parol proof a specific amount agreed to be secured by a mortgage and the admission of parol proof to show what was in fact the consideration of a deed purporting to be an absolute conveyance, though really given as a security. It is not necessary in the present case to determine the rule of evidence in regard to mortgages or instruments stating on their face that they are given to secure only a named amount, or whether the amount so agreed to be secured is a limitation forming a part of a contract which cannot be enlarged by parol. Nor is it necessary to go as far as some of the cases above cited. As already stated, the instrument here involved is not on its face a mortgage, but a deed. It does not declare that it is given to secure a specified amount, or any amount at all. Apparently no bond to reconvey upon payment of any specified amount was given. In order to show that it is a security at all, parol evidence is necessary. To do this the consideration of the deed must be inquired into, and it must be shown what the real consideration was. Having gone thus far in the introduction of parol evidence, under the rulings of this court already cited in regard to the admission of such evidence to prove that the real consideration of a deed was more or less than that recited, there was no error in admitting parol evidence to show that the indebtedness secured by the deed when it was made was greater than the amount of consideration expressed on its face. No third person has been misled, or has acted to his injury on the faith of the recital. The wife is entitled to a year's support only in the equity of redemption. It is practically a case inter partes. The rights of third persons are not involved.

3. Objection was made to asking a witness, "Whose note is that?" reference being had to a note of the decedent given to one Eberhardt, and afterwards transferred in writing to Jones, a witness. The transfer was in these words: "For value received, I hereby transfer the within note to W. O. Jones"—signed by the payee. The answer was, "Mrs. Gairdner's note." Objection was made on the ground that the note was transferred in writing by the payee to Jones, and parol evidence was not admissible to vary the indorsement thereon, or to show that the owner was different from the indorsee. The objection was overruled. The purpose apparently was to show that the note had been taken up by an agent with the funds of his principal, and, though transferred by the payee to the agent individually, that it was really taken up by the principal, and that the amount advanced for that purpose was a part of the indebtedness secured. If the note were transferred to the principal, or were surrendered and canceled, so as not to operate as an outstanding liability of the defendant in the hands of some third party, we see no reason why it could not be shown that the principal advanced the money which accomplished that result. But it is not competent to produce a note which is transferred in writing to one person and baldly show by parol that it belongs to another.

4, 5. The presiding judge erred in directing a verdict for the plaintiff. Counsel for defendant contends that the allegation in the original petition and that in the amendment in regard to the agreement differed, and that this made a question of fact for the jury. But we do not understand that, whenever a plaintiff withdraws or strikes an allegation and substitutes another by amendment, this makes an issue of fact in the pleadings of the party himself, which must be submitted to a jury. Any admission made by him in his pleadings, though afterwards stricken or withdrawn by amendment, may still be tendered and used as an admission on his part by the opposite party. But a party by amendment does not raise issues of fact with himself, necessitating the assistance of a jury to determine them. There was, however, conflicting evidence in the case. Thus, Jones, the agent of the plaintiff, testified that "no agreement was made about this deed, except what is on its face." Smith, the bookkeeper of Jones, testified to the effect that there was an agreement and understanding between Jones and Hester. He said: "In addition to that, the understanding was that any further indebtedness made thereafter was also to be secured by the deed." Plainly no such agreement as this appears on the face of the deed. There may be some mode of reconciling or explaining these conflicting statements, but they should be passed upon by the jury, not by the judge.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

HALLIDAY v. BANK OF STEWART COUNTY.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 11, 1907.)

1. TRIAL—EXCLUSION OF EVIDENCE—FAILURE TO DEMUR.

Failure to demur to a plea which sets up no valid defense in law does not preclude the plaintiff from moving to exclude evidence offered in its support.

2. RES JUDICATA—EVIDENCE.

The record of a former suit between the same parties is not admissible in evidence in support of a plea of estoppel by judgment, when it appears therefrom that the subject-matter of the second suit could not have been litigated under the pleadings in the first.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 30, Judgment, § 1267.]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Stewart County; Z. A. Littlejohn, Judge.

Action by N. W. Halliday against the Bank of Stewart County. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

Halliday brought suit against the Bank of Stewart County, alleging that defendant was indebted to him in the sum of $22.62, besides interest from November 11, 1899, for money had and received to and for his use, etc., which defendant refused to pay; that it was in like manner and for like reason indebted to him in the sum of $493.36, besides interest from November 28, 1899, which amount it also refused to pay. In its answer defendant denied generally the allegations of the petition, except those as to its corporate character and residence, and then, in the third paragraph, alleged: In 1898 defendant extended to plaintiff a line of bank credit, in its business as a cotton warehouseman and buyer of cotton, under an arrangement and agreement whereby defendant was to accept and pay checks or drafts drawn on it by him for the purchase price of cotton, in favor of the sellers thereof, which cotton plaintiff expected to buy from time to time during the cotton season of 1898; and plaintiff was to attach to the drafts the respective warehouse receipts for the cotton, and defendant was to hold in pledge and as security for the advances thus made a special property in the cotton. Plaintiff was to keep covered by the cotton receipts and other collateral securities, and deposits and payments of money, all such sums of indebtedness as might arise and become owing by him to defendant, as well from advances of money to pay for cotton as also from checks drawn by him on the bank for purposes other than the purchase of cotton. Under this arrangement plaintiff became largely indebted to defendant, and in addition to the cotton warehouse receipts deposited with defendant a certain rent note given by C. D. Grimes and held by plaintiff for 11 bales of cotton, for rent due and payable in 1899, and another rent note given by D. M. Geeslin, due and payable in 1899, for 4 bales of cotton, and agreed that defendant should apply the proceeds of said notes to plaintiff's indebtedness to it. The $22.62 and the $493.36 sued for are the proceeds of said rent notes, and said amounts were duly credited by defendant on the debt which plaintiff owed it; and all the cotton pledged by plaintiff with defendant has been accounted for at its true value, and that the two sums mentioned above, realized from the sale of the rent cotton, have been fully accounted for to plaintiff, and defendant has fully accounted for all property and money of plaintiff which has come into its hands, and is not indebted to him in any sum whatever.

In addition to this plea of payment, defendant in the fourth paragraph of the answer set up the following defense: On March 24, 1899, plaintiff brought in the superior court of Stewart county, against defendant, an action of complaint for personality, and defendant appeared and defended the suit and filed certain pleas therein. Copies of the pleadings in that case were attached to the answer; it appearing from the petition therein that the suit was in trover for 233 described bales of cotton, alleged to have belonged to plaintiff and to have been converted by defendant. "By said pleas in said case, and particularly the third and fourth special pleas therein, this defendant set up the indebtedness owing by the plaintiff to this defendant as a reason why * * * plaintiff ought not, in equity and good conscience, recover of * * * defendant the full value of the property sued for, without allowing and deducting the indebtedness owing by * * * plaintiff to this defendant, and as a reason why such verdict and judgment should be met and just and according to equity and good conscience, making due allowance for and taking into account the claims and counter-claims growing out of the mutual dealings between the parties." The suit in trover was tried at the April term, 1901, of the court, upon the issues and pleadings therein, "and evidence was offered as to the indebtedness owing by * * * plaintiff to this defendant, including and taking into account, as entering into and fixing the balance due on said debt, the aforesaid items of $22.62 and $493.36 in this present action sued for; and said items were passed upon by the court and jury in said case, and by the court the jury were instructed that they might allow the debt, including said items, in fixing the amount of their verdict, and the said items were considered and passed upon by the jury, and the plaintiff received credit therefor, and the same entered into and helped to fix the amount of the verdict and judgment in said case. And in said case a verdict was rendered upon said pleadings, issues, evidence, and instructions of the court, and a judgment duly entered up thereon, a copy of which verdict and judgment is hereto annexed." By an amendment to its answer the defendant added a prima facie case in favor of the plaintiff, and that plaintiff had "the right to recover the amount sued for, save and except for the defense set up in and by paragraphs 3 and 4 of the defendant's answer." It then reiterated its defense of estoppel by judgment as alleged in its original answer, and assumed the burden of proof.

Upon the trial the defendant offered in evidence the record of the trover suit. Plaintiff objected to its admission upon several grounds, one of which was that the record showed upon its face that the subject-matter of the present suit could not have been litigated in the former one. The court overruled the objections and permitted the record to be introduced in evidence. From this record it appears that the defendant in the trover suit filed a general plea of not guilty at the April term, 1899, and in April, 1901, filed an amendment to this plea, which amendment is relied on in the present case by defendant to show that the matter now in controversy was involved in the trover action, under the pleadings therein. The first paragraph of this amendment alleged: Plaintiff "at the beginning of the cotton season of 1898, made an arrangement and entered into an agreement with defendant, whereby defendant was to accept such checks or sight drafts as the plaintiff should draw on defendant, in favor of the sellers, for the purchase price of such cotton as the plaintiff in his business as cotton dealer might buy during said cotton season, * * * and plaintiff was to attach to said drafts the warehouse cotton receipts which represented said cotton, and * * * said warehouse receipts representing the cotton were to pass into possession and belong to defendant upon payment of the drafts; * * * and defendant was thereby to become the owner of the cotton." It was agreed that plaintiff should sell the cotton, or any part thereof, upon being called on by defendant so to do, and that upon his failure to do so, "upon request or whensoever plaintiff's account was not fully protected by the value of the cotton and plaintiff's bonus, then defendant had the right to sell in its discretion privately or publicly, and without other notice than that to be given plaintiff as aforesaid, * * * and apply the proceeds thereof to the account of * * * plaintiff with defendant," and place "any overplus which might remain * * * to plaintiff's credit in defendant's bank, * * * subject to his check." The cotton which forms the subject-matter of the trover suit "was purchased by * * * plaintiff under and in pursuance of said agreement," drafts, with the warehouse receipts attached, being presented to defendant and by it paid, and defendant "became vested with the title to said cotton, with the right to call upon plaintiff to sell said cotton, and with the further right to sell said cotton at private sale, should plaintiff upon request fail or omit so to do." The "plaintiff being, on the ——— day of December, 1898, indebted to defendant in the sum of" $5,860, "for the purchase price of said 233 bales of cotton, and the account of plaintiff being unprotected and in danger of loss by reason of the low price of cotton, and his bonus being exhausted, so paid for by defendant under and in pursuance of said agreement (and being the entire purchase price thereof), * * * defendant on said day called upon" him to sell the cotton, for the purpose of reimbursing defendant, and plaintiff, though afforded a fair and reasonable opportunity so to do, wholly failed and omitted to sell the cotton, or any part thereof. Whereupon defendant, for its own protection, sold the cotton "fairly and honestly, in open market, for its fair value and the best price which defendant was able to obtain therefor," realizing from its sale the sum of $5,378.65, "and said sum was applied to the debt owing to defendant by plaintiff for the purchase of said cotton. * * * Wherefore defendant says that it is not in possession of the cotton mentioned and described in plaintiff's petition, and is not guilty of the wrongs and injuries set forth in said petition, and * * * plaintiff ought not to further have and maintain his said action." The second paragraph alleged: The 233 bales of cotton were sold by defendant, "for and in behalf of said plaintiff, without objection and with his knowledge, acquiescence, and consent, and at a price which [he] authorized and consented to. The proceeds of the sale," $5,378.65, "have been accounted for by defendant to and with plaintiff, and applied by defendant to the payment of an indebtedness of" $5,860.11, "then owing by plaintiff to defendant for money advanced and loaned for the purchase of said cotton at plaintiff's request, and were so applied * * * in accordance with the agreement and understanding between plaintiff and defendant."

The third paragraph alleged: The plaintiff, being engaged in the cotton warehousing business in the town of Lumpkin, and desiring to buy cotton, undertook and agreed that, if defendant would accept and pay such sight drafts or checks as he might draw on it for the purchase price of cotton bought by him, he would attach to the drafts the warehouse receipts for the cotton, and that upon payment of the drafts the warehouse receipts should pass to the bank, and it should hold and own the cotton represented by the receipts, and have the right to deal therewith in accordance with the usage governing transactions of that character in that locality, which entered into the contract, and the general and universal custom of said business was that an acceptor, factor, or other person furnishing money with which to buy cotton, or making advances thereon and taking title thereto as security, had the right to sell such cotton fairly and honestly, at private sale in the usual manner of cotton sales, at the ruling market price, without 30 days' notice or other notice to the debtor or pledgor, except such reasonable notice as might be given him without working a delay, and that (for reasons stated) and usage and custom are reasonable, and were well known to persons engaged in buying cotton under such an arrangement. In pursuance of such agreement and arrangement plaintiff purchased the 233 bales of cotton sued for, and defendant accepted and paid the drafts or checks drawn by him for the purchase price thereof, and thereby became the holder of the warehouse receipts attached to such drafts, and thus became the holder and owner of the cotton. Afterwards, with defendant's consent, plaintiff shipped the cotton to Columbus, Ga., to be delivered to Blanchard, Humber & Co., upon payment by them to defendant of a draft in its favor sufficient to cover the amount due it by plaintiff; and defendant delivered the warehouse receipts to plaintiff, taking the bill of lading for the cotton in substitution for the same and in lieu thereof. This draft was dishonored; and plaintiff being indebted to defendant in the sum of $5,860.11 for money advanced by it to pay for the cotton, being the full purchase price thereof, defendant called on him, in December, 1898, to sell said cotton for the purpose of paying this debt. He failed to sell the cotton or to pay the debt, or any part thereof. Defendant, after reasonable notice to him, then exercised its right to sell the cotton for its own protection, and did sell it fairly for its full market value and at the best price that could be obtained. The cotton brought the sum of $——, "and defendant has accounted to and with plaintiff therefor in reduction of plaintiff's said indebtedness. Wherefore defendant says that it is not guilty of the wrongs complained of, and the plaintiff ought not to maintain his said action."

The fourth paragraph was substantially as follows: The cotton sued for was delivered to defendant by plaintiff to secure his indebtedness to defendant, which indebtedness was created by the advancement by defendant of the purchase money of the cotton. The effect of the contract between them was to invest defendant with a special property in the cotton, for the purpose of securing such indebtedness and applying the proceeds of the cotton to the payment of the same, "and to the extent of said debt defendant is entitled to retain and hold said cotton or its proceeds." Plaintiff being indebted to defendant $5,860.11 for money advanced by defendant for his use "in the purchase of said cotton, and constituting the entire purchase price thereof, and the said indebtedness being all of it due, and * * * plaintiff, being called on so to do, having wholly failed to sell said cotton, owing to false classification or other cause, being less than the debt, * * * defendant, in good faith and in the belief that it was acting within the scope of its rights under the contract, and for the bona fide protection of its own interests, and acting as it believed in the interest of the said Halliday sold said cotton fairly and honestly, for the highest market price which could be obtained therefor," etc. Defendant realized from such sale $5,373.65, which entire sum was applied to the payment of the debt due to it by plaintiff; "said proceeds being less than said debt." If "defendant was mistaken as to its right of making said sale in that particular manner, and if by reason of informality of manner of exercising the right of sale, said sale might constitute in law a conversion to the extent of any damage that * * * plaintiff might sustain thereby, * * * plaintiff cannot in equity and good conscience, or upon legal principles, recover of defendant for such conversion, except compensation to the extent of loss and damage actually sustained in that behalf. And defendant says that, the said sale being for the full and fair market value of said cotton, * * * plaintiff has sustained no loss or damage. And defendant prays that the question of alleged loss or damage, and the extent of such loss or damage, if any, may be inquired of, and that such verdict and judgment may be rendered in that behalf as may be meet and just, according to equity and good conscience."

The fifth paragraph, after setting up the agreement between the parties under which the cotton was bought by plaintiff and paid for by defendant, and that upon delivery of the warehouse receipts to defendant it should become vested with a special property in the cotton, etc., and that afterwards plaintiff procured defendant's consent to ship the cotton to Columbus, as previously averred, alleged that plaintiff represented that the draft drawn in defendant's favor on Blanchard, Humber & Co. was drawn for an amount authorized by said firm, "based on a true and fair classification of said cotton," and that upon the faith of such representations defendant yielded up the warehouse receipts in exchange for the bill of lading for the cotton, and permitted the cotton to be shipped. Plaintiff, for the purpose of drawing the draft for a larger amount than was authorized by the drawees, "classified said cotton as of a higher grade than the same was entitled to, and * * * drew for $911.73 more than he was authorized to do, and by reason thereof said draft was dishonored." Plaintiff, when called upon to sell the cotton or otherwise protect defendant, wholly failed to do so, and the cotton by plaintiff's said acts was subject to demurrage charges and other expenses, and placed elsewhere than where the contract had contemplated; and defendant, for its protection from loss and injury from plaintiff's said acts, found it necessary to sell the cotton, and sold it fairly," etc. "Wherefore defendant says that, if plaintiff has suffered loss, it was through his own act, fault, and error, and he ought not to recover in said action."

After the introduction of further evidence by both parties, the jury returned a verdict in favor of the defendant. The plaintiff moved for a new trial, which motion was overruled, and he excepted.

T. T. James and S. B. Hatcher, for plaintiff in error. Hall & Wimberly, E. T. Hickey, Jno. Hall, and Olin Wimberly, for defendant in error.

FISH, C. J. (after stating the facts). 1. One ground of the motion for a new trial was that the court erred in admitting in evidence the record of the trover suit, over the objections urged by plaintiff against its admission. It is contended by counsel for defendant in error that objection to the introduction of this evidence came too late, as the record offered was "exactly the same" as that "annexed to the plea of res adjudicata as an exhibit, and by reference made a part thereof," and that, so far as the record of the present case discloses, there was no demurrer to this plea. As seen in the statement of facts, one objection urged to the admission of the record of the trover case was that it showed upon its face that the subject-matter of the case at bar could not have been litigated in that case. This objection did not come too late. "Objection to a plea insufficient in law may be made by a motion to strike the plea, and this practice is to be commended; but the same result may be accomplished by objection to evidence which is offered in support of the plea." Walden v. Walden, 124 Ga. 145, 52 S. E. 323; Crew v. Hutchenson, 115 Ga. 511, 42 S. E. 16; Kelly v. Strouse, 116 Ga. 872, 43 S. E. 280.

2. Objection to the introduction of the record of the former suit, upon the above-stated ground, was well taken. It is clear that the matter in controversy in the case on trial could not have been litigated under the plaintiff's pleadings in the former suit. The former suit was in trover for the recovery of 233 described bales of cotton. The present action was brought for money had and received by defendant to plaintiff's use. From the answer of defendant in the immediate case it appeared that defendant had received the money sued for as the proceeds of 15 bales of cotton which it had collected on certain rent notes, payable in cotton, which plaintiff had pledged with it as collateral security for the payment of his indebtedness to defendant, and that these 15 bales of cotton were no part of the 233 for which the action of trover was brought, and in fact were not even in existence when that action was instituted. It is clear, therefore, that the rights of the parties relative to these 15 bales of rent cotton could not have been involved and determined in the trover suit, unless they were, as claimed by the defendant, brought into the trial of that action under the "equitable plea" filed therein by defendant, about two years after the institution of the suit. The plaintiff contends that, as the former suit sounded in tort and the present one sounds in contract, the subject-matter of this last suit could not have been litigated in the first action. In the view which we take of the case in hand, however, it is not for us now to determine what matters could have been properly pleaded in the trover suit. That was a question to be raised and determined in that case, not in this. The question with which we are concerned is: What were the issues which were actually raised by the pleadings in the former suit? Any issue which was clearly within the scope of the pleadings in that case might have been determined by the verdict and judgment rendered therein, whether the particular pleadings which raised such issues were, under the technical rules applicable to a case of that character, proper or improper. And any issue which was within the scope of such pleadings could not have been properly determined upon the trial of that case, no matter what evidence might have been introduced. The technical rules applicable to actions of trover are pertinent here only so far as the fact of their existence may be of assistance in construing allegations, in the trover pleadings, of obscure or doubtful import and purpose, as the intention to inject into the case an issue which could not ordinarily be raised in a trover case should clearly and unmistakably appear before the pleadings would be construed to have raised it.

Defendant contends that its "equitable plea" in the trover case was broad enough to allow and to require, upon the trial of that case, a general accounting between the parties embracing all of their dealings with each other growing out of the business arrangement between them set out in its answer in that case, and that the transfer of the two rent notes to defendant by plaintiff as additional collateral security for his indebtedness, the collection by defendant of the 15 bales of cotton thereon, its conversion of this cotton into money and crediting the money on plaintiff's account, were a part of such dealings, and that, although it received this cotton after the institution of the trover suit, it was bound, under its plea, to account for it on the trial of that case. It further contends that in the trover trial this matter was fully gone into and evidence submitted thereon, and that the same was taken into consideration by the jury, and the verdict for the plaintiff was, to the extent of the amount received by defendant for this rent cotton, larger than it otherwise would have been. In other words, its plea amounts to this: that plaintiff has already, in the trover suit, recovered that which he seeks to recover in the present action. Upon the trial under review the defendant introduced evidence for the purpose of proving that this was true. This plea of defendant was not, strictly speaking, a plea of res adjudicata, but rather, as we have termed it in the above statement of facts, a plea of estoppel by judgment, though it is quite common to call both pleas by the former designation. Draper v. Medlock, 122 Ga. 234-238, 50 S. E. 113, 69 L. R. A. 483. It appeared from the plea itself that plaintiff's cause of action in the former suit was different from his cause of action in the present case. "A judgment is not a technical estoppel as to any matter, if the matter is not such that it had, of necessity, to be determined by the court or jury before the court could give the judgment." Hunter v. Davis, 19 Ga. 413; Bradley v. Briggs, 55 Ga. 355. But, although the mere production in evidence of the record in a former case between the same parties may not show that the subject-matter of the second suit is res adjudicata, because it had, of necessity, to be passed upon before the judgment in the previous suit could have been rendered, yet if such subject-matter might have been passed upon in the former litigation, under the pleadings shown by the record therein, the fact that it then was passed on may be shown by extrinsic evidence. Draper v. Medlock, supra, and authorities cited.

This principle was expressed in Johnson v. Lovelace, 61 Ga. 64, in the following language: "If the record shows that the same matters might have been litigated in the former action, then the fact that they were actually decided in that former action may be proved by extrinsic evidence." Obviously the converse of this is true; that is, if the record shows that the same matters could not have been litigated in the former suit, then the fact that they were actually decided therein cannot be shown by extrinsic evidence. It is only matters which were put in issue by the pleadings in the former case which can be shown by extrinsic evidence to have been actually decided therein. Extrinsic evidence is not admissible both for the purpose of showing or raising the issues in the former case and showing which of such issues were actually decided therein. In courts of record the issues are made by the written pleadings. What the issues were must be shown by the record. Whether a particular matter, within such issues, was really litigated and decided upon the trial may be shown by extrinsic evidence. This principle is expressed in Herman on Estoppel and Res Judicata, in the following language: "But, while parol evidence may sometimes be admitted for the purpose of limiting the estoppel, it is never allowed to enlarge its operation, or to show what matters foreign to the record were embraced in the verdict." 1 Herm. Estop. 312. It was held in Campbell v. Butts, 3 N. Y. 173, that "a party insisting upon a former recovery as a bar to an action must show that the record of the former suit includes the matter alleged to have been determined." And in Burdick v. Post, 12 Barb. (N. Y.) 168, the rule was announced as follows: "A former suit is a bar only to such claims or matters as might have been litigated under the pleadings and issues as made." The Supreme Court of Indiana stated the rule thus: "The record produced to support a plea of a former judgment should be of a judgment in a suit in which the cause of action subsequently sued for might have been proved." Athearn v. Brannan, 8 Blackf. 440. In our opinion the record in the trover suit, which was introduced by defendant, will not stand any of these tests.

Let us analyze the amendment to the original answer in the trover case. The first, second, third, and fifth paragraphs thereof, each of which seems to have been intended as a separate plea, are clearly mere amplifications and explanations of the general plea of not guilty. None of them seek to have a balance struck between the aggregate amount of defendant's liabilities to plaintiff and the total indebtedness of plaintiff to defendant, and a verdict rendered accordingly, but each seeks simply a general verdict in favor of defendant, upon the ground that, under the circumstances and for the reason stated, it had the right to sell the 233 bales of cotton sued for, at the time when and in the manner that it did so, and appropriate the proceeds toward the payment of the debt due it by the plaintiff, and therefore was not guilty of a conversion in so doing. It is however, upon the fourth paragraph that defendant in error mainly relies to support its contention that the matters involved in the last suit were within the scope of the pleadings in the first; and this paragraph is called, in the brief of its counsel, its "equitable plea" in the trover case. There is not in this plea any mention of or any reference to the rent notes of Grimes and Geeslin, which were deposited with defendant by plaintiff to secure his indebtedness to defendant, nor of the 15 bales of cotton collected by defendant on the notes: nor is there in such plea, or attached thereto, any itemized statement of the account between the parties, which, if completely set out, might have indicated an intention on the part of the defendant to have, upon the trial of the trover case, a complete accounting between the parties covering all their mutual dealings under the business arrangement between them set up in the plea, and also have shown that the matter now in controversy was embraced in such itemized account, and hence was intended to be taken into consideration in determining where and how the balance of indebtedness stood. There is not in this plea any reference whatever to any liability of the defendant to the plaintiff, past or present, except its liability for the value of the 233 bales of cotton, which it alleged had been extinguished by its appropriation of the proceeds of the sale of such cotton as a credit on the amount due it by the plaintiff for the money advanced by it to pay for the cotton. On the contrary, the plea, after alleging that the cotton sued for "was delivered to defendant by plaintiff to secure plaintiff's indebtedness to defendant, which indebtedness was created by advancement by defendant for plaintiff * * * of the purchase price of said cotton," alleged that "to the extent of said debt the defendant is entitled to retain and hold said cotton or its proceeds." This allegation is inconsistent with the idea that it was the intention of the pleader that, if the money received by the defendant from the sale of the 15 bales of rent cotton should be taken into consideration and applied by the jury as a credit on the debt created by the advance of the purchase price of the 233 bales of cotton sued for, then defendant would not be entitled to retain and hold the proceeds of the cotton sued for to the extent of the debt created by the money advanced for its purchase.

Nor do we discover any prayer for a general accounting between the parties as to all matters connected with their mutual dealings, under the agreement or arrangement between them set up in the plea. The prayer, which immediately followed the allegation that the sale of the 233 bales of cotton embraced in the trover suit "being for the full and fair market value of said cotton," the plaintiff had sustained no loss or damage, was in the following words: "And defendant prays that the question of alleged loss or damage, and the extent of such loss or damage, if any, may be inquired of, and that such verdict and judgment may be rendered in that behalf as may be meet and just, and according to equity and good conscience." Whatever may have been the undisclosed intention of the pleader, this prayer by its terms confined the questions to be inquired into and determined to the loss or damage, if any, of the plaintiff by the defendant's sale of the cotton, and the extent of such loss or damage. It seems clear that the question whether the plaintiff had lost anything by the defendant's selling the cotton when and as it did, and, if so, how much, could not involve the consideration of the disposition made of any other collateral held by the defendant. Especially would this seem to be true as to collateral subsequently disposed of. While the question whether defendant was indebted to plaintiff, or plaintiff indebted to defendant, might well involve a consideration of all the items embraced in a true account between them, we fail to see how the naked question of the loss or damage sustained by plaintiff by defendant's sale of a particular lot of cotton could involve the consideration of the question whether the defendant was otherwise indebted to the plaintiff. The concluding clause of the prayer, which counsel for defendant in error seem to stress in their brief, does not broaden the scope of the inquiry already prayed for, but merely prays "that such verdict and judgment may be rendered in that behalf as may be meet and just, and according to equity and good conscience." This apparently means no more than that such verdict and judgment may be rendered in behalf of the plaintiff's loss or damage by the sale of the cotton as may be meet and just and according to equity and good conscience.

Our construction of this plea is that it sought to escape the usual consequences, in a trover suit, of proof of conversion—that is, a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for the recovery of the property, or its highest proved market value—upon the ground that, if there had been a technical conversion of the cotton by the defendant, it was simply through an honest mistake on its part as to its rights, and, as it had acted in the utmost good faith in the matter, and had applied the entire proceeds received by it from the sale of the cotton to the payment of the debt which it held against the plaintiff, and the parties had agreed that when the cotton was sold its proceeds should be so applied, the plaintiff ought not to recover anything more than its actual loss or damage; that is, the difference between the highest proved value of the cotton and the amount for which the defendant sold it. The defendant did not in this plea, or in any of the others, plead set-off or recoupment; nor did it even allege any equitable ground upon which a plea of set-off or recoupment could be based in a trover case. While it alleged the amount of the plaintiff's indebtedness to it at the time that it sold the cotton, there was no prayer for a judgment for defendant for any balance of indebtedness that might be found in its favor; nor was there any prayer that, in the event the proof should show a technical conversion of the cotton sued for, the plaintiff's indebtedness to defendant should be set off against the amount which the jury should find as the value of the cotton converted. The plea alleged the amount of the plaintiff's indebtedness to defendant at the time it sold the cotton; that this indebtedness was for purchase money which defendant had advanced to plaintiff to pay for this very cotton; that under the agreement between the parties defendant had held this cotton to secure this indebtedness, and, when it sold the same, had applied the proceeds to the payment of this debt. But these allegations were all apparently for the sole purpose of showing that, in equity and good conscience, the plaintiff ought not to be allowed to recover the full value of the cotton, but only what he had lost, if anything, by the irregular sale of the cotton by defendant. A fair test of the question which we have been considering would be to suppose that the plaintiff in the trover trial had, over the objection of the defendant, sought to increase his recovery by showing that the defendant was not only liable to him in damages for the conversion of the 233 bales of cotton sued for, but was also liable to him for the proceeds of the rent notes of Grimes and Geeslin, which he had deposited with defendant. He had not sued for the proceeds of these rent notes, and so the evidence would not have been admissible under the allegations of his petition; and we fail to see how he could have shown to the court that it was admissible under the answer of the defendant.

As the subject-matter of the present suit was not within the scope of the pleadings in the former suit, the court erred in admitting in evidence the record of the trover case. Having reached this conclusion, the subsequent rulings of the trial court, complained of in the motion for a new trial, become immaterial. They resulted from the admission in evidence of the record of the trover case, without the admission of which extrinsic evidence as to what matters were really litigated in the trial was not admissible.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

(125 Ga. 586)

GAINES et al. v. DYER et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 10, 1907.)

1. BRIDGES—ESTABLISHMENT—ROAD COMMISSIONERS—POWERS.

In the county of Hall, the commissioners of roads and revenues have jurisdiction to establish public roads and construct public bridges. In the matters of locating the site and constructing public bridges and determining the cost of the same, the commissioners have a broad discretion, which will not be disturbed by the court, unless plainly and manifestly abused.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 8, Bridges, § 13.]

2. SAME—ABUSE OF DISCRETION.

It is not an abuse of discretion for the commissioners to levy a tax and enter into a contract for the construction of a public bridge in an existing public road merely because no bridge has previously existed, or because no public bridge has been formally established by legislation or previous judgment of the commissioners.

3. SAME.

It is an abuse of discretion for such commissioners to levy or collect a tax or enter into a contract for the construction of a public bridge at a site not embraced in an existing public road; but, where it appears that the bridge is intended to be constructed as a public bridge, and that the commissioners can legally establish a public road which would embrace the proposed site, this court will not unqualifiedly reverse a judgment of the chancellor who refuses to enjoin the enforcement of the levy and construction of the bridge, but, in affirming the judgment, will direct a modification to the effect that injunction do issue until such public road be established, at which time the enforcement of the levy and construction of the bridge shall be permitted to proceed.

4. SAME—MEETINGS.

The acts creating the commissioners of roads and revenues for the county of Hall (Acts 1886, p. 265; Acts 1903, p. 338) authorize special as well as regular meetings, and provide that two members of the board shall constitute a quorum. Two members of the board may exercise corporate authority, either at special or regular meetings, in the matter of levying a special tax for building public bridges and in the matter of executing contracts for the construction of such bridges.

5. OFFICERS—DE FACTO—VALIDITY OF ACTS.

The act of the ordinary of Hall county, participating as ex officio member of the board of commissioners of roads and revenues, in levying a special tax and making a contract for the construction of a public bridge, is valid, whether he be treated as an officer de jure or de facto; and, under the issues made in this case, it is not necessary to inquire into the constitutionality of the act of the Legislature making him such ex officio member.

6. SAME—TAXATION—VALIDITY—PREVIOUS EXECUTION OF CONTRACT—SPECIFICATION OF PURPOSE—RECOMMENDATION OF GRAND JURY.

It was competent for the commissioners on November 1, 1906, to levy a special tax for the purpose of building a public bridge for which there was a present necessity. This is true, although a previous levy may have been made for the same purpose and partly collected, and afterwards adjudged illegal and set aside.

(a) It was not necessary to the validity of the levy of such special tax that the contract for the construction of the bridge should have previously been executed.

(b) A levy of an extra tax was substantially in the language of Pol. Code 1895, § 404, par. 2, sufficiently specifies the purpose for which the tax was levied.

(c) A special tax levied for the purpose of constructing a public bridge is authorized by law, and a recommendation of the grand jury is not essential to its validity.

7. SAME—CREATION OF DEBT.

A contract between the county authorities and another person for the construction of a public bridge for which there is a present necessity, entered into after the levy of a special tax sufficient to pay for the bridge, and during the same year, does not create a debt, although it is contemplated that the contract price shall be paid in whole or in part during a succeeding year.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Hall County; J. J. Kinsey, Judge.

Action by H. W. T. Gaines and others for injunction and other relief against W. N. Dyer and others, as commissioners of roads and revenues of Hall county, and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs bring error. Affirmed with direction.

The board of commissioners of roads and revenues of the county of Hall was created by the act of the General Assembly, approved December 23, 1886. Acts 1886, p. 265. It was provided that the board should consist of three members, citizens of Hall county, to be elected by the grand jury, and authority was conferred upon the board to deal with county matters. It was also provided "that said commissioners shall hold at least one meeting each month; and may hold special sessions in addition to the regular monthly sessions, whenever the interests of the county demand it." It was also provided "that two of said board shall be a quorum, and two must concur to pass any order, or let any contract, pledge the county credit, or grant or allow any claim against the county." This act was amended by the act of the General Assembly approved July 30, 1903 (Acts 1903, p. 338), so as to provide that "at the next regular election for members of the General Assembly in said county of Hall, and at each succeeding regular election for members of the General Assembly, there shall be elected by the qualified voters of said county two citizens of said county, who shall, with the ordinary of said county, constitute a board of commissioners of roads and revenues, upon taking the oath herein-after prescribed." On October 23, 1905, W. N. Dyer was ordinary and claiming to act ex officio as a member of the board of commissioners of roads and revenues. At the same time D. H. Jarrett and R. C. Simmons were two members of the board of commissioners of roads and revenues, having been elected by the people under the provision of the act of 1903. On the date last mentioned Dyer and Jarrett held a special meeting at the office of the commissioners of roads and revenues, and passed an order "that sealed bids for a bridge across the Chattahoochee river at a point known as Browning's Ferry crossing be advertised for in the Gainesville Eagle, and also that sealed bids for a bridge across the Chattahoochee river at a point just below what is known as the Old Seven Islands Ford be advertised for in the Gainesville Eagle." In pursuance of that order, Dyer and Jarrett, as commissioners of roads and revenues of Hall county, prepared an advertisement and proceeded to publish the same, calling for sealed bids to be received by the commissioners of roads and revenues of Hall county on Saturday, the 24th day of November, 1906, for the erection of the two bridges in question. On the 1st day of November, 1906, Dyer and Jarrett, as commissioners of roads and revenues of Hall county, in regular session, sitting for county purposes, passed an order in part as follows:

"It appearing that the taxable property for Hall county for the year 1906 amounts to the sum of $5,912,867, and it further appearing that the taxes levied by the state for the year 1906 is 48 cts. on each hundred dollars, it is therefore ordered that the following several per cents. on said tax be, and the same are hereby, levied for the following specific purposes for county taxes in the present year, 1906, to wit: To build and repair courthouses and jails, bridges, or ferries, or other public improvements according to contract, 24½ per cent. of 48 cents equals $6,906.12." The item of $6,906.12 was one among several items for county purposes. It is not necessary to state the others, for the reason that they are not involved in the case, and no question is raised with respect to them. After the levy of the tax just referred to the bids of W. W. King, a contractor, were on November 24, 1906, accepted by said Dyer and Jarrett acting as commissioners for the erection of the two bridges, one at $2,950 and the other at $2,450, and written contracts were executed therefor and entered upon the minutes of the board of commissioners. Fuller, as tax collector of Hall county, proceeded to collect the tax levy. In December, 1906, H. W. T. Gaines and others, in behalf of themselves and others as citizens and taxpayers of Hall county, filed a petition for injunction and other relief against Dyer and Jarrett and Simmons, as commissioners of roads and revenues of Hall county, and likewise against King, the contractor, and also against Fuller as tax collector. In the petition it was contended that the tax levy of $6,906.12 was made only for the purpose of raising money to erect said two bridges. Numerous reasons were alleged as to why there was no authority for constructing said bridges, and as to why the contracts were illegal, and as to why the levy of the tax was unnecessary, unreasonable, and void. There were prayers to enjoin the tax collector from collecting the item objected to in the general tax levy, to which reference has been made, and to enjoin the contractor from building the bridges and to enjoin the commissioners from collecting the tax and from building the bridges. There were also prayers for a decree setting aside the levy of the special tax already mentioned, and canceling the contract entered into by Dyer and Jarrett as commissioners with King, the contractor. By amendment there was a prayer that, in the event the court should not enjoin the collection of the tax levy of $6,906.12, the commissioners be enjoined from using any portion of the taxes for the purpose of paying for the erection of the bridges in question. Upon the hearing the court refused the injunction; and the plaintiffs excepted.

H. H. Perry, W. M. Johnson, and J. O. Adams, for plaintiffs in error. H. H. Dean, Thompson & Bell, and W. B. Sloan, for defendants in error.

ATKINSON, J. 1. In the petition for injunction complaint is made of the levy of an extra tax for the amount of $6,906.12, from the proceeds of which it is alleged that the county authorities were intending to construct the two public bridges, one at Browning's Ferry crossing and the other at a point just below what is known as the "Old Seven Islands Ford." It was insisted that the levy of this tax was illegal and that the contracts for the construction of the two bridges in question were illegal, among other reasons, because (a) no public necessity for either of the bridges existed; (b) no public bridge had previously existed at either place where it was proposed to construct the bridges; (c) no bridges had been established at said points by any authority of law; (d) the cost was so great as to amount to useless extravagance. Under the act of 1886 (Acts 1886, p. 265), as amended by the act of 1903 (Acts 1903, p. 338), the commissioners of roads and revenues of Hall county have jurisdiction over the county affairs, and have authority to lay out public roads, construct public bridges, and make special tax levies, among others, for the purpose of providing funds for the construction of bridges. As an incident to the authority just stated, the commissioners primarily have the right to determine when a necessity exists for the construction of a public bridge, and what amount of money will be expended for the purpose. In the exercise of these several powers, the commissioners may exercise a broad discretion, which will not be disturbed by the courts, unless plainly and manifestly abused. In the case of Anderson v. Newton, 123 Ga. 512, 51 S. E. 508, where the powers of commissioners similar to those now under consideration were being reviewed, Mr. Justice Evans, speaking for the court, said (page 521 of 123 Ga., and page 511 of 51 S. E.): "The court correctly held that the board of commissioners was vested with discretionary power with respect to deciding whether or not the erection of a new courthouse was a present and urgent public necessity, and, if so, upon what site it should be built." In the case of commissioners v. Porter Mfg. Co., 103 Ga. 617, 30 S. E. 549, Mr. Justice Cobb, speaking for this court, said: "The discretion vested in the county commissioners must be from the nature of the case a broad one, and therefore the reviewing power of the judge of the superior court must be exercised with caution, and no interference had unless it is clear and manifest that the county authorities are abusing the discretion vested in them by law." As to the existence of a public necessity for each of the bridges in question, and as to the reasonableness of the expenditure of the amount of money contracted to be paid, the evidence, though conflicting, was ample to support the conclusion of the commissioners that a public necessity actually existed, and that the expense was not unreasonable. It follows that upon these points there was no abuse of discretion.

2. We may next consider whether the location and construction of the bridges at the particular places in question, where public bridges had not previously existed and where there had been no procedure in the courts or legislation formally establishing public bridges as such, was an abuse of discretion. In determining this question, we call attention to the fact that there is no separate provision of law requiring action, either by the courts or by Legislature, in order to establish a public bridge. A public bridge is no more than a part of the public highway. Pol. Code 1895, § 5. In an existing highway, where there is a public necessity for a bridge and the finances of the county will permit, it is as much the duty, and equally within the power, of the commissioners to construct the bridge by contract, or otherwise, as it would be within their power and duty to make any other improvement in the highway equally necessary to the public convenience. It does not require any formal procedure to authorize the commissioners to construct a public bridge in a public way, where the public convenience demands the construction of such bridge. We can see no abuse of discretion in undertaking to construct a bridge at Browning's Ferry crossing.

3. As to the bridge to be constructed "at a point just below what is known as the Old Seven Islands Ford," the question is somewhat different, because, while the place at which the bridge is to be constructed is "just below * * * the Seven Islands Ford," it does not affirmatively appear that the place of contemplated location is in an existing public road. The pleadings and evidence are of such a character, however, as to show an irresistible conclusion that it is the intention of the commissioners to construct the bridge as a public bridge for the use of the public, and provide suitable approaches thereto from the public roads of the county, in such manner as to render the bridge a part of the public highway. If that be done, the distinction between this and the case of the bridge at the Browning's Ferry crossing would be eliminated. Both bridges would be a part of the public highway. It is possible for the commissioners to extend the public road in such way as to approach and include this bridge. That could be established in pursuance of section 520 of the Political Code of 1895, and by the exercise of the right of eminent domain, or by purchase or dedication. See Southern Ry. Co. v. Combs, 124 Ga. 1004, 53 S. E. 508. But, while it is possible to create a public road which would embrace the location of the contemplated bridge in one of the methods just suggested, there are contingencies which could prevent such creation. It may be that the owners of the land would refuse to dedicate, or it may be that the owners of the land would refuse to sell, and the condition might arise by which the authorities would be bound to pursue the provisions of the Political Code of 1895, § 520, and take the property by the exercise of eminent domain, in which event the viewfers provided for in section 520 may fail to agree to the location of the road at the particular point where it is proposed to construct the bridge. So long as these contingencies exist, it does not seem that it would be a wise exercise of discretion to levy or collect a tax or expend public money in the construction of the bridge, because the contingencies may eventually create a legal obstacle of such character as to prevent the public enjoyment of the bridge. Certainly the citizens should not be taxed for a purpose which the public could not enjoy. It is by no means certain in the case at bar that the contingencies mentioned will happen in such way as to create a legal obstacle of the character above mentioned; and, while, for the reasons indicated, it would have been proper for the authorities to have established the road in advance, we would not on that account alone unqualifiedly reverse the judgment refusing to grant the injunction. If the road is legally established and the bridge should be constructed, the citizens and taxpayers will derive every benefit from the bridge that would have been afforded had the road been previously established in one of the ways recognized by law. Under all of the existing conditions, we think it would have been better for the judge to have enjoined the construction of the Seven Islands Ford bridge, and the levy and collection of so much of the tax as was intended to be applied to that purpose, until the commissioners had, in accordance with law, established a public road so located as to embrace the site of the proposed bridge, providing, however, that, when the road was so established, then the officers be allowed to execute the levy and the contractor proceed with the construction. As already indicated, we see no abuse of discretion with respect to the bridge at the Browning's Ferry crossing, and see only occasion for modifying the judgment to the extent just indicated with respect to the Seven Islands Ford bridge.

4. Another objection to the levy of the special tax and execution of the contract for the construction of the bridges, which was raised and insisted upon as ground for injunction, was that there was no corporate action authorizing the levy or contract; that the only pretended corporate action was that of two of the commissioners in the absence and without the knowledge or concurrence of the third commissioner. The act as amended, which creates the board of commissioners of roads and revenues of Hall county, authorizes special meetings to be held, and makes two members of the board a quorum. Acts 1886, p. 265; Acts 1903, p. 338. The evidence disclosed that the levy was made at a regular meeting, and that the contract was authorized at a special meeting of the commissioners lawfully assembled at the office of the commissioners. There was nothing to suggest fraud. One member was not present, but there was sufficient evidence to authorize the court to find that the absent commissioner did know of the meeting, and could have been present and could have participated if he had so desired. This completely answers the objection.

5. Another objection to the levy of the special tax and execution of the contract, which was relied upon as a ground for injunction, was that Dyer, the ordinary, had no right to act as one of the commissioners. Among the reasons assigned as to why he was not authorized to act was that the law declaring him ex officio a member of the board of commissioners was unconstitutional. If the contest were one of direct inquiry into his right to hold the office, the question as to the constitutionality of the law would be pertinent; but not so where that is not the question. Dyer, the ordinary, has color of office, and assumes to act and does act in the capacity of commissioner. His act is valid, even if he should only be an officer de facto. Under these conditions, it is not necessary to make inquiry into the right by which the ordinary acts as commissioner.

6. Other objections to the levy of the special tax, relied upon as grounds for injunction, were (a) that the levy was not made until November 1, 1906, after the tax collector had collected the tax for the year 1906 from many taxpayers and receipted them in full before the levy was made; (b) that a levy of taxes for county purposes for the year 1906 had been made on September 10th, which included an item similar to the bridge item now under consideration, and that part thereof had been collected; (c) that no contract had been made to complete the bridges at the time the levy was made; (d) that the levy for the purpose of constructing the bridges would be "an extra levy, extra of the fixed or standing yearly expenses of the county, and said purpose would have to be specially mentioned in said levy"; (e) that the amount of the levy was over 100 per cent. of the per cent. levied by the state for the year 1906, and was not recommended by the grand jury. These grounds of objection are not well founded in law. It was competent on November 1st to make a levy of taxes for the construction of the bridges. Commissioners v. Porter Mfg. Co., 103 Ga. 613.<sup>1</sup> The fact that some part of the levy of September 10th had been collected before that levy was declared illegal and set aside does not of itself furnish grounds for enjoining a subsequent levy of a special tax for the same purpose which was otherwise legal. See, in this connection, Johnson v. Pinson, 127 Ga. 144, 56 S. E. 238 (4). The law does not require a contract to be made for the construction of the bridges before the commissioners would be authorized to levy a tax to provide funds to pay for the same. If it is necessary to levy a tax for the purpose of building bridges, the levy may be made before the contract is made. Commissioners v. Porter Mfg. Co., supra. The Political Code of 1895, § 404, contains nine purposes for which taxes may be levied by the county authorities. Among the purposes mentioned is that of taxation in order to provide funds for the building of public bridges. The item of the levy which is objected to is in the language of the Code, and sufficiently specifies the purpose for which the levy was made. No recommendation by the grand jury was necessary for authority to levy that tax. Sullivan v. Yow, 125 Ga. 327, 54 S. E. 173. In the case of Commissioners v. Porter Mfg. Co., supra, a levy was made "for other, lawful purposes." Objection was urged to that levy upon the ground that it failed to specify the particular purpose for which the levy was made. In commenting upon the objection, Mr. Justice Cobb, speaking for this court, said: "While it is possible for the county authorities to make the levy more full than it is, it is practically impossible for the levy to cover all items which might be legitimately paid out by taxes raised under this clause, and to fill up this clause in this tax levy with an enumeration of all possible charges other than those enumerated would amount in a great many cases to levies being specifically made for the purposes which would never be necessary during the current year. The Legislature having granted the power in this general way, we cannot say that a levy which was in the exact language of the statute is so indefinite that it should be enjoined." We think that the reasoning in that case is applicable to the point raised by objection to the levy in the case now under review. The commissioners are by law vested with a broad discretion, and must be the judges, within reasonable limits, of what is needed for the various purposes for which taxes may be levied. The Political Code of 1895, § 405, directs: "As soon as the county tax is assessed for the year, it shall be done by order of such [etc.] and entered on their minutes, which must specify the per cent. levied for each specific purpose." But, construing this section in connection with section 404, where the Legislature has undertaken to deal with the subject of special taxation as under nine separate subdivisions designating the special purposes for which county taxes may be levied, we think it a sufficient specification of the purpose if the levy is substantially in the language of the Code.

7. Another objection to the contract, urged as a ground for injunction, was that the effect of the same would be to create a debt against the county, because there was provision for payment in and during a year succeeding the year in which the contracts were made; there being no money on hand by the county with which to pay in compliance with the contracts. In Manly Building Co. v. Newton, 114 Ga. 248, 40 S. E. 274, it was said that the "county authorities may, without being said to create a debt within the meaning of the Constitution, contract for the building of a courthouse to be paid for out of available funds in the treasury, or with the proceeds of taxes that have been or may lawfully be levied during the year in which the contract is made." In Carruth v. Wagener, 114 Ga. 740, 40 S. E. 700, and Johnson v. Pinson, 126 Ga. 121, 54 S. E. 922, the tax had been levied when the contract was made, which is also true in the present case. The question, therefore, as to whether a contract can be lawfully made in anticipation of a tax levy, is not now before us; and it is not necessary or proper that we should approve or disapprove the ruling in the Manly Building Company Case in reference to this matter. In other particulars the rulings in that case, so far as pertinent to the case now under consideration, are upon review approved and followed. The tax levy of November 1, 1906, was collectible during the year 1906. The contracts for both bridges were executed in the same year. There was nothing irregular in this. In Johnson v. Pinson, 126 Ga. 123, 54 S. E. 923, it was said: "As this tax was to be collected during the year, the county authorities were authorized at any time after this levy, although the tax was uncollected, to make a contract for the erection of the courthouse and the jail in any amount they saw proper, which was not in excess of the sum that would be realized from the collection of the tax." Under the pleadings and evidence in the case under review, the amount of the levy was sufficient to cover the cost of both bridges. The mere fact that payment for the bridges was to be made in whole or in part during the year succeeding the execution of the contracts would not characterize the transaction as the creation of a debt. If there was a present necessity for the bridges, and authority to levy the tax, and a lawful levy for that purpose, the collection was inevitable. Under those conditions all reasonable provision for payment for the bridges would have been made in advance of the making of the contract, and, under the rulings made in the cases cited, no debt would be created. The contracts to build the bridges remain executory until the work is completed. Whenever any sum becomes due to the contractor, the money is available by force of the levy of the tax to make the payment. After a careful examination of all of the assignments of error, we are satisfied with the ruling of the court in refusing to grant the injunction, with but one exception, and affirm the judgment, with direction that the judgment of the court below with respect to the bridge "just below the Seven Islands Ford" be modified so as to conform to the directions hereinbefore stated.

Judgment affirmed, with direction. All the Justices concur.

SOUTHERN RY. CO. v. GORE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 11, 1907.)

1. CARRIERS—INJURY TO PASSENGER—NEGLIGENCE OF PASSENGER.

In a suit by a passenger against a railroad company to recover damages for a personal injury, where the pleadings and evidence make an issue as to the plaintiff's diligence and the defendant's negligence, it is error for the court to omit an instruction to the jury embodying the principle expressed in Civ. Code 1895, § 3830, that, "if the plaintiff by ordinary care could have avoided the consequences to himself caused by the defendant's negligence, he is not entitled to recover."

2. SAME—INSTRUCTIONS.

The error referred to in the preceding note was emphasized by an instruction that, if the plaintiff and the agents of the company are both at fault, the plaintiff may recover, but the damages shall be diminished by the jury in proportion to the amount of default attributable to him, without the qualification contained in Civ. Code 1895, § 3830.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Douglas County; A. L. Bartlett, Judge.

Action by E. V. Gore against the Southern Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

B. S. Griggs, Hugh M. Dorsey, and Lamar Rucker, for plaintiff in error. Lawton Nally and H. W. Nally, for defendant in error.

EVANS, J. In her petition against the Southern Railway Company to recover damages for injuries alleged to have been sustained by her while a passenger of defendant's train, Mrs. E. V. Gore made substantially the following allegations: Petitioner, in company with her adult daughter, presented herself as a passenger on one of defendant's trains, after having provided themselves with tickets. Just as they were about to enter the train, petitioner's daughter notified the conductor that petitioner was blind and 61 years of age, and requested that she and petitioner might have time to enter the cars, and get seats therein. Petitioner and her daughter were assisted by the conductor on the first step of the car, and immediately after helping petitioner on the step, and before she had an opportunity to enter the coach, the conductor signaled the engineer, and the train immediately started. While petitioner was on the outside of the platform of the car, endeavoring to enter the same, she was violently thrown against the door facing of the car by the jerking motion of the train, and sustained an injury to her left knee. Petitioner aided by her daughter proceeded into the car, and, on account of its crowded condition, it was necessary for her to go through the car to find a vacant seat, and, while looking for a seat, petitioner was thrown by the motion and sudden jerking of the car against the arm of one of the seats in the car, and, as a consequence, was greatly bruised and wounded in the right leg. She alleged that the injuries thus sustained are permanent in character, that she has suffered great physical pain, and that she has expended a large sum for medicines and medical attention in her efforts to be cured of the soreness and lameness occasioned by her injuries. She alleged that the company was negligent, in that it did not give her a sufficient time to get aboard the train in safety, in not assisting her upon the train after her physical infirmities were made known to the conductor, in not allowing a sufficient time to petitioner to find a seat, in putting the train in motion while petitioner was outside on the platform endeavoring to get inside the car, and in not furnishing sufficient cars in which passengers thereon could have seats, and conveniently find them while boarding the train. The railroad company by way of plea denied all the allegations of negligence and injury, and further pleaded that, if petitioner was injured and damaged as set out in her petition, it was through lack of care on her part.

1. The plaintiff submitted evidence tending to show that she was injured as set out in her petition. Her daughter testified that the train did not stop long enough for her mother and herself to enter the car; that the conductor assisted plaintiff on the first step of the coach and signaled the engineer, and the train started with a jerk while plaintiff was on the coach platform, and before she had had time to enter the car, and the sudden jerk of the train caused plaintiff to be thrown against the facing of the car door. After entering the car, they found it crowded with passengers, and it was necessary to go half way through the car to find a vacant seat. While looking for a seat, the plaintiff injured her knee by striking it against the arm of a seat. The defendant submitted evidence tending to show that it was not negligent as alleged; that the train stopped long enough for the plaintiff to board the car and find a seat; that the car was not crowded; that the conductor was not informed and did not know of plaintiff's infirmity, and no one applied to him for assistance; and that no complaint of the plaintiff's injury was made to him. The trial resulted in a verdict for the plaintiff, and the defendant was refused a new trial.

From this brief reference to the evidence, it will be seen that there was a conflict as to the defendant's liability. Negligence and diligence are always questions of fact for the jury under appropriate instructions by the court upon the law. When it was shown that the plaintiff was a passenger, and sustained injuries caused by the running of the defendant's locomotive and cars, the plaintiff made out a prima facie case, and was entitled to recover unless the evidence showed (1) that the plaintiff's negligence caused the injury; or (2) that the railroad company was not negligent; or (3) that, if the railroad company was negligent, the plaintiff could have avoided the consequences to herself of that negligence by the exercise of ordinary care. In its motion for a new trial complaint is made that the court entirely omitted to charge the principle involved in Civ. Code 1895, § 3830, that, if the plaintiff by ordinary care could have avoided the consequences to herself caused by the defendant's negligence, she was not entitled to recover. This principle is not alluded to in the charge, and, indeed, the court certified that he "nowhere charged the language or substance of section 3830." The defendant's plea and evidence not only made an issue as to the defendant's own negligence, but also as to plaintiff's diligence. The law denies a plaintiff the right of recovery, not only where her negligence causes the injury, but also where by the exercise of ordinary care she could have avoided the consequences to herself of the defendant's negligence. Granting the defendant may have been negligent, it was for the jury to say whether the consequences of that negligence could have been prevented by proper care on the plaintiff's part. This was one of the substantial defenses of the defendant, and the court was bound to notice it in defining the law appropriate to the issues made by the pleadings and evidence. In every case it is the duty of the court to furnish the jury the legal principles applicable and necessary to guide them in the solution of the substantive issues made by the pleadings and evidence. An omission to instruct the jury upon the law pertaining to a defense which finds support in the evidence, and which would be a bar to a recovery, is a denial of a substantial right to the defendant. The railroad company was entitled to have the jury weigh the circumstances attending the injury alleged to have been sustained, and to decide whether under those circumstances the plaintiff in the exercise of ordinary care could have avoided the consequences to herself caused by the defendant's negligence, if it was, in fact, negligent, and to have the jury instructed upon the law appropriate to this issue. A failure to charge the jury on this issue was substantial error. Central R. Co. v. Harris, 76 Ga. 501; Atlanta Railway Co. v. Gardner, 122 Ga. 92, 49 S. E. 818.

2. The error committed by the court in the failure to charge the substance of Civ. Code 1895, § 3830, was accentuated by the instruction: "No person shall recover damages from a railroad company for an injury to himself or his property where the same is done by his consent or is caused by his own negligence. If the plaintiff and the agents of the company are both at fault, the plaintiff may recover, but the damages shall be diminished by the jury in proportion to the amount of default attributable to him." This last charge is made a ground of exception in the motion for a new trial, because it joins and states in immediate connection, and without explanation, two distinct propositions of law without qualification. The charge of which complaint is made is substantially Civ. Code 1895, § 2322. In A. P. & L. R. Co. v. Luckie, 87 Ga. 6, 13 S. E. 105, it was held to be error to give this entire section in immediate connection without qualifying it by an instruction to the effect that if both parties were at fault, and the alleged injury was the result of the fault of both, and the plaintiff could not, by the use of ordinary care, have avoided the alleged injury to herself, occasioned by the defendant's negligence, notwithstanding she may have been to some extent negligent, she would be entitled to recover, but the amount of damages should be diminished in proportion to the amount of default attributable her. Macon Ry. Co. v. Streyer, 123 Ga. 280, 51 S. E. 342, and citations.

The other grounds of the motion are without merit, and a new trial is granted for the errors herein pointed out.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

KELLY & JONES CO. v. MOORE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 12, 1907.)

1. PLEADING—AMENDMENT.

There was no error in allowing the amendment offered by the plaintiff to be filed and proved.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 39, Pleading, § 676.]

2. JUDGMENT—RES JUDICATA.

An employé brought suit to recover installments of salary for the period of three months, alleging that the contract of employment was for a year, the salary being payable monthly, and that he had been wrongfully discharged before the end of the year. The defendant had notice that this suit was pending against him, and allowed a judgment to be taken therein by default. Subsequently the plaintiff instituted the present action to recover the salary for the other months of the year. Held, that the defendant was concluded in the second action as to all matters which the court must necessarily have adjudicated in the former case in order to reach the judgment there rendered.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 30, Judgment, § 1256.]

3. SAME.

The defendant was concluded as to the matters pleaded by him in his answer to the second action, and the court did not err in refusing to allow them to be proved.

4. MASTER AND SERVANT—ACTION FOR SERVICES.

The evidence demanded the verdict; and the other errors complained of, if errors at all, were harmless.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 34, Master and Servant, § 49.]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; J. T. Pendleton, Judge.

Action by V. A. Moore against the Kelly & Jones Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

See 54 S. E. 118.

Reuben B. Arnold and C. D. Maddox, for plaintiff in error. Culberson & Johnson, for defendant in error.

BECK, J. Moore, the plaintiff in the court below, filed a declaration in attachment against the Kelly & Jones Company, a non-resident corporation, to recover $1,000 alleged to be due plaintiff by defendant as salary. The plaintiff alleges that he was employed by the defendant as sales agent for the period of one year, beginning February 12, 1898; that he was wrongfully discharged during the following month of May; that he has heretofore obtained a judgment against this defendant for the salary due him from the time he was wrongfully discharged until September 12, 1898, and he brings this action to recover the amount of salary due him under said contract from September 12, 1898, to February 12, 1899. To this petition the defendant filed an answer, alleging that there was a written contract between the plaintiff and the defendant, under the terms of which defendant claimed that it had the right to discharge plaintiff before the end of the year, and that plaintiff's discharge was lawful; wherefore defendant denied being indebted to plaintiff in any amount whatever. After the filing of this answer, the plaintiff offered to amend his petition by alleging that the matters set up in defendant's answer had been adjudicated in a former case in the city court of Atlanta, in which case the plaintiff had recovered the part of the salary alleged to be due him by the defendant up to the 12th day of September, 1898. The defendant objected to the allowance of this amendment, and also objected to the admission of the said former judgment, upon certain grounds which will be noted in detail. The petition in the former case in the city court, after setting out certain letters that had passed between plaintiff and defendant, alleged that "in consequence of said correspondence, and in compliance with its terms, petitioner agreed to represent defendant as sales agent in the territory covered by the states of Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama, Tennessee, Georgia, Florida, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Virginia, for one year from February 12, 1898, at a salary payable monthly of $200 per month." The petition in the present case sets out substantially the same correspondence between the parties, and alleges that "shortly thereafter the Kelly & Jones Company wired petitioner to come to Pittsburg, which petitioner did, * * * when defendant renewed his proposition to employ petitioner as sales agent for [the states above mentioned] for one year at a salary payable monthly at the rate of $200 per month, beginning from February 12, 1898," which proposition petitioner accepted. It requires no argument to show that the suit in the city court and the case at bar were upon the same contract of employment; and that there is no merit in the contention of the plaintiff in error that the former suit "was based upon a different contract alleged to have been in writing, while in the present case that contract was a verbal one, and is claimed to have been made in a personal interview."

Another objection urged by the defendant to the allowance of said amendment was that it "set forth a new cause of action." Clearly this contention has no foundation in fact. The amendment set forth no cause of action at all. The judgment from the city court, which was set up in the amendment, could not operate as the basis of any further demand against the defendant. Its only effect could be to estop the defendant from setting up any matter of defense in the present case that was adjudicated in the former suit.

But defendant further contends that "the judgment in said city court was a default judgment; that there were no issues made therein, and no plea filed by the defendant, while in the present case issues were made and a plea filed on various grounds; that the two suits made different issues, and that the judgment in the city court could not work an estoppel against defendant in the present case." In said former case in the city court the plaintiff, Moore, sued out an attachment against the Kelly & Jones Company, and a summons of garnishment was duly issued and served on the garnishee. The defendant dissolved the garnishment by giving bond and security as provided by the Code, and name of counsel was marked on the docket of the city court as representing the defendant; but, owing to a misunderstanding between defendant and counsel, no answer or plea was filed, and, when the case was called for trial, the plaintiff submitted evidence to sustain his case, and a verdict was rendered in his favor. The defendant filed a written motion to set aside the judgment entered upon said verdict; one of the several grounds of the motion being that there was an agreement between the parties in writing, and the writing was kept concealed and not exhibited to the court and jury trying the case, and by so doing the plaintiff made it appear that he had a just cause, when, in fact, he had no right of recovery. And this court held that the defendant was concluded by the judgment on this question, and could not reopen the proceedings. Mr. Justice Little, in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "The defendant in attachment acquired notice of the pendency of the suit, and sent one of its officers to the city of Atlanta, where the attachment proceedings were pending, and dissolved the garnishment. The effect of this act was equivalent to a personal service on it [the defendant]." Moore v. Kelly & Jones Co., 109 Ga. 798, 35 S. E. 168.

As we have seen above, these two suits were between the same parties and upon the same contract of employment; the former being a suit to recover the salary due the plaintiff under said contract from June 12, 1898, to September 12th, and the latter (the present case) to recover the balance of said salary from September 12th to February 12th of the following year. No issues were made, or sought to be made, in the second case which could not have been made on the trial of the first. The fact that there was a written contract between the parties, which settled their rights favorably to the defendant, if there was such a contract, was a fact known to the defendant before the first trial. The defendant had notice of that suit, and could have availed himself of this defense at that time. But this he failed to do, and the court adjudicated those issues in favor of the plaintiff. In entering the default judgment, the court was necessarily bound to find and hold that the plaintiff had a contract with the defendant as set out in his petition, that this contract was for a year, and that the plaintiff had been wrongfully discharged before the end of that year, and was entitled to recover the balance of the salary up to the time of bringing suit. No other issues were presented in the trial of the second case, which was for the salary that had accrued from the time of the bringing of the first suit until the end of the period contracted for. "It is not necessary to the conclusiveness of a former judgment that issues should have been taken upon the precise point controverted in the second action. Any conclusion which the court or jury must evidently have arrived at in order to reach the judgment or verdict rendered will be fully concluded." 24 Am. Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.), 766; Callaway v. Irvin, 123 Ga. 344, 51 S. E. 477. In the present case, the question as to whether or not there was a contract in writing between the parties, as defendant contends, under the terms of which the plaintiff could be lawfully discharged, and all other questions touching plaintiff's right of action against the defendant, were material, issuable facts, clearly involved and necessarily adjudicated in the former case in the city court. And, under the authorities above cited, it makes no difference, so far as the conclusiveness of that judgment is concerned, whether issue was actually joined upon them or not. In the case of Kennedy v. McCarthy, 73 Ga. 346, the following facts appear: A discharged employé claimed that his contract of employment was for a year, payable monthly, and that he was wrongfully discharged before the end of the year. At the end of the first month after he was discharged, he brought suit for the wages of that month. The employer defended on the ground of incompetency of the employé, and claimed that he had a right to discharge him. The employé obtained a judgment, which was paid. Subsequently the employé again sued for the other months of the year, and the defense was substantially as before. Under these facts the court held "that the decision in the first case was conclusive as to those defenses in the second." See Civ. Code 1895, § 3741. We are constrained to hold, therefore, in this case that the court committed no error in allowing the plaintiff to amend his petition by setting up the judgment in the former case, and in holding that said judgment concluded the defendant as to all questions touching the nature and effect of the contract between the parties. No other defense was made; and, the plaintiff having introduced evidence which authorized a finding in his favor, the court did not err in directing a verdict accordingly.

In view of what has been ruled above, the errors complained of in the other grounds of the motion, if errors at all, were harmless. Rowe v. Ware, 30 Ga. 278.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

WESTERN & A. R. CO. v. YORK.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 12, 1907.)

1. PLEADING—PETITION—SUFFICIENCY.

The petition as amended set forth a cause of action as against a general demurrer and was not subject to any of the grounds set up in the special demurrers.

2. WRIT OF ERROR—REVIEW—HARMLESS ERROR—ARGUMENT OF COUNSEL.

Remarks of counsel while addressing the jury, which do not undertake to introduce any material fact not disclosed by the evidence, but which are merely oratorical in character, do not constitute sufficient ground for declaring a mistrial.

3. TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—APPLICABILITY TO ISSUES.

Under the facts of this case it was not erroneous for the judge to charge: "The duty resting by law upon all persons to exercise ordinary care to avoid the consequences of another's negligence does not arise until the danger is impending, or the circumstances are such that an ordinarily prudent man would have reason to apprehend its existence."

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 37, Negligence, § 92.]

4. TRIAL—QUESTIONS FOR JURY—WRIT OF ERROR—REVIEW—VERDICT ON CONFLICTING EVIDENCE.

Diligence of the person injured and negligence of the defendant were questions peculiarly for the jury. The evidence upon those questions and upon all other issues made was of such character as that we cannot say that the verdict in favor of the plaintiff was entirely unsupported. The discretion of the trial judge, therefore, in refusing to grant a new trial, will not be interfered with.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, §§ 3871-3874.]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Cobb County; Geo. F. Gober, Judge.

Action by L. E. York against the Western & Atlantic Railroad Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

John L. Tye, Clay & Blair, and Tye & Bryan, for plaintiff in error. J. Z. Foster, for defendant in error.

ATKINSON, J. 1. The questions raised by demurrer are of such character as that we do not deem it necessary to make further reference to them than is expressed in the first headnote.

2. During the progress of his argument before the jury, counsel for the plaintiff in the court below used the following language: "Man is the noblest creation of God. God made no greater creation than man. He is the grandest product of divine handicraft; and He hedged about him the law: 'Thou shalt not kill.' God told Cain that the blood of his brother Abel cried to him from the ground. The most eloquent sermon I ever heard in my life was from the text: 'The statutes of the Lord are right.' 'Thou shalt not kill' is the statute of the Lord God Almighty. It was made for the protection of the lord of creation—for man; and it applies to a railroad corporation just as much as it does to an individual. If a man is dead by the reckless negligence of the servants and agents of the railroad corporation, the full consequences to him are the same. He is just as dead as if he had died by the uplifted and directed and murderous hand of his brother man. The shedding of innocent blood is just the same—just the same. Our land is defiled when innocent blood is shed therein, whether it be by the hand of a railroad corporation, or whether it be by the murderer's hand, or some one contending in a death grapple with his brother man; and the curse of God, which is charged against that, is upon it just the same. Gentlemen of the jury, when George W. York died on that public crossing in the city of Acworth, last October was a year ago, his innocent blood stained the right of way of this defendant." Whereupon counsel for the defendant moved the court to declare a mistrial upon the ground that the remarks by counsel for the plaintiff were improper. The court refused to declare a mistrial. Exception is taken to such ruling, and the same is made a ground of the motion for new trial. We do not think the remarks of counsel were of such character as to require the court to declare a mistrial. A mere flight of oratory of counsel when addressing the jury is not ground for a mistrial. Counsel may bring to his use in the discussion of the case well-established historical facts, and may allude to such principles of divine law relating to transactions of men as may be appropriate to the case. It is not impassioned oratory which the law condemns and discredits in the advocate, but it is the introduction of facts not disclosed by the evidence, which requires the judge to use his power of declaring a mistrial. In this connection, see W. & A. R. Co. v. Cox, 115 Ga. 719, 42 S. E. 74; Patterson v. State, 124 Ga. 409, 52 S. E. 534; Taylor v. State, 121 Ga. 354, 49 S. E. 303 (7); McNabb v. Lockhart, 18 Ga. 507, and citations. An examination of the remarks of counsel which are complained of will show that there was no effort to introduce any fact not disclosed by the evidence.

3. While instructing the jury, the court charged as follows: "The duty resting by law upon all persons to exercise ordinary care to avoid the consequences of another's negligence does not arise until the danger is impending, or the circumstances are such that an ordinarily prudent man would have reason to apprehend its existence." In one of the grounds of motion for new trial this charge is complained of as erroneous, for the reason that it was inapplicable to the facts of the case, and because it did not correctly state the law; it being contended that the plaintiff's duty to exercise ordinary care for his own safety begins as soon as the defendant's negligence comes into existence. We have carefully examined the evidence, and cannot agree with counsel for the plaintiff in error that this rule is inapplicable to the facts of the case. The charge of the court is not exactly in the language of the opinions in the cases of W. & A. R. Co. v. Ferguson, 113 Ga. 708, 39 S. E. 306, 54 L. R. A. 802, and Williams v. Southern Ry. Co., 126 Ga. 710, 55 S. E. 948, but is substantially in accord with the principle therein ruled.

4. Diligence of the person injured and negligence of the defendant were questions peculiarly for the jury. Under the principle announced in Williams v. Southern Ry. Co., supra, the evidence upon these questions was of such character as to authorize the case to go to the jury. See, also, Shaw v. Ga. R., 127 Ga. 8, 55 S. E. 960; G. C. & N. R. Co. v. Mathews, 116 Ga. 424, 42 S. E. 771. The amount of the verdict was such as to indicate that the jury regarded the plaintiff's husband as guilty of some negligence, but not of such conduct as would amount to a want of ordinary care for his own safety after the negligence of the defendant came into existence and was known, or by the exercise of ordinary care could have been known, by him. The evidence upon this point was of such character as to support such a finding, and the evidence as a whole was sufficient to support the verdict. Under these conditions we will not interfere with the discretion of the trial court in refusing to grant a new trial. See, in this connection, L. & N. R. Co. v. Gassoway (decided April 13, 1907) 57 S. E. 231; Southern Ry. Co. v. Rumsey, 124 Ga. 742, 52 S. E. 812. Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 9, 1907.)

1. RELIGIOUS SOCIETIES — ECCLESIASTICAL TRIBUNALS — BINDING EFFECT OF DECISIONS.

A voluntary religious society, which constitutes a subordinate part of a religious organization having established tribunals authorized, either expressly or impliedly, to decide all questions of faith, discipline, rule, or ecclesiastical government, is bound by the decisions of all such tribunals on all questions determined by them within the respective jurisdictions of each. In such cases, where a right of property asserted in a civil court is dependent on a question of doctrine, discipline, ecclesiastical law, rule, custom, or church government, and that question has been decided by the highest tribunal within the organization, to which it has been regularly and properly carried, the civil courts will accept that decision as conclusive, and be governed by it in its application to the case before it.

2. SAME—JUDICIAL SUPERVISION.

The general rule is that, where property rights are involved, the civil courts will interfere to protect the members of an ecclesiastical organization who adhere to the tenets and doctrines which the organization was organized to promulgate, and protect them in the right to use the property, as against those members of the organization who are attempting to divert the same to purposes utterly foreign. The constituted authorities of a church cannot, where members' rights are involved, entirely abandon the purposes for which the church was organized, and divert the property to other uses. The civil courts, in determining whether there has been an abandonment of the tenets and doctrines of the organization, will look to the decisions of the constituted tribunals of the church having jurisdiction to decide differences as to teachings and doctrines, and will in no case undertake to revise the judgment of such tribunal so long as the question before it was one clearly within its jurisdiction; and interference will only be had when it is manifest that what the church tribunal has adjudicated is not a difference of opinion as to doctrine or teachings, but an attempt, in the form of such adjudication, to utterly abandon the purposes for which the church was organized.

3. SAME.

When property acquired by an ecclesiastical organization is devoted, by the express term of a gift, grant, or sale, to support any specific religious doctrine or belief, the civil courts, when necessary to protect the trust to which the property has been devoted, will inquire into the religious faith or practice of the parties claiming its use or control, and will see that it shall not be diverted from that trust. But if property is acquired in the ordinary way of purchase or gift, for the use of a religious society, the civil courts will only inquire as to who constituted that society, or its legitimate successors, and award to them the use of the property, but it will not, in case of a schism in the organization, inquire into the existing religious opinion of those who adhere to the acknowledged organization.

4. SAME.

The General Assembly of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church, under the constitution of that organization, has executive, legislative, and judicial authority. It is the highest court of the church, and also the highest authority in legislative and executive matters. When the provisions of the constitution in reference to the authority of the General Assembly are taken together with and in the light of the purposes for which the organization was formed and the history and antecedents of the organization itself, a reasonable construction of the terms of the constitution gives to the General Assembly authority to determine whether the teaching and doctrines and form of government of another organization are in accord with it, and, if so, to unite with such organization upon such terms and under such name as the judgment of the General Assembly shall dictate.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 42, Religious Societies, §§ 87–98.]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; J. T. Pendleton, Judge.

Action by R. R. Kime and others against George H. Mack and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants bring error. Reversed.

A brief historical statement as to the organization and progress of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church is appropriate and will be more or less helpful in the determination of the legal questions which will be hereafter discussed. The Cumberland Presbyterian Church was organized in Dickson county, Tenn., February 4, 1810. It was the outgrowth of the great revival of 1800—one of the most powerful revivals that this country has ever witnessed. The founders of the church were Finis Ewing, Samuel King, and Samuel McAdow. They were ministers in what is now commonly known as the Northern Presbyterian Church, but they rejected the doctrine of election and reprobation, as taught in the Westminster Confession of Faith. These three ministers, on the date above referred to, met in a log cabin and organized an independent presbytery, calling it the Cumberland Presbytery; and this was the beginning of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church. In three years the church had become sufficiently large to form three presbyteries, and these presbyteries, in 1813, met and constituted a synod. This synod, in a paper called the "Brief Statement," set forth the points wherein the Cumberland Presbyterian dissented from the Westminster Confession. They were as follows: "(1) That there are no eternal reprobates. (2) That Christ died, not for a part only, but for all mankind. (3) That all infants dying in infancy are saved through Christ and the sanctification of the Spirit. (4) That the spirit of God operates on the world, or as coextensively as Christ has made atonement, in such a manner as to leave all men inexcusable." In 1814 the synod revised the Westminster Confession of Faith in the particulars above referred to. Subsequently the General Assembly of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church was formed, and in 1829 this judicature made such changes in the form of government as were demanded by the formation of this court. Such, in brief, was the early history of this church.

It is to be noted that in its form of government it is patterned largely, if not altogether, after the form of government of the parent church. It asserted, in forcible and strong terms, the differences which existed between it and the parent church; but there seems to have been no substantial or material difference, in the form of government which they adopted, from that which the church from which they sprang was then using. The Cumberland Presbyterian Church grew in numbers and in influence, and especially in the state in which it was organized and adjacent states; but its territory was not limited to these. In 1906 it contained 17 synods, 114 presbyteries, and a total membership of nearly 200,000. As is true in nearly every case where there is a division on ecclesiastical teachings and a separation resulting therefrom, there were in this instance persons in both churches who seemed to be desirous of reconciling the differences and bringing together the two organizations upon such terms as would be consistent with the consciences of each side. How far back this desire for reunion may be traced is immaterial. In 1903 it took definite shape, and committees were appointed by the General Assemblies of the two churches to take into consideration the question of the reunion of the two bodies. This movement for reunion does not seem to have been limited merely to a reunion of the two branches of the Presbyterian Church involved in the present controversy, but was broader in its scope, and intended to accomplish, if practicable, the reunion and consolidation of the various ecclesiastical organizations in the United States that adhere to and teach the doctrines of what is commonly known as the "Presbyterian Church." The record discloses, in detail, the various steps that were taken by the General Assemblies of the two churches in reference to the union. This finally culminated in the report of the committee on union and reunion being adopted by the General Assembly at Decatur, Ill., in May, 1906. This report set forth the terms upon which the union was to be established. The result of the vote of the General Assembly of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church was as follows:

Ministers voting in the affirmative.....	85
Ruling elders voting in the affirmative....	78
Total affirmative vote.....	165
Ministers voting in the negative.....	50
Ruling elders voting in the negative.....	41
Total negative vote.....	91
Affirmative majority.....	74

The moderator then declared that the resolution adopting the report of the committee on fraternity and union had been carried, and that thereby the report of the committee on fraternity and union had been accepted, and in accordance with this report the General Assembly adjourned sine die, to meet thereafter only as a component part of the General Assembly of the Northern Presbyterian Church. It also appeared that prior to the action of the General Assembly the question of reunion had been submitted to the different presbyteries, and 111 presbyteries had expressed themselves; 60 of them voting approval, and 51 disapproval. It thus appears that a majority of the presbyteries and a majority of the commissioners in the General Assembly had declared in favor of the union. It is contended, however, by the dissenting members of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church that an analysis of the vote in the presbyteries will show that a majority of the individuals composing these presbyteries did not favor the reunion; that is, that while a majority of the presbyteries, as such, favored the union, the majority of the members composing the different presbyteries did not approve of the union. Before the adjournment of the General Assembly at Decatur those commissioners who were opposed to the union entered their protest against the adoption of the report of the committee; and after the General Assembly had adjourned without a date, to meet in subsequent years as a component part of the Northern Presbyterian Church, the dissenting members assembled themselves together and declared themselves to be the General Assembly of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church, and proceeded to exercise, as far as they could, the powers of such body. The case which we now have in hand is one of the numerous controversies which sprang up in the territory covered by the Cumberland Presbyterian Church, bringing in question the regularity of the alleged union between that church and the Northern Presbyterian Church.

Kime and others brought an equitable petition in behalf of the members of the First Cumberland Presbyterian Church of Atlanta, Ga., against Mack and others, who were alleged to have been members of that church, but who now claim and profess to be officers and members of the Presbyterian Church of the United States of America (hereinafter referred to, for convenience, as the "Northern Presbyterian Church"), and the Penn Mutual Life Insurance Company, alleging that the First Cumberland Presbyterian Church of Atlanta was an existing voluntary association of persons for the purpose of divine worship, etc., in harmony with the constitution, creed, etc., of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church, which had had its complete machinery for the administration of its affairs and property since its organization in 1810, and that the constitution and laws of said church did not authorize any person or body of persons to destroy its existence as a separate and distinct church, or to carry it over, as a body, with its property, into another organization; that the Northern Presbyterian Church is a separate and distinct church, having its peculiar constitution, creed, etc., as well as complete machinery for the administration of its af-fares; that one important difference between the two churches is that the white and black races are not brought together in the presbyteries, synods, and assemblies of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church, while in the Northern Presbyterian Church this is possible, and is optional with the negro Presbyterian churches; that the First Cumberland Presbyterian Church of Atlanta owns certain described real property; that Kime and others are trustees of the Atlanta church, and custodians of the title of the property owned by it, and as such they have made a loan deed to property owned by it to secure an indebtedness of $5,000, evidenced by notes payable to the Penn Mutual Life Insurance Company, and $4,000 of said indebtedness is still unpaid; that it has other outstanding obligations to the extent of $2,200 or more; that Mack has been pastor of the church, and still occupies the pulpit and exercises the functions of pastor thereof, but not as a Cumberland Presbyterian minister, but as a minister of the Northern Presbyterian Church, of which he claims to be a member; that certain named parties are elders, and the only elders, of the Atlanta church, and that other named parties who were elders are still using the property and assuming to act in an official capacity, but not as elders of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church, but as elders of the Northern Presbyterian Church; that the defendants, and the class whom they represent, were formerly members of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church, and have been for a long time advocating the destruction of that church and its union with the Northern Presbyterian Church, by virtue of which the Cumberland Presbyterian Church, with all its membership and property, would pass out of existence; that since May 24, 1906, they have been declaring that they are no longer members of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church but members of the Northern Presbyterian Church, and that the Cumberland Presbyterian Church has passed out of existence and its property has passed into the Northern Presbyterian Church; that the said defendants are interfering with the plaintiffs and other loyal members of the Atlanta church in their efforts to worship in the building and the performance of other duties, and are preventing plaintiffs from so worshiping, and are usurping the rights of the members of the First Cumberland Presbyterian Church by holding all religious and business meetings of the said congregation as meetings of the Northern Presbyterian Church; that the defendants are attempting and threatening to proceed to have the property of the said First Cumberland Presbyterian Church transferred and assigned to the Northern Presbyterian Church; that the membership of the Atlanta church has heretofore numbered about 100, but since May 24, 1906, 40 thereof, including the defendants, profess to have become members of the Northern Presbyterian Church, and about 40, including petitioners, still remain loyal members of the First Cumberland Church of Atlanta, and will not consent to any union with the Northern Presbyterian Church, because they cannot conscientiously do so, nor to the transfer of any property, and that the remainder of the membership have either withdrawn or remain indifferent to the results flowing from the alleged union; that the conduct of the defendants has greatly damaged the usefulness of the church and impaired its financial resources; that the rights of the creditors are also seriously affected; that the property of the Atlanta church was donated and acquired by it for specific purposes and trusts, to be carried out under the constitution of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church, and the transfer of the same to the Northern Presbyterian Church would be a diversion of church funds; that subscriptions were made and collected upon the faith that the church was to continue as the Cumberland Presbyterian Church. The prayers of the petition were that the defendants be enjoined from transferring the property of the Atlanta church, or any part thereof, to the Northern Presbyterian Church, and from interfering with the use and control of the property by the members of the Atlanta church, or in any manner changing the present status of the property and title, and from using, in the name of the Northern Presbyterian Church, the property of the Atlanta church, except by permission of that church. Upon this petition being presented to the judge, he granted a restraining order and set the case down for a hearing.

The defendants filed an answer, to which they attached numerous exhibits, from which appear the history of the organization of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church and the differences between the teachings and doctrines of that church and the Northern Presbyterian Church, and also the various efforts which had been made from time to time to reconcile the differences between these two branches of the Presbyterian Church, and in which are set forth in detail the different steps that had been taken by the two branches of the church looking to a reconciliation of the differences between the two and a union of the same, and also the various preliminary actions by the different bodies of the two churches which finally culminated, in 1906, in the union of the two branches of the church. At the hearing the evidence was voluminous, all bearing upon the issues which were set forth in the pleadings. The judge granted an injunction as prayed for, his order stating: "The union between the Presbyterian Church of the United States of America and the Cumberland Church was null and void. The action of the General Assembly of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church seeking to effect such union was without constitutional authority and in conflict with the express provisions of their constitution." To the judgment granting the injunction the defendants excepted.

The following parts of the constitution of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church were in evidence:

Church Courts.

"(24) It is necessary that the government of the church be exercised under some certain and definite form, and by various courts, in regular gradation. These courts are denominated Church Sessions, Presbyteries, Synods, and the General Assembly.

"(25) The Church Session exercises jurisdiction over a single church; the Presbytery over what is common to the ministers, Church Sessions, and Churches within a prescribed district; the Synod over what belongs in common to three or more Presbyteries, and their ministers, Church Sessions, and Churches; and the General Assembly over such matters as concern the whole church; and the jurisdiction of these courts is limited by the express provisions of the constitution. Every court has the right to resolve questions of doctrine and discipline seriously and reasonably proposed, and in general to maintain truth and righteousness, condemning erroneous opinions and practices which tend to the injury of the peace, purity, or progress of the church; and, although each court exercises exclusive original jurisdiction over all matters specially belonging to it, the lower courts are subject to the review and control of the higher courts, in regular gradation."

"(27) The Church Session is charged with maintaining the spiritual government of the church, for which purpose it is its duty to inquire into the doctrines and conduct of the church members under its care; to receive members into the church; to admonish, suspend, or excommunicate those found delinquent, subject to appeal; to urge upon parents the importance of presenting their children for baptism; to grant letters of dismission, which, when given to parents, should always include the names of their baptized children; to ordain and install ruling elders and deacons when elected, and to require those officers to devote themselves to their work; to examine the records of the proceedings of the deacons; to establish and control Sabbath schools and Bible classes, with especial reference to the children of the church; to order collection for pious uses and church purposes; to take the oversight of the singing in the public worship of God; to assemble the people for worship when there is no minister; to concert the best measures for promoting the spiritual interests of the church; to observe and carry out the injunctions of the higher courts; and to appoint representatives to the higher courts, and require on their return a report of their diligence."

"(31) The Presbytery has the power to examine and decide appeals, complaints, and references brought before it in an orderly manner; to receive, examine, dismiss, and license candidates for the holy ministry; to receive, dismiss, ordain, install, remove, and judge ministers; to review the records of the Church Sessions, redress whatever they may have done contrary to order, and take effectual care that they observe the government of the church; to establish the pastoral relation, and to dissolve it, at the request of one or both of the parties, or where the interests of religion imperatively demand it; to set apart evangelists to their proper work; to require ministers to devote themselves diligently to their sacred calling, and to censure and otherwise discipline the delinquent; to see that the injunctions of the higher courts are obeyed; to condemn erroneous opinions which injure the purity or peace of the church; to resolve questions of doctrine and discipline seriously and reasonably proposed; to visit particular churches, to inquire into their conditions, and redress the evils that may have arisen in them; to unite or divide churches with the consent of a majority of the members thereof, and, for cause, to dissolve the relations between it and a particular church, which shall thereafter cease to be a constituent of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church, and forfeit all rights as such; to form and receive new churches; to take special oversight of vacant churches; to concert measures for the enlargement of the church within its bounds; in general, to order whatever pertains to the spiritual welfare of the churches under its care; to appoint representatives to the higher courts; and, finally, to propose to the Synod, or to the General Assembly, such measures as may be of common advantage to the church at large."

"(37) The Synod has power to receive and decide all appeals, complaints, and references regularly brought up from the Presbyteries; to review the records of the Presbyteries, and to redress whatever they may have done contrary to order; to take effectual care that Presbyteries observe the government of the church, and that they obey the injunctions of the higher courts; to create, divide, or dissolve Presbyteries, when deemed expedient; to appoint ministers to such work, proper to their office, as may fall under its own particular jurisdiction in general; to take such order with respect to the Presbyteries, Church Sessions, and Churches under its care as may be in conformity with the principles of the government of the church and of the word of God, and as may tend to promote the edification of the church; to concert measures for promoting the prosperity and enlargement of the church within its bounds; and, finally, to propose to the General Assembly such measures as may be of common advantage to the whole church."

"(40) The General Assembly is the highest court of this church, and represents in one body all the particular churches thereof. It bears the title of the 'General Assembly of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church,' and constitutes the bond of union, peace, correspondence, and mutual confidence among all its churches and courts."

"(43) The General Assembly shall have power to receive and decide all appeals, references, and complaints regularly brought before it from the inferior courts; to bear testimony against error in doctrine and immorality in practice, injuriously affecting the church; to decide in all controversies respecting doctrine and discipline; to give its advice and instruction, in conformity with the government of the church, in all cases submitted to it; to review the records of the synods; to take care that the inferior courts observe the government of the church; to redress whatever they may have done contrary to order; to concert measures for promoting the prosperity and enlargement of the church; to create, divide, or dissolve Synods; to institute and superintend the agencies necessary in the general work of the church; to appoint ministers to such labors as fall under its jurisdiction; to suppress schismatical and other disputations according to the rules provided therefor; to receive under its jurisdiction other ecclesiastical bodies whose organization is conformed to the doctrine and order of this church; to authorize Synods and Presbyteries to exercise similar power in receiving bodies suited to become constituents of those courts and lying within their geographical bounds respectively; to superintend the affairs of the whole church; to correspond with other churches; and, in general, to recommend measures for the promotion of charity, truth, and holiness throughout all the churches under its care."

"(60) Upon the recommendation of the General Assembly, at a stated meeting, by a two-thirds vote of the members thereof voting thereon, the confessions of faith, catechism, constitution, and rules of discipline may be amended or changed when a majority of the Presbyteries, upon the same being transmitted for their action, shall approve thereof. The other parts of the government—that is to say, the general regulations, the directory for worship, and the rules of order—may be amended or changed at any meeting of the General Assembly by a vote of two-thirds of the entire number of commissioners enrolled at that meeting, provided such amendment or change shall not conflict, in letter or spirit, with the Confession of Faith, Catechism, or constitution."

The defendants in error contend that the teachings of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church are radically different, which they claim appears when the teachings and doctrines of the two churches are placed side by side, as they are in the parallel columns which follow:

Presbyterian Church in the United States of America.

Confessions of Faith.

Chapter III.

Of God's Eternal Decree.

III. By the decree of God, for the manifestation of his glory, some men and angels are predestined unto everlasting life, and others foreordained to everlasting death.

IV. These angels and men, thus predestined and foreordained, are particularly and unchangeably designed; and their number is so certain and definite that it cannot be either increased or diminished.

V. Those of mankind that are predestined unto life, God, before the foundation of the world was laid, according to his eternal and immutable purpose and the secret counsel and good pleasure of his will, hath chosen in Christ unto everlasting glory out of his mere free grace and love, without any foresight of faith or good works, or perseverance in either of them, or any other thing in the creature, as conditions or causes moving Him thereunto; and all to the praise of his glorious grace.

VI. As God hath appointed the elect unto glory, so hath He, by the eternal and most free purpose of His will, foreordained all the means thereunto. Wherefore they who are elected, being fallen in Adam, are redeemed by Christ, are effectually called unto faith in Christ by His spirit working in due season, are justified, adopted, sanctified and kept by His power through faith unto salvation. Neither are any other redeemed by Christ, effectually called, adopted, justified, sanctified and saved, but the elect only.

VII. The rest of mankind, God was pleased, according to the unsearchable counsel of His own will, whereby He extendeth or withholdeth mercy as He pleaseth, for the glory of His sovereign power over His creatures to pass by, and to ordain them to dishonor and wrath for their sin, to the praise of His glorious justice.

The Larger Catechism.

Q. 12. What are the decrees of God?

A. God's decrees are the wise, free and holy acts of the counsel of His will, whereby from all eternity He hath, for His own glory, unchangeably foreordained whatsoever comes to pass in time, especially concerning angels and men.

Q. 13. What hath God

Cumberland Presbyterian Church.

Confession of Faith.

Decrees of God.

8. God, for the manifestation of His glory and goodness, by the most wise and holy counsel of His own will, freely and unchangeably ordained or determined what He himself would do, what He would require His intelligent creatures to do, and what should be the awards respectively of the obedient and the disobedient.

9. Though all divine decrees may not be revealed to men, yet it is certain that God has decreed nothing contrary to His revealed will or written Word.

Free Will.

24. God, in creating man in his own likeness, endued him with intelligence, sensibility and will, which form the basis of moral character, and render man capable of moral government.

25. The freedom of the will is a fact of human consciousness, and is the sole ground of human accountability. Man, in his estate of innocence, was both free and able to keep the Divine law, also to violate it. Without any constraint, from either physical or moral causes, he did violate it.

especially decreed concerning angels and men?

A. God, by an eternal and immutable decree, out of His mere love for the prayers of His glorious grace, to be manifested in due time, hath elected some angels to glory; and in Christ hath chosen some men to eternal life, and the means thereof; and also according to His sovereign power, and the unsearchable counsel of his own will (whereby He extendeth or withholdeth favor as He pleaseth), hath passed by and foreordained the rest to dishonor and wrath, to be for their sin inflicted, to the praise of the glory of His Justice.

The Shorter Catechism.

Q. 7. What are the decrees of God?

A. The decrees of God are His eternal purpose according to the counsel of His will, whereby, for his own glory, He hath foreordained whatsoever comes to pass.

Chapter X.

Of Effectual Calling.

I. All those whom God hath predestined unto life, and those only, He is pleased in his appointment and accepted time effectually to call by His word and Spirit out of that state of sin and death, in which they are by nature, to grace and salvation by Jesus Christ; enlightening their minds spiritually and savingly to understand the things of God; taking away their heart of stone, and giving unto them a heart of flesh; renewing their wills, and by his almighty power determining them to that which is good; and effectually drawing them to Jesus Christ, yet so as they come most freely, being made willing by His grace.

II. This effectual call is of God's free and special grace alone, not from anything at all foreseen in man, who is altogether passive therein, until, being quickened and renewed by the Holy Spirit, he is thereby enabled to answer this call, and to embrace the grace offered and conveyed in it.

III. Elect infants, dying in infancy, are regenerated and saved by Christ through the spirit, who worketh when, and where, and how he pleaseth. So also are all elect persons, who are incapable of being outwardly called by the ministry of the Word.

IV. Others, not elected, although they may be called by the ministry of the Word, and may have some common operations of the Spirit, yet they never truly come to Christ, and therefore cannot be saved. . . .

Catechism.

Q. 7. What are the decrees of God?

The decrees of God are His wise and holy purposes to do what shall be for His own glory. Sin not being for His glory, therefore, He has not decreed it.

Divine Influence.

23. God, the Father, having set forth His Son, Jesus Christ, as a propitiation for the sins of the world, does most graciously vouchsafe a manifestation of the Holy Spirit with the same intent to every man.

Regeneration.

31. Those who believe in the Lord Jesus Christ are regenerated or born from above, renewed in spirit, and made new creatures in Christ.

34. All infants dying in infancy, and all persons who have never had the faculty of reason, are regenerated and saved.

The Larger Catechism.

Q. 67. What is the effectual calling?

A. Effectual calling is the work of God's almighty power and grace, whereby (out of his free and especial love to his elect, and from nothing in them moving him thereunto) He doth in his accepted time invite and draw them to Jesus Christ, by His Word and Spirit, savingly enlightening their minds, renewing and powerfully determining their wills, so as they (although in themselves dead in sin) are hereby made willing and able freely to answer His call, and to accept and embrace the grace offered and conveyed therein.

Q. 68. Are the elect only effectually called?

A. All the elect, and they only, are effectually called, although others may be and often are outwardly called by the ministry of the Word, and have some common operation of the Spirit, who, for their willful neglect and contempt of the grace offered to them, being justly left in their unbelief, do never truly come to Jesus Christ.

The Shorter Catechism.

Q. 19. What is the misery of that estate wherein man fell?

A. All mankind, by their fall, lost communion with God, are under His wrath and curse, and so made liable to all the miseries of this life, to death itself, and to the pains of hell forever.

Q. 20. Did God leave all mankind to perish in the estate of sin and misery?

A. God, having out of his mere good pleasure from all eternity elected some to everlasting life, did enter into a covenant of grace to deliver them out of the estate of sin and misery, and to bring them into an estate of salvation by a Redeemer.

Q. 21. Who is the Redeemer of God's elect?

A. The only Redeemer of God's elect is the Lord Jesus Christ, who, being the eternal Son of God, became man, and was so, and continueth to be God and man, in two distinct natures and one person forever.

Chapter XI.

Of Justification.

I. Those whom God effectually calleth He also justifieth. . . .

IV. God did, from all eternity, decree to justify all the elect; and Christ did in the fullness of time die for their sin, and rise again for their justification; nevertheless they are not justified until the Holy Spirit

Catechism.

21. What are the evils of that estate into which mankind fell?

Mankind, in consequence of the fall, have no communion with God, discern not spiritual things, prefer sin to holiness, suffer from the fear of death and remorse of conscience, and from the apprehension of future punishment.

22. Did God leave mankind to perish in this estate?

No; God out of his mere good pleasure and love did provide salvation for all mankind.

23. How did God provide salvation for mankind?

By giving His Son, who became man, and so was and continues to be both God and man in one person, to be a propitiation for the sins of the world.

Justification.

43. All those who truly repent of their sins, and in faith commit themselves to Christ, God freely justifies. . . .

both in due time actually apply Christ unto them.

Chapter XIII.

Of Sanctification.

I. They who are effectually called and regenerated, having a new heart and a new spirit created in them, are further sanctified, really and personally, through the virtue of Christ's death and resurrection, by His Word and Spirit dwelling in them.

The Larger Catechism.

Q. 76. What is sanctification?

A. Sanctification is a work of God's grace, whereby they whom God hath before the foundation of the world chosen to be holy are in time, through the powerful operation of his spirit, applying the death and resurrection of Christ unto them, renewed in their whole man after the image of God. . . .

Chapter XIV.

Of Saving Faith.

I. The grace of faith, whereby the elect are enabled to believe to the saving of their souls, is the work of the spirit of Christ in their hearts, and is ordinarily wrought by the ministry of the Word, by which also, and by the administration of the Sacraments and prayer, it is increased and strengthened.

Saving Faith.

45. Saving faith, including assent to the truth of God's Holy Word, is the act of receiving and resting upon Christ alone for salvation, and is accompanied by contrition for sin and a full purpose of heart to turn from it and live unto God.

Chapter XVII.

Of The Perseverance Of The Saints.

I. They whom God hath accepted in his beloved, effectually called and sanctified by the Spirit, can neither totally nor finally fall away from the state of grace, but shall certainly persevere therein to the end, and be eternally saved.

II. This perseverance of the saints depends not upon their own free will, but upon the immutability of the decree of election, flowing from the free and unchangeable love of God the Father, upon the efficacy of the merit and intercession of Jesus Christ, the abiding of the Spirit of the seed of God within them, and the nature of the covenant of grace, from all which ariseth also the certainty and infallibility thereof.

Preservation and Believers.

60. Those whom God hath justified he will also glorify. Consequently the truly regenerated soul will not totally fall away from a state of grace, but will be preserved to everlasting life.

61. The preservation of believers depends on the unchangeable love and power of God, the merits, advocacy, and intercession of Jesus Christ, the abiding of Holy Spirit and seed of God within them, and the nature of the covenant of grace. . . .

COBB, P. J. (after stating the facts). 1. The present case presents one of those controversies which have, unfortunately, in the past often found their way into the civil courts of this country. The courts of this state have been remarkably free from cases originating in schism in a religious body. Numerous cases appear in the briefs of counsel, from different courts of this country, as well as some in the English and Scottish courts, involving controversies growing out of differences of opinion between parties and factions in ecclesiastical organizations. On account of the union between the church and the government in England, the decisions of the civil courts of that country cannot be implicitly followed by the courts of this country, where the civil authorities have no right to interfere in matters peculiarly ecclesiastical. The first amendment to the Constitution of the United States denies to Congress the power to make any law respecting the establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof. Civ. Code 1895, § 6014. That instrument contains no limitation on the powers of the states in this particular, but every state in the Union has in its Constitution a provision denying to the civil authorities the right to control or interfere in any way in matters purely ecclesiastical. The people of no state in the Union, as a political entity, have any creed or religion. The people of the United States, as a political entity, have no creed or religion. Each individual within the jurisdiction of the United States, whether he be within the limits of a state or elsewhere, has a right to determine for himself all of those questions which relate to his relation to the Creator of the universe. No civil authority can coerce him to accept any religious doctrine or teaching, or restrain him from associating himself with any class or organization which promulgates religious teachings. Whether he shall adopt any religious views, or, if so, what shall be the character of those views, and the persons with whom he shall associate in carrying out the particular views, are all questions addressed to his individual conscience, which no human authority has the right, even in the slightest way, to interfere with, so long as his practices in carrying out his peculiar views are not inconsistent with the peace and good order of society. We have confined our investigations in this case almost entirely to the decisions of the courts of this country, for the reasons above referred to.

When an individual becomes a member of a religious organization, his uniting with it is his voluntary act, and he becomes bound by the rules and usages of the organization. A religious association usually adopts a constitution, by laws, and form of government. A member, when he enters the organization, voluntarily assumes the duty of obeying the laws of the association. As to all matters purely ecclesiastical he is bound by the decisions of the tribunal fixed by the organization to which he belongs, as an arbiter to determine the disputed questions relating to matters peculiarly within the province of the organization. In attempting to carry out the purpose for which religious associations are formed it becomes necessary, in almost every instance, for the organization to hold and own property. The members of the organization therefore become interested in the property so owned. Differences may arise which bring about disputes as to what interest a members or class of members of an organization may have in this property. Rights of property are as peculiarly within the jurisdiction of the civil courts of the land as purely religious rights are within the jurisdiction of the ecclesiastical tribunals of a religious organization. How far the civil courts will interfere in the affairs of a religious body, where property rights are involved, is a question which has been addressed to many courts of this country. Often the controversy as to the right of property grows out of a controversy as to creed, doctrine, or teaching. While all of the rulings of the American courts cannot be said to be entirely uniform, the great weight of authority is to the effect that if a religious organization has, under its form of government, a tribunal constituted with jurisdiction to decide differences between its members as to creed, teaching, or doctrine, the civil courts will not undertake to review or revise the judgment of the church tribunal in reference to such matters. The cases which support this ruling seem to be founded upon sound reasoning, when we take into consideration the constitutional provisions which deny to Congress and the law-making powers of the different states the right to interfere in matters purely ecclesiastical. In some cases it has been said that the decisions of the church tribunals are persuasive, and not to be departed from by the civil courts, except where the decisions are clearly wrong. But the sounder rule is that laid down in those cases in which it is held that, if the matter relates to creed, doctrine, or teaching, the judgment of the constituted church tribunal is absolutely conclusive upon the civil courts, whether, in the opinion of the judge of such courts, the decision appears to be right or wrong. Where a right of property turns upon such a decision the civil courts will allow the property to go in that direction in which the decision of the church tribunal carries it. One of the leading cases on the subject in this country is Watson v. Jones, 13 Wall. (U. S.) 679, 20 L. Ed. 686. It was there held that in a case where the right of property asserted in the civil courts is dependent upon a question of doctrine, discipline, ecclesiastical law, rule, custom, or church government, and that question has been decided by the highest tribunal within the organization to which it has been carried, the civil courts will accept that decision as conclusive, and be governed by it in its application to the case before it. In the opinion Mr. Justice Miller says: "It is not to be supposed that the judges of the civil courts can be as competent in the ecclesiastical law and religious faith of all these bodies as the ablest men are in reference to their own. It would therefore be an appeal from the more learned tribunal in law, which should decide the case, to the one which is less so." Page 729 of 13 Wall. (20 L. Ed. 686). See, also, 7 Rose's Notes, 769; Brundage v. Deardorf, 92 Fed. 214, 34 C. C. A. 304; Schweiker v. Husser, 146 Ill. 399, 34 N. E. 1022; Lamb v. Cain, 14 L. R. A. 518, 129 Ind. 486, 29 N. E. 13; Watson v. Avery, 65 Ky. 332; Trustees of Trinity M. E. Church of Norwich v. Harris, 73 Conn. 216, 47 Atl. 116, 50 L. R. A. 636; White Lick Quarterly Meeting of Friends, by Hadley et al., Trustees, v. White Lick Quarterly Meeting of Friends, by Mendenhall et al., Trustees, 89 Ind. 136.

2. The constituted tribunal of the religious organization has jurisdiction to determine all ecclesiastical questions which are submitted to it under the law and usages of the society. It has also the authority to determine for itself whether it has jurisdiction in a given case. The highest church court of a religious society is like the highest civil court. It has submitted to it not only questions growing out of controversies, but it has, of necessity, imposed upon it the duty and responsibility of determining what are within the limits of its jurisdiction. In the case of Watson v. Harris, 45 Mo. 183, it was held that the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church, commonly known as "Old School," possessed extensive original and appellate jurisdiction, and whether a case is regularly or irregularly before it is a subject for it to determine for itself. In the opinion Judge Wagner says (page 197): "Now, the General Assembly is the highest court or judicatory known to the Presbyterian Church. It possesses extensive original and appellate jurisdiction; and whether the case, in the matter of the Declaration and Testimony signers, was regularly or irregularly before it, was a subject for it to determine for itself, and no civil courts can revise, modify, or impair its action in a matter of purely ecclesiastical concern." When a controversy involving the rights of a member is presented to the civil courts, they will examine into the constitution and laws of the religious society, to determine whether a tribunal has been erected for the decision of ecclesiastical questions, and they will also examine into the laws of the association, to determine whether the decision by the tribunal was concerning a matter which was within its jurisdiction. If its jurisdiction depends upon the construction of its own laws, and such laws have, either expressly or impliedly, conferred upon it the right to determine the limits of its jurisdiction, the decision of the church tribunal as to its jurisdiction will be no less binding than its decision on the merits of the ecclesiastical question determined by it. However, if it develops, from an examination of the constitution, laws, and usages of the church, that the judgment is beyond the jurisdiction of the church tribunal, and so manifestly beyond it that there can be no difference of opinion as to this fact, the civil courts will interfere to protect the members in their rights of property, involved in such a lawless and revolutionary action by the ecclesiastical organization. Where it is manifest that the church court has decided a question which, under no reasonable construction of the rules of the church, could be within the jurisdiction of the tribunal, the civil courts will recognize, as the true church, those members who adhere to the tenets and doctrines of the organization, and who are adhering to the rules of the church and living under the form of government prescribed by its constitution, and cause the property to follow the line as recognized by this class. So long as church tribunals merely decide questions which arise from time to time in regard to the teachings, doctrines, or government of the church, connected with the purposes for which it was organized, the civil courts, even though rights of property are involved, will not interfere. But whenever a majority in those organizations in which a majority of the members ordinarily control, or where the highest courts in those organizations which provide for various courts to determine these questions, take such steps as to clearly indicate an abandonment of the original scheme and purpose of the organization, and use it for ends which were not expressly contemplated, and under no reasonable construction of the rules could ever have been contemplated, those who are faithful to the original purposes of the organization are to be treated as the true church and the owners of the property committed to it for the promulgation of its teachings and doctrines. In Mt. Zion Baptist Church v. Whitmore, 83 Iowa, 138, 49 N. W. 81, 13 L. R. A. 198, it was held that the majority of the members of a Baptist church, although it was independent in government, have no power to divert the church property to the propagation of doctrines contrary to Baptist articles of faith and church covenants, and on attempting to do so they may be enjoined from interfering with the proper use and control of the property by the minority. It was also held, in that case, that the decision of a Baptist council, on the joint call of both factions of a Baptist church, which agree to accept it as final, that the doctrines taught by the majority faction are not in harmony with the teachings of the denomination, is conclusive, and may be adopted by a court as the basis of its action in giving the control of the church property to the other faction. In Christian Church of Sand Creek v. Church of Christ of Sand Creek, 219 Ill. 503, 76 N. E. 703, the ruling was that, where members of a religious congregation divide and a new organization is formed by the withdrawing faction, the title to property of the congregation remains in the part of the congregation which adheres to the tenets and doctrines originally taught by the congregation to whose use the property was originally dedicated. There was also a ruling to the effect that where members of a seceding faction of a congregation form a new organization, and teach and practice innovations not recognized or taught by the original congregation, they abandon their interest in the property belonging to the original congregation at the time of the division. See, also, Smith v. Pedigo, 19 L. R. A. 433, 32 L. R. A. 838, 145 Ind. 361, 33 N. E. 777, 44 N. E. 363; Ferraria v. Vasconcellos, 31 Ill. 25; Hale v. Everett, 53 N. H. 9, 16 Am. Rep. 82; Schnorr's Appeal, 67 Pa. 138, 5 Am. Rep. 415; Appeal of Ramsey, 88 Pa. 60; Bear v. Heasley, 98 Mich. 279, 57 N. W. 270, 24 L. R. A. 615.

The principle at the foundation of all these rulings, as well as a great many others along the same line that might be cited, is that property which is devoted to the purposes of a given religious organization must be used for the purpose to which it is devoted, and that where the controlling authority of the organization (whether it be a majority of the congregation of those churches having a congregational form of government or the highest court of a church in those churches which have different tribunals, with appeals from one to the other) engages in a palpable attempt to divert the property to a purpose utterly variant from that to which it was originally devoted, the civil courts will interfere, even at the instance of a minority, in cases where the form of church government is congregational, or at the instance of the dissenters, without regard to number, where the form of government is other than congregational, and protect them in their property rights against those who, without authority, are attempting to carry the property along lines that are utterly variant from the purpose for which the organization was formed. But in all cases of this character it must appear that the governing authorities of the church have abandoned the tenets and doctrines of the original organization. Whether they have so abandoned them is an ecclesiastical question; and if, under the form of government of the church, there is a tribunal of any character erected for the decision of these questions, the civil courts will not undertake to revise or review the judgment of this tribunal, provided the question is of such a character that it would admit of dispute, and would therefore be proper for decision by the ecclesiastical tribunal. So long as the case rests upon debatable ground, as to whether there has been an abandonment of the purpose of the original organization, the courts will allow the judgment of the church tribunal to stand without question: but where, in a given case, the facts are such that there can be no question that there has been a complete abandonment, and as a result the property will be diverted to purposes never contemplated by the original organization, the civil courts will interfere at the instance of those who adhere to the teachings of the original association. If property is acquired by a Baptist church, which, at the time of its organization, is teaching the doctrines of the Baptist faith as it is ordinarily understood, and thereafter a majority of the congregation should determine to dissolve the organization and unite with an ecclesiastical body which was teaching doctrines utterly antagonistic to what are commonly understood as the doctrines of the Baptist Church, the civil courts would protect the minority, who adhere to the doctrines of the original organization, in their right to hold the property, even though such minority consisted of only one person. But if the question should arise in a Baptist congregation as to what is the doctrine of the Baptist Church, and the differences should be such as it was manifest that there could be, in the light of the history of the particular church and other churches of similar faith, doubt as to what was the true rule to be followed by a Baptist church, and the church tribunal, constituted according to the customs and usages of Baptist Churches, should decide these differences, the civil courts would not attempt to interfere with the judgment of this tribunal determining the doctrinal differences between the members of the congregation.

There is a radical difference between an abandonment of all the teachings and doctrines of a church and a mere difference of opinion among the members of an organization as to what are the true doctrines and teachings of the organization. There may be cases where the entire abandonment will be attempted, and such intention would be clear and palpable. But the cases which are most apt to arise are those which are upon the border line, when it is hard to determine, in the particular case, whether the action of the constituted authorities of the church is an abandonment of its original teachings, or merely a judicial determination as to what are the true teachings of the church. The fact that there are cases lying so near to this border line is the reason that there are apparently conflicting decisions by the courts in this country as to when it is proper for the civil courts to interfere in the affairs of an ecclesiastical organization. It is true, in this class of cases, as it is in every case arising under the law, that the civil courts have generally laid down the correct rule that they will not interfere with the affairs of an ecclesiastical organization, where the rights of property are involved, unless there has been a palpable attempt by the governmental authorities of the church to abandon altogether the teachings of the original organization. But there are cases where this rule has been, as to the facts of the particular controversy, wrongly applied. If the members of a church abandon the tenets of the church, they lose their interest in the property of the church. If they adhere to the doctrines of the church, but abandon the organization, they also lose their interest in the property of the church. This latter proposition is, in effect, the ruling in the case of Godfrey v. Walker, 42 Ga. 562. In that case the property was conveyed to trustees, for the use of the colored members of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, within the jurisdiction of the General Conference of that church, and a large portion of the congregation severed their connection with this church and united with the African Methodist Episcopal Church; and it was held that they thereby lost all their interest in the property, and it became subject to the control of the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, and did not become the property of the African Methodist Episcopal Church.

The Code declares: "A majority of those who adhere to its organization and doctrines represent the church. The withdrawal by one part of a congregation from the original body, or uniting with another church or denomination, is a relinquishment of all rights in the church abandoned." Civ. Code 1895, § 2360. It will be noted that this section is a mere codification of the ruling made in Bates v. Houston, 66 Ga. 198. That case involved a controversy arising in a Baptist church which had a congregational form of government. The rule laid down there is the one which is laid down by all the courts, and which is the one above referred to, that the abandonment of the teachings of the church by members of the organization will cause them to lose their interest in the property of the original organization which was set apart for the promulgation of certain teachings. No question as to the effect of the ruling of ecclesiastical tribunals in reference to mere difference as to what were the doctrines of the church was involved in that case. But another general rule, recognized by all of the courts, was also laid down in that case, which is embodied in Civ. Code 1895, § 2362, in the following language: "Courts are reluctant to interpose in questions affecting the management of the temporalities of a church; but when property is devoted to a specific doctrine or purpose, the courts will prevent it from being diverted from the trust." The case of Harris v. Brown, 124 Ga. 310, 52 S. E. 610, 2 L. R. A. (N. S.) 828, did not involve any of the questions now before us, and the section of the Code last cited was simply mentioned to emphasize the rule therein laid down.

8. When an ecclesiastical organization acquires property by deed, or will, or other instrument, and the instrument in express terms provides that the property shall be devoted to the teaching, support, and spread of some specific form of doctrine or belief, the civil courts have authority to interfere in the affairs of the organization for the purpose of preventing a diversion of the property from the uses to which it was, by the instrument, devoted. This rule is laid down and recognized by Mr. Justice Miller in the case of Watson v. Jones, supra. See, also, First Baptist Church of Paris v. Fort, 93 Tex. 215, 54 S. W. 892, 49 L. R. A. 617. But where property is acquired by an ecclesiastical organization, and there is nothing in the instrument under which the title passes to the organization, or to trustees in its behalf, which imposes a limitation upon the uses to which the property shall be devoted, it is to be presumed that it was the intention of the donor that the property was to be devoted to religious purposes, and in such manner and in such way as the governing body of the organization, whatever it may be, shall, under its constitution and rules, determine, and so long as any existing religious organization can be ascertained to be that organization, or its regular legitimate successor, it is entitled to the use of the property. See Baptist Church v. Fort, supra. In case of a schism in such an organization, no inquiry will be had into the existing religious opinions of those who comprise the legal and regular organization. The proper inquiry is: Which of the two factions constitute the church? And those who adhere to the acknowledged organization are entitled to the use of the property, whether adhering or not to the doctrines originally professed. Watson v. Jones, supra; Baptist Church v. Fort, supra.

4. The instrument under which the Cumberland Presbyterian Church of Atlanta acquired title, through its trustees, to the property in controversy, does not in express terms provide that the property shall be used for the promotion of any particular teaching or doctrine. The trustees hold the title for the benefit of the ecclesiastical organization known as the "Cumberland Presbyterian Church," of which the Atlanta church was a component part. Hence there is nothing in the present case which authorizes the interference of the civil courts upon the ground that there has been a diversion of a trust fund on account of a violation of the terms of the instrument creating the trust. The title to the property was acquired in the ordinary way, by gift or purchase, without limitation, except that it was to be used for religious purposes, and the religious purposes are those of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church. The only question to be determined, therefore, is whether, under the form of government of the Presbyterian Church, the property of the Atlanta church can be transferred to the Northern Presbyterian Church. In determining this question inquiry must be had into the constitution and rules of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church. If, under the form of government of the church, the governmental authorities have a right to make this transfer, the civil courts will not interfere. If they have not, the right interference may be had at the instance of those who can be designated as the lawfully constituted authorities of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church. The controlling question, therefore, is whether, under the form of government as set forth in the constitution of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church, the governmental authorities of that body had the right to unite with the Northern Presbyterian Church. The constitution of the church creates certain church courts. It declares that the government of the church is to be exercised in some certain and definite form, and by various courts, in regular gradation. These courts are denominated "Church Sessions," "Presbyteries," "Synods," and the "General Assembly." The jurisdiction of each of these courts is defined in the constitution. The Church Session has jurisdiction of a single church; the Presbytery has jurisdiction over the Church Sessions, and jurisdiction within a prescribed district; the Synod has jurisdiction over three or more Presbyteries; and the General Assembly has jurisdiction over such matters as concern the whole church. Every court is declared to have the right to resolve questions of doctrine and discipline seriously and reasonably proposed; and although each court exercises exclusive and original jurisdiction over all matters especially belonging to it, the lower courts are subject to the review and control of the higher courts, in regular gradation. The General Assembly has jurisdiction to review and decide all references and complaints regularly brought before it from the inferior courts, and to decide all questions respecting doctrine and discipline, and "to receive under its jurisdiction other ecclesiastical bodies whose organization is conformed to the doctrine and order of this church." So far as any controversies in reference to doctrine are concerned, by the very terms of the constitution the General Assembly is made the highest court, and, of course, its judgment on the matter is final and conclusive. The General Assembly of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church, hence, has jurisdiction to determine whether the matter in controversy is within its jurisdiction, and also to determine the controversy itself.

On the question as to whether there should be a reunion of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church and the Northern Presbyterian Church, it was for the determination of the General Assembly as to whether these two organizations were in accord with each other as to doctrine and order. This question was determined by the General Assembly at Decatur, Ill., in 1906. That it was a question about which there could be honest differences of opinion is manifest; for these differences appear in the records of the proceedings prior to and at the time the judgment was rendered that there was no substantial difference between the two organizations in teachings and doctrines. There were members of the General Assembly of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church who not only took a contrary view, but entered their protest upon the minutes of the General Assembly, and who thereafter withdrew and organized themselves into a body which they styled the "True Cumberland Presbyterian Church." We will not undertake to determine whether this judgment of the General Assembly is correct. The constituted tribunal of the church has determined the question, and, whether determined rightly or wrongly, we, as a civil court, having no ecclesiastical jurisdiction whatever, will not attempt to revise the conclusions and findings of those who are learned in the ecclesiastical law. The General Assembly of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church have accepted the declaration of the Northern Presbyterian Church as to its interpretation of its confession of faith, and, when so accepted, it has determined that there is no substantial or reasonable difference between the teachings and doctrines of the two organizations. This question is therefore to be treated as settled forever by the judgment of the General Assembly of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church.

With this question settled, the other question arising is: Have the General Assembly of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church authority, under the constitution of the church, to provide for a reunion with the Northern Presbyterian Church? In Fussell v. Hall, a case decided on June 1, 1907, by the Appellate Court for the Third District of Illinois, the identical question with which we are now confronted was involved. The very act of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church which is now in controversy was involved in that case. In the opinion Ramsay, P. J., after referring to the authority of the General Assembly of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church, as indicated in the constitution, says: "The effect of such sections is to make the General Assembly, not only a legislative and administrative body, but one with judicial powers upon ecclesiastical questions as well. It represents, in one body, all the particular churches in the Cumberland Presbyterian Church organization, and constitutes one bond of union. Why is it not possible to promote the prosperity and enlargement of the church by uniting with another body that teaches a doctrine or faith identical with its own? If these two churches, in their confessions of faith and their religious teachings, are the same, then these interests may be promoted by uniting all those who preach, teach, and believe in and care for those interests, the same as can be done by individuals joining their interests in copartnerships or corporations. United action is productive of more good than divided action under the circumstances. The General Assembly has power to receive under its jurisdiction other ecclesiastical bodies of the same faith. This clause must be read with the clause that directs the taking of measures to promote and enlarge the church; and in our judgment the church is enlarged, and its prosperity made more sure, by receiving the support of a stronger sister church. If a smaller church can be received, surely affiliation and union can be made with a stronger sister church, if thereby the church, as a religious body, is prospered and enlarged." The learned judge then called attention to the fact that many such unions have been formed among the Presbyterian Church bodies upon the faith of the inherent or implied power to do so. In 1785 the synods of New York and Philadelphia took steps for the organization of the General Assembly, with a view to the union of all the Presbyterian bodies, and in 1789 resolved such synods into a General Assembly. In 1801, after having failed in efforts to unite with both the Reformed Dutch and Associated Reformed Churches, the General Assembly so organized agreed upon a plan of union with the General Assembly of Connecticut. This action seems to have been taken upon the faith of an inherent power so to act. It was from that organization, so formed, that the founders of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church in 1810 withdrew because of a doctrinal difference, and took such action that the organization of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church followed; and attention has already been called to the fact that the organization of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church closely followed, in its constitution, the form of government from which it withdrew. Many kindred unions have been formed in like manner, between similar bodies, not only in the United States, but in Canada as well, and upon no different authority. Among them may be mentioned the union of the Associated Reform Church with the Associate Church in 1858, forming the United Presbyterian Church; the Independent Presbyterian Church of the Carolinas with the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church South in 1863; the Old School Presbyterian Church with the New School in 1870; the Alabama Presbyteries of the Associate Reform Church with the Presbyterian Church South in 1867. Ramsay, P. J., after calling attention to the historical matters just referred to, concludes the discussion relating to the power of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church to unite with the Northern Presbyterian Church in the following language: "The General Assembly of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church, when once created, had the same implied power and authority in that church that its kindred assembly had in the Presbyterian Church of the United States of America. That such General Assemblies and like bodies have an implied power to unite with others of the same faith or teachings seems to be supported by the authorities and to spring from the very nature of the case."

The authority of the General Assembly of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church is derived from the constitution. This church, in its form of government, is like its predecessors. The form of government is not unlike the federal form of government under which we live. The General Assembly of the church is the highest legislative, executive, and judicial power of the church. It has, in these three capacities, all of the authority that is expressly conferred by the constitution, as well as that which is to be necessarily implied from any of the express powers therein granted or from the general design and purpose for which the organization was formed. It being settled by the judgment of the General Assembly, as the final arbiter of the church in all such matters, that there is no substantial difference between the teachings and doctrines of the two churches, the question as to whether it was expedient for the two churches to unite under one name and form of government was a matter addressed to the sound judgment of the General Assembly of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church itself. The very constitution contemplates union with the other churches. It is authorized to receive into its jurisdiction other ecclesiastical bodies and organizations that conform to the doctrine and order of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church. When this provision was inserted in the constitution, it was probably contemplated that such organizations would generally be organizations of less power and less strength and less numbers than the existing Cumberland Presbyterian Church; but there is no limitation in the constitution upon the power to receive other organizations, and this power carries with it the implied power to unite with other organizations, under the same limitations under which they could receive in their name and in their jurisdiction similar organizations. In the judgment of the General Assembly of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church, the purpose for which it was organized is to be promoted by the reunion with the church from which it sprang. They may be mistaken in this. This reunion may thrust upon them and their associates perplexing questions, which in time to come may bring about disagreement and separation. But all of those matters are matters for the ecclesiastical body itself, and, when determined by it, those members of the church who are not in accord with the governing authority must either bow in submission to the powers that be or make their alignments with other organizations with whom they can live in accord and harmony. It was argued that the constitution of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church could not be amended, except by a two-thirds vote, etc. But, under the view that we have taken, no amendment is necessary to effect the reunion, and therefore it is not necessary to say more in reference to this point. The General Assembly, as the highest church court, has determined the questions arising as to the alleged differences of doctrine. The General Assembly, as the highest authority of the church, executive, legislative, and judicial, has determined that it is wise and best that the reunion should take place, and the constitution of the church, as we have interpreted it, gives that body power and jurisdiction to deal with this question, and the question of reunion has been settled in form and manner as the constitution prescribes. We see no reason whatever for the interference of the civil courts in the controversy presented in the present record.

There were other questions argued in the briefs, as to the rights of sureties on the notes given by the Atlanta church to the insurance company, etc.; but the trial judge did not pass on these questions, and based his judgment solely upon the ground that the reunion of the two churches was not authorized by the constitution of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church. We have confined our discussion to the question decided by him, and will determine no other at the present time. Having reached a contrary conclusion to that reached by the able, learned, and painstaking trial judge, no other course is open to us than to reverse the judgment.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

CENTRAL OF GEORGIA RY. CO. v. CITY MILLS CO.

1. CARRIERS — CARRIAGE OF GOODS — LIMITATION OF LIABILITY.

A common carrier cannot limit his legal liability by any notice given, either by publication or by entry on receipts given or tickets sold. He may make an express contract releasing him from liability not arising from his negligence, and will then be governed thereby.

2. SAME.

A milling company, which did a large amount of shipping over a railroad, with the assent of the railroad company prepared and had printed for itself a blank form of shipping receipt, which included the words, "as per conditions of the company's bill of lading." The agent who prepared the form testified that he intended to make it subject to the conditions in the company's regular bill of lading; that the meal which was involved in the controversy was loaded on a car by the milling company, and the receipt made out by its agent and presented to the agent of the railroad company for signing; that it was his intention, as representing the milling company, in making out every paper or contract of shipment, that it should be subject to the terms and conditions of the company's standard bill of lading; and that it was so expressed in the paper, and so understood by him, but that he had never read one of the bills of lading, although he had seen thousands of them. One of the conditions contained in the company's ordinary and regular bill of lading for the transportation of goods other than cotton, live stock, and one or two special kinds of shipments, containing the stipulation that "no carrier shall be liable for loss or damage not occurring on its portion of the route, nor after said property is ready for delivery to the consignee." Held, that it was error to charge the jury: "Did both of the parties, the plaintiff and the defendant, understand by that, at the time this receipt was signed, that liability of the defendant company was limited to its own line, and until delivery to the connecting carrier in good order? Did they both understand it that way? Was that the contract between them?" Such a charge was calculated to leave the jury to infer that, although the shipper may have deliberately and expressly adopted the conditions of the regular bill of lading as a part of the contract, intending to make the shipment subject thereto, and although it may have had ample opportunity for knowing what they were, yet, if its agent did not understand or have in mind this particular condition at the time of the shipment, it would not be a part of the contract.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Muscogee County; R. W. Freeman, Judge.

Action by the City Mills Company against the Central of Georgia Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

The City Mills Company brought suit against the Central of Georgia Railway Company, alleging that it made a shipment of certain meal from Columbus, Ga., to Jacksonville, Fla., and that the defendant failed to deliver the freight at the point of destination. The bill of affreightment was as follows: "Received from City Mills Company, Columbus, Ga., 11, 20, 1902, by C. R. R. Co., by steamer, in apparent good order, the articles named below, to be delivered in like good order, without unnecessary delay: To Peacock, Hunt & West Co., at Jacksonville, Fla. Car—Marks: L. & N. 4863. As per conditions of company's bill of lading. Shipper's order notify." Then followed a description of the property, weight, and rate; and the paper was signed by the agent of the railway company. The only part of the defense which it is necessary to mention is that the defendant company had no line of railroad running from Columbus to Jacksonville, but that, as was well known to the plaintiff when it delivered the car to the defendant, after loading it, the defendant would deliver it at Albany, Ga., to a connecting line of railroad, which would transport it from that point to Jacksonville; that a memorandum receipt was given, which is set out above, and which stipulated that the car was received to be transported by the defendant as per conditions of the company's bill of lading, one of which was that the defendant agreed to deliver the car to its connecting carrier on the route to its destination, and when it did so then all further liability for the shipment should cease as to this defendant; that it did transport the car to its terminus at Albany, and there delivered it in good order to the connecting carrier; and therefore it contends that its liability ceased.

The secretary and treasurer of the plaintiff testified, among other things, as follows: "The receipt signed by the agent of the railway company for this shipment was on the form prepared by the City Mills Company.

The receipt was made out by the plaintiff and presented to the agent of the railway company, Mr. Fengin, to be signed. The receipt was made out by myself, and it was in my handwriting. This form was used at the direction of the railway company and with their approval. It was a matter of convenience, both to the railway company and to us. This receipt is not signed by me, or the City Mills Company, and no other bill of lading was shown or read to me. I have seen thousands of the Central of Georgia Railway Company's bills of lading, but I never read one of them. I do not know whether they are all alike. The form of the paper on which we have sued states that it was subject to the terms of the bill of lading. I will say that it was my intention, as representing the City Mills Company, in making out every paper or contract of shipment, that it was subject to the terms and conditions of the company's standard bill of lading, and it was so expressed in the paper, and I so understood it. The regular bill of lading of the company was not presented to me. I do not know the verbiage of the bills of lading. I never read it at all. We have always used this other form, and the question has never arisen. This form of paper sued on I had printed myself, and the verbiage of the contract reads: 'As per conditions of the company's bill of lading.' Candidly, I had never read a bill of lading of the defendant railway company. I have seen these bills of lading, as I have others; but, as I have stated, I did not have occasion to read them. I cannot say whether the regular form of lading now shown me is the kind referred to in the receipt or contract of shipment attached to our suit. I presume, of course, that the contract prepared by me for the City Mills Company refers to their regular bill of lading. I do not know how many they have. * * * I certainly did know that the bill of lading contained the terms and conditions for the protection of the company in shipments, but I was not aware of those conditions, nor what they were. * * * It was my intention, when I made out that receipt on the City Mills Company paper, and which I had prepared, to make it subject to the company's bill of lading. The bill of lading referred to was the company's regular shipping bill of lading. It was my object and intention to make it refer to the company's regular bill of lading, but I never read the conditions."

The agent of the defendant company testified, among other things: "The railway company at that time issued several different bills of lading. The one handed me is the one they used in contracting and receipting for general merchandise. Then we have a form that applies exclusively to live stock. Then we have two cotton forms of contract, one a domestic and one a foreign shipment. We have a general form for miscellaneous articles, which includes nearly everything except cotton, live stock, and household goods. It is my opinion that the general bill of lading, or standard bill of lading, is the one referred to in the receipt of the City Mills Company for the shipment of these goods. The receipt issued on the City Mills Company's form, containing the words, 'as per conditions of company's bill of lading,' refers to the form of bill of lading handed me, which is the regular bill of lading of the company. So far as I know, this receipt was not signed either by Mr. Baird or the City Mills Company. * * * The bill of lading referred to carries the conditions of the contract of shipment. * * * If household goods were shipped, then the rate and value limitation would apply; but the condition as to the limiting liability to the end of the company's line is a general limitation that applies to all shipments. These conditions are not changed."

The form of the defendant's bill of lading introduced in evidence contained the following clauses: "The railway company agrees to carry to destination the goods shipped, if on its road, or otherwise to deliver to another carrier on the route to said destination. * * * In consideration of the rate charged under the conditions of this bill of lading, it is mutually agreed as to each carrier severally, but not jointly, of all or any of said property over all or any portion of said route to destination, and as to each party at any time interested in all or any of said property, that every service to be performed hereunder shall be subject to all the conditions, whether printed or written, on the face or back thereof, all of which are agreed to by the shipper as owner, or agent for the owner, and accepted for himself or his assigns, as just and reasonable." One of the conditions on the back of the bill of lading was as follows: "No carrier shall be liable for loss or damage not occurring on its portion of the route, nor after said property is ready for delivery to consignee."

The jury found for the plaintiff $111.22, and interest at 7 per cent. from December 2, 1902, to February 5, 1906, $24.65, making a total of $135.87. The defendant moved for a new trial on the general grounds, and also because the court charged as follows: "What conditions, from the evidence in this case, were referred to by the words, 'as per conditions of company's bill of lading'? Did both of the parties, the plaintiff and the defendant, understand by that, at the time this receipt was signed, that liability of the defendant company was limited to its own line, and until delivered to the connecting carrier in good order? Did they both understand it that way? Was that the contract between them? You look to the evidence, and you decide what the truth about the matter is." The motion was overruled, and the defendant excepted.

Charlton E. Battle, for plaintiff in error.
A. W. Cozart and J. H. Martin, for defendant in error.

LUMPKIN, J. "A common carrier cannot limit his liability by any notice given, either by publication or by entry on receipts or tickets sold. He may make an express contract, and will then be governed thereby." Civ. Code 1895, § 2276. As to contracts seeking to waive the results of negligence as a common carrier, see Central Railway Co. v. Hall, 124 Ga. 322, 52 S. E. 679, 4 L. R. A. (N. S.) 898, 110 Am. St. Rep. 170. The express contract referred to above may be signed by the parties, but is not obliged to be so. The mere acceptance of a bill of lading or a ticket which contains a limitation upon liability will not amount to an express contract. Boyd v. Spencer, 103 Ga. 828, 30 S. E. 841, 68 Am. St. Rep. 146; Southern Express Co. v. Newby, 36 Ga. 635, 91 Am. Dec. 783. Whether an express contract has been made limiting, in the absence of any signature of the shipper or his agent, is generally a question for the jury, if there be evidence tending to show such a contract. Southern Express Co. v. Purcell, 37 Ga. 103, 92 Am. Dec. 58; Wallace v. Matthews, 39 Ga. 617, 99 Am. Dec. 473; Wallace v. Sanders, 42 Ga. 486, 490.

The presiding judge charged the jury as follows: "Did both of the parties, the plaintiff and the defendant, understand by that, at the time this receipt was signed, that the liability of the defendant company was limited to its own line, and until delivered to the connecting carrier in good order? Did they both understand it that way? Was that the contract between them? You look to the evidence, and you decide what the truth about that matter is." On looking to the evidence it appears that the plaintiff's agent testified that the plaintiff itself prepared and had printed the form which was used. It was not a blank prepared by the railroad company and signed by its agent and delivered to the shipper; but the agent of the latter himself made out the receipt in his own handwriting and presented it to the agent of the railroad company to sign. The car was furnished by the company, and loaded, closed, and fastened by the plaintiff before being delivered to the railroad company. The shipment was made by "shipper's load and count." The plaintiff knew that the defendant did not have a line of railroad to Jacksonville, and that it was necessary that the car should be transported over a connecting line in order to reach its destination. It was not a matter of haste, or of mere acceptance of a receipt on the part of the plaintiff, but of deliberation and preparation. The plaintiff voluntarily placed in a receipt prepared by it a statement that the shipment should be "as per conditions of company's bill of lading." Its agent testified that he knew the bill of lading referred to contained terms and conditions for the protection of the company in shipments, but he did not know what those conditions were. Nevertheless, without taking the trouble to inform himself, though he testified that he had seen thousands of the bills of lading, he placed this stipulation on the face of the receipt, and induced the railroad company to sign it, with such reference to the bill of lading as an integral part of it. He also testified that it was his intention, as representing the plaintiff, in making out every paper or contract of shipment, that it should be subject to the terms and conditions of the company's standard bill of lading, that such was his intention when he made out the receipt relied on, and that the bill of lading referred to was the company's regular shipping bill of lading, but that he never read the conditions thereof. If the shipper deliberately prepared a contract for the railroad company to sign, and himself placed in it an adoption of the conditions of the company's regular bill of lading, with the express assent of the company, and with the purpose of binding the shipper thereby, and thus induced the railroad to accept and use it, instead of using the regular bill of lading, it would be doing violence to the most fundamental principles of contracts of good faith between parties to allow the plaintiff afterwards to say that he was not bound by the conditions of the company's bill of lading because the shipper's own agent did not take the trouble to know what he meant by or included in the contract which he himself prepared. There is no pretense that he did not have ample opportunity to know what the conditions were before and when he adopted them as a part of the receipt which he was preparing. We think the charge of our brother of the superior court might have led the jury to believe that, although it may have been intended and expressly agreed that the shipment should be subject to the conditions of the company's bill of lading, yet if the plaintiff's agent, at the time of the shipment, did not understand the contract which he had previously prepared in blank and then filled out, and thus prepared for the other party to sign, however ample opportunity he may have had for understanding it, or however negligent it may have been not to understand it, nevertheless the plaintiff would not be bound by it.

It was contended by counsel for the plaintiff that it was not certain that the form of the bill of lading which was introduced in evidence was the one referred to in the receipt. But while at one point in his evidence the plaintiff's agent did make use of the expression, "I cannot say whether the regular form of the bill of lading now shown me is the kind referred to in the receipt or contract of shipment attached to our suit," he immediately added, "I presume, of course, that the contract prepared by me for the City Mills Company refers to their regular bill of lading," and at another time stated that the bill of lading referred to the company's "regular shipping bill of lading."

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

BEARDEN MERCANTILE CO. v. MADISON OIL CO.

FITZPATRICK v. SAME.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 12, 1907.)

1. SALES—CONSTRUCTION OF CONTRACT—ENTIRE OR SEVERABLE CONTRACTS.

When an executory contract for the sale of goods provides in one distinct paragraph for the sale of articles of a given character at a stated price, to be delivered during a given period and in a stated manner, and in another distinct paragraph, beginning with the words, "We have also sold you," provides for the sale of articles of a separate and distinct character to be delivered in a given manner, but with no time for delivery stated, the contract is divisible, containing two separate and distinct agreements for the sale of the different articles therein referred to; and this is true, notwithstanding the contract concludes with a guaranty that as to the articles referred to in the second paragraph local prices shall not be less than a given amount "for the balance of the season," and an agreement to handle only cash trade, except car load lots out of town.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 43, Sales, §§ 171-179.]

2. SAME—TIME OF PERFORMANCE.

In a contract of a character above indicated, time would be of the essence so far as the article referred to in the first paragraph was concerned; but it would be otherwise as to the articles referred to in the second paragraph.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 43, Sales, §§ 218, 222.]

3. SAME—QUESTION FOR JURY.

When a contract fixes no time for performance, it is to be construed as allowing a reasonable time for that purpose; and what is a reasonable time is a matter of fact, to be determined by a jury under all of the circumstances of the case.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 11, Contracts, §§ 943, 947.]

4. SAME—MODIFICATION—WAIVER OF STIPULATION.

While parties to a contract may, by a course of dealing after a contract has gone into effect, waive a stipulation therein, still, in order to bring about this result, it must appear from the circumstances that it was the mutual intention of the parties to so change the contract.

5. SAME.

The answer and the amendment thereto, in so far as each related to that part of the contract referring to the sale of the hulls, set forth no ground of defense; but those portions relating to the sale of meal set forth a cause of action.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Morgan County; H. G. Lewis, Judge.

Two actions by the Madison Oil Company—one against the Bearden Mercantile Company, and the other against H. H. Fitzpatrick. From a judgment in each case for plaintiff, defendants bring error. Reversed.

The Madison Oil Company brought suit against the Bearden Mercantile Company on an account for $1,627.96. The bill of particulars attached to the petition contained items of cotton seed hulls and meal, sold at different dates from September 1, 1903, to March 8, 1904. The total amount of the account was $1,958.28, which was credited with $330.32, leaving a balance due as above stated. The defendant filed an answer, in which it admitted that the goods set out in the petition were sold and delivered to the defendant as therein alleged, and that the plaintiff was entitled to recover, unless the defense set up by it was sustained. The answer then alleged that on October 15, 1903, the defendant, jointly with H. E. Fitzpatrick, entered into a written contract of which the following is a copy:

"Messrs. Bearden Mercantile Co. and Mr. H. E. Fitzpatrick, Madison, Ga.—Gentlemen: Please note and confirm that we have this day sold you 400 tons of cotton seed hulls, f. o. b. our Madison mill, at the price of $4.50 per ton for loose hulls and $5.50 per ton for baled hulls. Same to be delivered to you either on cars or in wagons at our mill at your option, between now and January 1, 1904. We, if possible, will store for you not over 150 tons in our hull house after this time, provided it is possible to do so. Same to be delivered as desired after that time. In case this is necessary, the hulls are stored at buyer's risk. Settlement for hulls delivered to be made at the end of each month.

"We have also sold you 200 tons of cotton seed meal, at $21.00 per ton of 2,000 pounds, f. o. b. our mill, either delivered to wagons or loaded on cars; but, should you desire to take part of this contract in second grade, or what is known as 'off meal,' and we have the same on hand as you call for it, this off meal to be billed to you at $20.00 per ton f. o. b. our mill, either on your wagons or on cars. Payment for all meal delivered to be made at the end of each month.

"We guarantee our local prices to be not less than $22.00 per ton, f. o. b. our mill, for meal in small quantities, for the balance of this season, and further agree to handle only cash trade, except car load lots out of town. Madison Oil Co., D. H. Hicky, Secy. & Treas.

"Accepted. Bearden Mercantile Co. H. E. Fitzpatrick."

It was alleged that the items in the account prior to October 15, 1903, and subsequently to February 3, 1904, were not delivered under the contract, but such items were covered by another transaction; that the goods in the items between the dates of October 15, 1903, and February 3, 1904, were delivered under and in pursuance of the contract above set out, the defendant having received, during these dates, 90½ tons of hulls and 26½ tons of meal; that the legal effect of the contract was to give the defendant a half interest in the goods therein referred to, but that he has not received of the plaintiff his half of the goods. He has at all times been ready and willing, and has offered, to receive the goods that he was entitled to under the contract, and has been at all times ready and able to pay for the same as provided by the contract. On January 1, 1904, plaintiff did not have on hand sufficient hulls to deliver all that might have been demanded of it; but defendant waived prompt delivery and accepted later deliveries, and was willing to accept the same. On February 3, 1904, plaintiff, without lawful excuse, refused to deliver any more goods under the contract, and notified defendant that it would not do so. It then and there repudiated and terminated the contract. The defendant persisted in an effort to obtain satisfaction, but, being unable to do so, on April 5, 1904, offered to pay petitioner the amount sued for in this case, less the damages that it had sustained on account of the breach of the contract by the plaintiff. A tender of $798.05 was made, which is the amount admitted to be due by the defendant after crediting the account with the amount of the damages above referred to. At the time of the breach of the contract the market price of hulls at the place of delivery was $10.50 for loose and $11.50 for baled hulls, and the market price of meal was $24 per ton.

At the trial the defendant offered an amendment to its answer, in which it was alleged that the defendant was at all times ready and willing to pay under the terms of the contract, and has never refused; that the plaintiff kept the books, and it was the custom of the plaintiff, in its business, to present statements for payment, but it presented to defendant no statement at the end of each month, or at any time during the deliveries, though defendant requested the same. Defendant was known to be amply solvent, and by tacit consent of both parties a prompt settlement and payment at the end of each month was waived, and the plaintiff did not object to making further deliveries after the end of each month because settlements had not been made by the defendant; but it waived payment at such times and continued to make deliveries under the contract. Plaintiff was a manufacturer of hulls and meals, and was manufacturing the same during the continuance of the contract, and up to February, 1904, and thereafter. On January 1, 1904, plaintiff had not the hulls contracted to be sold on hand, which was well known to both parties; but the plaintiff was expected to manufacture the same. Had it had the hulls to deliver, there was ample room, and it was entirely possible, to have stored 150 tons of said hulls in plaintiff's warehouse, as stipulated in the contract. Defendant waived a strict delivery of all hulls due on January 1st, and by mutual consent and tacit understanding the hulls were continued to be delivered from time to time thereafter upon the contract; both parties thus departing from the enforcement of the time stipulations. It was not the intention of either party to abandon the contract or waive a final performance. Were it otherwise, it was the duty of the plaintiff to have stored for the defendant in its warehouse at least 150 tons of hulls on January 1, 1904, to be delivered as desired after that time. This the plaintiff did not do, but, on February 3, 1904, notified defendant that it would make no more deliveries. Defendant then demanded a full performance, and offered to perform all obligations on its part, but plaintiff refused, to the damage of defendant. The court refused to allow this amendment, and struck the original answer on general demurrer; and judgment was entered against the defendant for the amount sued for. The defendant excepted.

The facts in the case of Madison Oil Company v. Fitzpatrick, except as to the amounts, are practically the same as those embraced in the foregoing statement.

Samuel H. Sibley and Williford & Middlebrooks, for plaintiffs in error. Foster & Butler and F. C. Foster, Sr., for defendant in error.

COBB, P. J. (after stating the facts). 1. The contract involved in the present case is not a contract for the sale of goods. There were no particular articles identified by the contract, and it lacked this essential element of a sale. It is an executory agreement for the sale of goods to be delivered at a future date. As such it is valid and binding; and this is true, notwithstanding the seller had not the goods in his possession, had not contracted to purchase them, and had no other expectation of acquiring them other than by purchase or manufacture at some time before the date of delivery. Forsyth Manufacturing Co. v. Castlen, 112 Ga. 199, 37 S. E. 485, 81 Am. St. Rep. 28. The contract did not provide for the sale of a single article, but for articles of a given class; and there were two separate and distinct classes of articles referred to therein. It is therefore to be determined whether the contract was entire, or whether it was severable in its nature; that is, whether it contained one contract for the sale of hulls and meals, or whether the paper contained two contracts—one an agreement to sell hulls, and the other an agreement to sell meal. If the contract is entire, the whole must stand or fall together. If it is severable, the failure of a distinct part does not void the remainder. The character of the contract, as to whether it was severable or entire, is to be determined by the intention of the parties, as indicated by the terms of the agreement. Civ. Code 1895, § 3643. And if the contract is upon one consideration, this fact is a strong, and in some cases a controlling, circumstance in determining the character of the contract and that it was the intention of the parties that it should be entire.

This contract, however, is not based upon a single consideration. The amount to be paid was dependent upon the quantity of the articles that were ordered from time to time. The payments were to be made at specified times after delivery; that is, at the end of the month. The contract deals first with the subject of hulls, and stipulates the price, time, place, and manner of delivery, as well as other matters connected therewith. After having concluded with this matter, the contract in a distinct paragraph approaches the subject of meal with the significant language: "We have also sold you," etc. This paragraph of the contract provides for the price, place, and manner of delivery, and also other matters in reference to this subject-matter. The parties in the paper have dealt with the two subject-matters separately, and there must have been some reason for this in the minds of the contracting parties. There was an intention to separate, and this intention the law will allow to prevail. The paper contains two separate and distinct contracts, independent of each other. If time was of the essence as to that portion of the contract relating to hulls, and time was not of the essence as to that portion of the contract relating to meal, it would be possible for the defendants to have lost their right to demand the delivery of the hulls and still be in a position to demand the delivery of the meal. But if time was not of the essence as to either of the subject-matters of the contract, and the defendants had a reasonable time, without reference to the date stated, to call for a performance, it might be that, under the circumstances of the case, a reasonable time would elapse as to one of the articles before it would expire as to the other.

But it is said that the last paragraph in the contract, in which the plaintiffs guarantee local prices for meal at a given figure "for the balance of this season," etc., indicates that it was the intention of the parties to make the transaction in reference to both subject-matters concurrent as to time as well as in other particulars. It does not appear, from the terms of the contract, what was the season. Whether it expired on the 1st day of January following the execution of the contract, or at some other time, we cannot tell. There is no averment in the pleadings which can be looked to to resolve this ambiguity in the contract. Whatever may have been the season for the sale of the articles, the contract provides that this guaranty shall be operative; but we do not think that this guaranty has the effect to change the character of the contract and render it entire, when it would otherwise be divisible. When the contract is construed as a whole, we think it a reasonable interpretation that it was the intention of the parties that it should be divisible as to the two classes of articles referred to therein.

2. At common law time was always of the essence of the contract; but in equity it was otherwise, unless it was the manifest intention of the parties to make time of the essence. This intention might be either expressed or implied. Clark on Contracts (2d Ed.) 408; Hammon on Contracts, 881. Our Code has adopted the more liberal rule of the equity courts, and declares: "Time is not generally of the essence of the contract; but by express stipulation or reasonable construction it may become so." Civ. Code 1895, § 3675, par. 8. Interpreting the contract, therefore, under this rule, we must not stop merely at finding the time for the performance specified, and hold the parties strictly to performance within that time, but must go farther, and determine whether, under the terms of the contract, this time is expressly declared to be of the essence of the undertaking, or whether, if not so expressly declared, a reasonable construction of the provisions of the contract would necessarily lead to that conclusion. Applying this rule, we have little difficulty in reaching the conclusion that it was undoubtedly the intention of the parties that time should be of the essence of the contract in the present case, so far as it related to the sale of hulls. The contract says, "We have this day sold you," etc., describing the articles and the price, "same to be delivered to you" in a given way "between now and January 1, 1904." No other interpretation can be properly placed upon this language than that it was the intention of the parties that at least a demand for the hulls should be made before the 1st day of January, 1904.

A strict construction might require that the demand should be made in time for the delivery before that date; but certainly the contract bears the interpretation that the demand should be made before that date, even though it might be followed by a delivery thereafter. The right to demand a delivery of the articles terminated, so far as the hulls were concerned, on the 1st day of January, 1904. In reference to the meal the time for the delivery does not appear in the paragraph of the contract dealing with that subject. This may have been an oversight, or it may have been the result of deliberation. Keeping in mind the rule above referred to, that in order for time to be of the essence there must be an express stipulation, or terms demanding a reasonable construction to that end, we cannot say, where a contract is entirely silent in reference to a particular article which is dealt with in a distinct paragraph, that a reasonable construction requires that time shall be of the essence of the contract. If we were to attempt to do so, what time would we fix? The parties have omitted to specify any time. Must we look to an entirely distinct paragraph of the contract, dealing with an entirely different subject of sale, and fix that as the time? We do not know judicially that hulls and meals are so intimately connected with each other, so far as the purposes of commerce and trade are concerned, that the time in the contract for the sale of one would be appropriate in a contract for the sale of the other. Of course, we know that cotton seed oil and cotton seed meal are the products of cotton seed, and are the products, or manufactured from, the same thing, because this is a matter of such common knowledge that every person knows it; but our judicial knowledge in reference to the uses of trade in reference to the two articles is not so broad as it is as to the fact that both articles are produced from the same thing and at the same time.

But it is said the last paragraph of the contract, in reference to guaranteeing the local price during a given season, might be looked to to determine this. As stated above, we do not know what is the season for the sale of either of these articles. There is nothing in the contract to indicate that the season for the sale closed on January 1, 1904, as to the meal, and in fact nothing to indicate that the season closed at that time in reference to hulls. And on the question as to what is the season for the sale of these articles we are in ignorance, both judicially and individually. It may have been the purpose of the contracting parties to make time of the essence as to the meal. But they have failed to provide any such express stipulation, and a reasonable construction of the contract does not call for such an interpretation.

3. When a contract fixes no time for performance, the contract is to be construed as allowing a reasonable time for that purpose. Clark on Contracts (2d Ed.) 408; Hammon on Contracts, 881. Where a party to a contract undertakes to do a particular act, the performance of which depends entirely upon himself, and the contract is silent as to the time of performance, the law implies an engagement that it shall be executed within a reasonable time. 9 Cyc. 613. Of course, it was not intended by the parties that this executory agreement should continue for all time. The parties had definitely agreed that the agreement should not be in existence after January 1, 1904, so far as the hulls were concerned. The plaintiff had agreed to sell to the defendants meal. Whether they were entitled to receive the hulls depended upon whether they demanded the delivery prior to January 1, 1904. Whether they should be entitled to demand the meal depended upon whether the delivery was called for within a reasonable time after the execution of the contract. The plaintiff was under no obligation to tender either the hulls or the meal. It was under obligation to deliver in the one instance in the time provided in the contract, and in the other in the time authorized by law. What was a reasonable time in which to call for a delivery of the meal under the contract is a question of fact, to be determined by a jury under all of the circumstances of the case. The answer alleges that the defendants demanded full performance on February 3, 1905. Full performance would have meant the delivery of all of the articles that defendants were entitled to demand under the contract and had not been delivered prior to that time. This was a sufficient allegation of a demand for delivery, and whether this demand was made within a reasonable time is to be determined as above indicated.

This case is to be distinguished from the case of Electric Railway Co. v. Tennessee Co., 98 Ga. 189, 26 S. E. 741, in that the contract there under consideration was an executory agreement for the sale of a given quantity of articles to be delivered daily for a period not specified. It was held that the contracting party who was to furnish the articles could not terminate the contract without notice, but that it could be terminated by giving notice. In the present case the articles were not to be delivered daily, but they were to be delivered when called for. The time in which they were to be called for not being fixed by the parties, the law implies that it was the intention of the parties that a reasonable time should be allowed for this purpose. In addition to this, that case did not deal with the question as to when notice of discontinuance should be given. There is nothing in that case to indicate that even a contract of the character there involved can be discontinued by notice without allowing the parties a reasonable time to make other arrangements in reference to the matter which was the subject-matter of the undertaking. The case rested upon the principle stated in Clark on Contracts in this language: "If a continuous contract fixes no time during which it is to last, and no time is fixed by law or by usage, it may be determined at the will of either party by notice." Clark on Con. (2d Ed.) 430.

4. It is said, though, that it appears that the defendant did not comply with the contract in reference to payment at the end of each month, and therefore this was sufficient reason for the plaintiff to refuse to make further deliveries. Under the averments of the answer it is evident, so far as the time of payment was concerned, that the course of dealing between the parties had been such as to nullify this stipulation of the contract. The contract provided for statements to be rendered at given times, which were not rendered, although demanded, and payment was received at other times without objection. It is said, too, that the stipulation as to time in that portion of the contract providing for the sale of hulls has also been waived. There are in the pleadings averments that by mutual agreement and tacit consent, or similar words, certain things had been done. No express agreement changing the time is set up in the pleadings. The facts relied upon to show such agreement are set forth, and the words above referred to seem to be merely the conclusion of the pleader from the facts alleged, and the presiding judge, in an opinion which appears in the record, states that it was admitted in the argument before him that these words were to be given no more effect than mere conclusions from the facts pleaded. It appears that there were hulls delivered after the 1st day of January. This might constitute a waiver as to the demand being made before that date, so far as these hulls were concerned. But would this waiver go any further than the particular transaction? While a distinct stipulation in a contract may be waived by the conduct of the parties, it must appear that it was the intention of the parties to treat such stipulations as no longer binding. The mere fact that one party so intended would not bring about this result. It must appear that it was the mutual intention; that is, the circumstances must be such as, in law, to make practically a new agreement as to stipulations contained in the original contract. And, construing the answer most strictly against the pleader, we cannot say that the averments are sufficient to show that there was such a course of dealing as to show a mutual intention to do away with the stipulations in the original contract as to the time that the hulls were to be delivered.

5. It is contended by counsel for plaintiff in error that under the contract the oil company was bound to store a certain quantity of hulls on the 1st day of January, 1904, for delivery thereafter. The contract was to deliver when called for a given quantity of hulls. If all were not delivered prior to January 1, 1904, and the quantity undelivered was equal to or less than the quantity in the provision in reference to storing, then the plaintiff was, on application, to store for the benefit of the defendants; but we do not think that it was the intention of the parties that this quantity should be stored, without reference to a request on the part of the defendants. A reasonable interpretation of the contract was that if the defendants, in their business, could not use the entire quantity before the 1st day of January, 1904, the plaintiff would keep stored not exceeding a certain quantity for delivery thereafter. But there was no positive duty imposed upon the plaintiff by the terms of the contract to hold or store this amount for the benefit of the defendants. There is no allegation that there was any request on the part of the defendants, prior to January 1, 1904, to store this quantity. The right of the defendants to demand delivery, as well as to demand storage, terminated on the date provided in the contract. The answer and the amendment thereto, so far as each related to that portion of the contract providing for the sale of hulls, set forth no defense; but those portions of the answer, and the amendment thereto, relating to the contract for the sale of meal, set forth a cause of action.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

COLEY v. COLEY.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 11, 1907.)

1. WRIT OF ERROR — DISMISSAL — WAIVER OF OBJECTIONS.

Where a wife filed suit against her husband for permanent alimony, and also applied to have temporary alimony awarded for the benefit of herself and their child of tender years, and where the presiding judge declined to award temporary alimony or attorney's fees to the wife, but directed that a certain amount should be paid by the husband each month for the support and maintenance of the child, and to the ruling denying temporary alimony and attorney's fees for her the wife excepted, the fact that while the case was pending in this court she collected some of the amount awarded for the support of the child will not be ground for dismissing the bill of exceptions.

2. DIVORCE — TEMPORARY ALIMONY — DISCRETION OF COURT.

Where a wife sues her husband for permanent alimony on the ground that they are living separately, and applies for temporary alimony pending the suit on the hearing of the application for temporary alimony the merits of the case are not in issue, and the presiding judge will not generally refuse alimony merely because the evidence is conflicting, or the right to permanent alimony on the final trial may be doubtful; but it is not an invariable or arbitrary rule that alimony must be awarded upon proof of the marriage and separation, without regard to the circumstances of the case. The presiding judge, in fixing the amount of alimony, may inquire into the cause and circumstances of the separation rendering the alimony necessary, and in his discretion may refuse it altogether, if the evidence so warrants, or, if there is a minor child, he may award an amount for the support of the child, and refuse to award alimony for the wife.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 26, Husband and Wife, §§ 1084, 1085.]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Pulaski County; J. H. Martin, Judge.

Action by Mary Coley against B. B. J. Coley. From the judgment, plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Mrs. Mary Coley brought suit for temporary and permanent alimony against her husband, B. B. J. Coley, alleging that her husband had driven her away from home without cause, that they were living in a bona fide state of separation, and that she had no means of support for herself and their minor children, except to seek employment as a domestic servant. On the hearing of the application for temporary alimony, she alone testified on her own behalf. Ten witnesses were introduced on behalf of the defense, several of whom testified that they knew her general character for truth and veracity in the community in which she lived, that it was bad, and that they would not believe her on oath. Several others testified that she was not driven from home by the defendant, but left of her own accord; that she was violent and abusive toward him, cursing him, threatening to kill him, and indulging in the most foul, vulgar, and indecent language in his presence and that of his young children by a former marriage; that she left once, and afterwards returned, and then left again; that when she came back she said that she "didn't have anything on" the defendant, and that she had come back to get something against him, but that she had been unable to do so, and was going to leave again. Prior to her marriage she had been employed in a hotel. The presiding judge refused to grant temporary alimony or attorney's fees to the wife, but allowed $5 per month for the benefit of the minor child. The plaintiff excepted.

Hardeman & Jones, for plaintiff in error.
Fort & Grice, for defendant in error.

LUMPKIN, J. (after stating the facts). 1. On the call of the case in this court a motion was made to dismiss the writ of error, on the ground that the plaintiff had collected some alimony under the order and had sought to collect more. In support of the motion a letter, bearing date after the filing of the bill of exceptions, from counsel for plaintiff to one of the counsel for defendant, was presented. A statement in it indicated that the plaintiff had collected three or four of the payments ordered to be made for the benefit of the child, and the attorneys urged that other payments which were in arrears should be made. If a judgment is rendered in favor of the plaintiff, which she thinks too small, she may except and have the question tested, or she may suppress her dissatisfaction and collect the judgment. She cannot do both. Owens v. Read Phosphate Co., 115 Ga. 768, 42 S. E. 62. Were this judgment in favor of the wife and for her benefit, the motion to dismiss would prevail; but where the presiding judge refused alimony for the wife, and only made provision for maintenance of the little child of the two parties, we do not think it would be within either the spirit or the justice of the law to hold that she must repudiate this entirely, and allow the child to suffer, in order to permit her to except to the refusal of alimony for her. The motion is overruled.

2. Formerly a wife had no separate property. What she had at marriage and what she acquired afterwards vested in the husband. If a separation occurred, whether a divorce was pending or not, starvation or suffering was often imminent, unless provision were made for her support from the property of her husband, or unless she was cared for by the charity of friends or relatives. It was thus almost a matter of course to grant temporary alimony to the wife where a divorce suit was pending between her and her husband. In the great change which has come into the law in respect to the property of married women, under which she not only retains the property which she had at marriage, and that which she acquires subsequently, but sometimes holds the title of all the family property, the rigid application of the old rule in regard to the granting of alimony has been somewhat modified. In the first Code of the state it was provided that, "on application for temporary alimony, the merits of the cause are not in issue, though the judge, in fixing the amount of alimony may inquire into the cause and circumstances of the separation rendering the alimony necessary, and in his discretion may refuse it altogether." See Civ. Code 1895, § 2460. When the original Code was adopted there was no provision for granting temporary alimony except pending a divorce suit. In 1870 an act was passed (Acts 1870, p. 413), which is now codified. Civ. Code 1895, § 2467. It provided that "when husband and wife are living separately, or are bona fide in a state of separation, and there is no action for divorce pending, the wife may, in behalf of herself and her minor children, if any, or either, institute a proceeding by petition setting forth fully her case; and upon three days notice to the husband, the judge may hear the same in term or in vacation, and grant such order as he might grant were it based on a pending libel for divorce," etc. It will be seen at a glance that the Legislature placed the granting of temporary alimony pending a suit for permanent alimony, where the parties are living separately or are in a bona fide state of separation, on practically the same footing as an application for temporary alimony pending a divorce suit. It was distinctly declared that the presiding judge might "grant such order as he might grant were it based on a pending libel for divorce." If it were based on such a libel, the section of the original Code already quoted, which was in existence when the act of 1870 was passed, and is still in the Code, stated what manner of order might be granted, and provided for the use of the judge's discretion in respect thereto. The duty of a husband to support his wife still remained, and was not destroyed by the change in the law in respect to the property of married women. The first provision of section 2460 of the Civil Code of 1895, which declares that on applications for temporary alimony the merits of the cause are not in issue, indicates that the judge will not take the place of the jury on the ultimate trial, decide the whole merits of the controversy between the parties, and grant or refuse temporary alimony as if he were granting or refusing a divorce. It may be very commonly necessary and proper that the wife should be supported during the suit, and should have counsel fees, in order that her side of the contention may be fairly submitted to the jury on the final trial; but, on the other hand, it is not an arbitrary and unvarying rule that the judge must grant alimony or attorney's fees. He is allowed some discretion; and, if the facts are such as to demonstrate the impropriety of granting the alimony, in the discretion of the judge it may be refused.

The great weight of the testimony here was to the effect that the plaintiff shamefully mistreated her husband, threatening to kill him, using physical violence upon him, and employing such foul, indecent, and profane language to him in the presence of his children by a former marriage, and in the hearing of neighbors and other members of the family, as to shock the moral sense of decent people. The testimony also indicated that, instead of being driven from home by her husband, she attempted to aggravate him into striking her, for the avowed purpose of using his conduct against him in a suit for alimony, and that, failing in this, she deserted him. She denied this. Several witnesses impeached her veracity, and testified that she was unworthy of belief, and she brought none to sustain her. Before her marriage she had been employed in a hotel, where she worked for a living; and while a return to labor may have been less satisfactory to her than alimony, it does not appear to have been a hardship to which she was unaccustomed. Dicken v. Dicken, 38 Ga. 663; Williams v. Williams, 114 Ga. 772, 40 S. E. 782. In Hawes v. Hawes, 66 Ga. 142, a husband and wife agreed that she should stay at her sister's and he would support her and "do what was right." She brought suit against him for alimony. The court held that this constituted a case of voluntary separation within the meaning of the Code. In the opinion Crawford, J., added: "Had this agreement never been made, and he had stood upon his legal rights and obligations under the other facts of the case as disclosed by the record, his liability would have been governed by section 1740 [now section 2460] of the Code, as construed by this court in Dicken v. Dicken, 38 Ga. 663." In Glass v. Wynn, 76 Ga. 319, in the first division of the opinion, it was declared that, "the evidence is distressingly conflicting in respect to the party whose fault caused the separation, but this court defers to the judgment of the court below thereon, it being of opinion that there is evidence enough to sustain the judgment against any idea that he abused his discretion; and so in respect to the treatment of the wife by the husband the testimony conflicts, and we must adjudicate all these decisions on facts, where they are thus uncertain, in the same way." Discretion in deciding the question necessarily involves the power to decide it either way, if the evidence so authorizes it. In the next division of the opinion it was said that the act of 1870 declares that this procedure may be had at the instance of the wife, when husband and wife are living separately, or are bona fide in a state of separation, there being no action for divorce pending; and the cause before the court was held to fall within the provisions of the act. It is true that the able Chief Justice who delivered the opinion made use of the expression, "And, in our judgment, it is immaterial what brought this separation about," and that he also said: "We do not see that Hawes v. Hawes conflicts with this view of the section. If so, the remark is obiter." In the third division of the opinion it was said that, "even if there must be cruel treatment or voluntary separation in order that this proceeding may be had, we think in such a case cruel treatment may exist from conduct other than blows."

It was contended that this was an adjudication that, if parties were living in a state of separation, it was immaterial what brought about that state, and that the presiding judge had no discretion to refuse temporary alimony to the wife, regardless of the conduct of the parties, but was bound to award it, if it were shown that the parties were married and were living separately. We do not think that this is a proper interpretation to put upon the decision in that case; and, although the language quoted was used, it was employed arguendo, and was unnecessary to the decision. If the construction contended for were given, it would place the court in a somewhat singular attitude of holding three propositions: (1) That the presiding judge had a discretion in the matter, and that it did not abuse it in that case; (2) that he had no discretion, but was bound to award alimony, regardless of discretion; and (3) that, if cruel treatment or voluntary separation must be shown, there was sufficient evidence of it, and the court did not err in his finding, or, in other words, that he did not abuse his discretion. We are unwilling to give a construction to the ruling in that case which will produce such a conflict of positions. Nor do we believe that the court meant to say that, if marriage and separation were shown, the presiding judge must disregard all other evidence and award alimony in all events. Suppose a wife should desert her husband without cause, and take up her abode in a house of ill fame as a common prostitute, would any court hold that her husband was bound to pay her alimony merely because they had been married and were living separately? The case of Glass v. Wynn, so far as has come to the knowledge of the writer, has been but twice cited—once in the case of Ray v. Ray, 106 Ga. 263, 32 S. E. 91, where it was cited on the subject of what might constitute cruel treatment; and once in Ring v. Ring, 118 Ga. 183-188, 44 S. E. 861, 32 L. R. A. 878, where it was criticised. Probably the expression quoted above from the opinion in the case of Hawes v. Hawes was an obiter dictum; but, if so, we think it was a correct statement of the law.

In the present case there was no abuse of discretion in the order granted by the presiding judge.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

MATHIS v. HARRELL. (Nos. 190, 191.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. March 2, 1907.)

1. CONTRACTS—MODIFICATION—CONDITIONS.

The petition as amended sets forth a cause of action, and the court did not err in overruling the defendant's demurrer.

2. SAME—CONDITIONS—WAIVER.

The court erred in directing a verdict.

3. SAME—ACTIONS—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

No other error appears.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Bainbridge; Harrell, Judge.

Action by P. L. Mathis against one Harrell. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Defendant assigns a cross-bill. Judgment on main bill reversed, on cross-bill affirmed.

E. S. Longley and J. R. Wilson, for plaintiff in error. Russell & Hawes, for defendant in error.

POWELL, J. The instrument under which the plaintiff's cause of action arose is as follows: "Bainbridge, Ga. Contract between Mart Clothing Company, of the first part, and P. L. Mathis, second part. The Mart Clothing Company is to furnish P. L. Mathis a stock of goods, such as they think best and in such amounts as they think advisable, to do a general business in Bainbridge, Ga., on Water Street, in the Hicks block, to be known as the Bazaar. Said Mathis is to be manager, keep a strict account of the cash, sales and expenses, remit all cash to the Mart Clothing Company, and to sell strictly for the cash; and the minute that anything is charged or sold to any one on a credit, said P. L. Mathis then and there loses all interest in the business, and turns same over to the Mart Clothing Company, without any further claim, and at any time the business does not prove satisfactory, or is not being run satisfactory to the Mart Clothing Company, said Mathis is to turn over the business to the Mart Clothing Company, and to receive sixty dollars per month for his services for each month he has been manager of the Bazaar, less what he has already drawn out. Am to take stock at least once a year, and said Mathis is to receive one half of the net profits for running and managing the same, and P. L. Mathis is to draw not more than fifty dollars for living expenses, or for other use, and the amount he draws is to be deducted from his half of the profits. In case of fire P. L. Mathis is to receive sixty dollars per month for each month he has been manager, less what he has already drawn, and relinquish all further claims to the business. This 3rd Nov., 1904. The Mart Clothing Company, per C. C. H. P. L. Mathis." The petition brought by Mathis alleges that Mrs. Harrell is the sole owner of the Mart Clothing Company, and that he was to receive for his services under the contract with her, set out above, a salary of $60 per month; that under the contract he took charge of the store and worked in the same as manager for 13 months and 20 days, performing his contract as agreed; that in November, 1905, by mutual consent of himself and of Mrs. Harrell, he severed his connection with the business, and upon his turning it over to Mrs. Harrell she agreed to pay him, as the balance due him, the sum of $137, but that she neglects and refuses to pay the same, although due under said contract; wherefore this suit is brought, etc. The defendant filed a general demurrer to the petition, on the ground of no cause of action; also a special demurrer on the ground that "it does not appear how or in what manner defendant became indebted to plaintiff in the amount sued for. It does not allege that the amount sued for represents one-half of the net profits, or that it was the balance due upon the salary plaintiff was to receive, according to the terms of the contract." The plaintiff filed an amendment to the petition, amplifying the original allegations, as follows: "That defendant is indebted to him in the sum of $137, under the contract attached to plaintiff's petition; that under said contract plaintiff was to receive a salary of $60 per month for his services as manager of said store; that he worked as manager for the term of 13 months and 21 days; that during said term he drew only $50 per month, and that this defendant is due him the sum of $137 on his salary under said contract; that when he left the service of the said defendant she agreed, through her agent, C. C. Harrell, to pay him this amount within one week. Defendant has failed to pay the same or any part thereof." The court overruled the demurrer, and this ruling is complained of in the cross-bill of exceptions. The defendant answered, admitting the execution of the contract, but denying the other material allegations of the petition, and pleading further that the plaintiff had, without her consent, broken the contract, and left her employment; that under the plaintiff's management the business had made no net profits; that, in violation of the terms of the contract, the plaintiff had, during his management of the business, sold on credit goods to the amount of $200 to various persons, many of whom were insolvent, and that she did not know of this violation of the terms of the contract prior to the time plaintiff left her employ.

The only witnesses sworn in the case were the plaintiff and C. C. Harrell, who was admitted to be the defendant's manager and general agent throughout the transaction. Mathis, by his testimony, substantiated his allegations as to the length of service performed by him. He further testified that, having the opportunity of working for better wages elsewhere, he told Harrell that he was going to quit, and Harrell consented, and the stocks and books were turned over. Harrell inquired as to how they should settle. Mathis replied that the quickest way was for Harrell to pay him the $60 per month, unless he desired to take stock. Harrell agreed to settle on this basis, and promised to pay the amount the next week. Harrell requested Mathis to wait a while longer, until he could collect some of the accounts which were outstanding on the books. After a few days another demand for payment was made, and Harrell still claimed that he had not collected the accounts. Mathis replied that he would take the accounts as payment on the amount due him. Harrell then told him: "I will not pay you at all. I have consulted a lawyer, and he says I don't have to pay you." Harrell testified that Mathis, instead of selling for cash only, as required by the contract, sold goods on credit to various named persons, the aggregate of these credit sales being about $150. During the 13 months in which Mathis ran the business it lost money, but he was unable to say how much. Defendant did not object to his quitting, but refused to pay him, because he had broken the contract and because the business was losing money. Mathis, being recalled, admitted that he had sold a portion of the goods mentioned on credit, the amount of the same aggregating about $110, but denied making the other credit sales claimed by Harrell. As to two of the largest credit sales, amounting to about $75, he asserted that these were made with Harrell's knowledge, and without complaint on his part. Harrell returned to the stand and admitted that credit had been extended to these two customers with his knowledge and approval, and explained that he was willing for the extension of the credit to them, because they were his regular customers and he could not supply them with the goods they wanted from his other store. This substantially states the entire testimony; and upon it the court directed a verdict for the defendant.

1. Under the allegations of the petition, especially as amended, we think a cause of action is laid. Counsel for Harrell contend that the demurrer should have been sustained because the plaintiff seeks to recover salary at the rate of $60 per month, though, under the contract, he was to have this rate of salary only upon the happening of one or the other of two conditions—either that the business did not prove satisfactory, or that it was destroyed by fire—neither of which is alleged to have occurred. It will be seen, however, that the plaintiff did not predicate his action directly upon the contract, but upon a settlement agreed on between the parties at the mutually satisfactory termination of the contract. In our opinion the sum so agreed upon was in strict accordance with the terms of the contract, for this was the amount to be paid "at any time the business does not prove satisfactory" and the allegation that the arrangement was discontinued by mutual consent can have no other reasonable intendment than that it was satisfactory to quit, and therefore unsatisfactory to continue the business. However, it is unnecessary for us to decide this much, for irrespective of the rights of the parties under the contract, if in a bona fide attempt to settle the matter the parties agreed on this sum, such an accord would be binding. City Elec. Ry. Co. v. Floyd Co., 115 Ga. 655, 42 S. E. 45, and cases therein cited.

2. We infer from the briefs of counsel that our able and impartial Brother of the trial bench directed the verdict for the defendant on the theory that it affirmatively appeared that Mathis had forfeited his rights under the contract by reason of having sold goods on credit. While it is undisputed that the plaintiff violated the terms of the original contract in this respect, still such a violation could be waived by the opposite party, and it is by no means certain, under the evidence, that such a waiver has not taken place. This is a question for the jury. If Harrell, with notice that these credit sales had taken place, still agreed upon the settlement as claimed by Mathis, he cannot repudiate it. Indeed, even in the absence of the contract of settlement, if, during the continuance of the business, Harrell was cognizant of the fact that Mathis was extending credit to customers and made no objection, the jury would be authorized to find that it was his intention to waive this clause of the original contract. Civ. Code 1895, § 3642, provides: "Where parties, in the course of the execution of a contract, depart from its terms and pay or receive money under such departure, before either can recover for failure to pursue the letter of the agreement, reasonable notice must be given the other of intention to rely on the exact terms of the agreement. Until such notice, the departure is a quasi new agreement." There being evidence from which the jury might have found that Harrell had, either in making the settlement or by his conduct pending the continuance of the business, waived the provisions of the contract as to these things, the direction of a verdict was erroneous.

3. Counsel for Mathis further complains that the court erred in excluding his testimony to the effect that Harrell had failed to furnish additional goods for the replenishing of the stock upon request of Mathis. Proof of this fact was entirely irrelevant to the plaintiff's case as laid. Besides, as we construe the contract, the character and quantity of the goods to be furnished was left to Harrell's discretion. If the kind or amount furnished was not satisfactory to Mathis, he had his remedy under the contract. We hold that the court did not err in excluding the testimony. If Mathis were suing upon the original contract, and upon the theory that the contract terminated because the business did not prove satisfactory, it would be competent for him to testify that the business had become unsatisfactory by reason of Harrell's failure to furnish the goods desired; but such is not the case.

Judgment on main bill of exceptions reversed, on the cross-bill affirmed.

DAVIS v. KIRKLAND. (No. 2.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Jan. 11, 1907.)

1. TRIAL—QUESTIONS FOR JURY.

The decision of every issue of fact is exclusively for the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 46, Trial, § 320.]

2. SAME—DIRECTING VERDICT.

A verdict should not be directed, unless there is no issue of fact, or unless the proved facts, viewed from every possible legal point of view, can sustain no other finding than that directed.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 46, Trial, §§ 376-379.]

3. SAME.

Where there is conflict as to any material issue of fact, it is erroneous to direct a verdict.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Douglas; Roan, Judge.

Action by H. Kirkland against Mrs. R. B. Hall (now Davis). Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant brings error. Reversed.

C. A. Ward, P. L. Smith, and W. W. Bennett, for plaintiff in error.

RUSSELL, J. H. Kirkland brought suit against Mrs. R. B. Hall. He asked to recover money paid to her for timber for turpentine purposes. He alleges that he parted with his money upon condition that it should be repaid to him, or to the party who might gain a certain mentioned case then pending in the superior court. He averred that Mrs. Hall (now Davis) lost in that suit and refused to pay him as agreed. During the trial the petition was amended by striking H. Kirkland and inserting the words "H. & D. Kirkland." The defendant filed a general demurrer, and also demurred specially: (1) Because it is not alleged that he took any warranty for his lease, that he was ever ousted therefrom, or attorned to any one else with the consent of the defendant. (2) Because the promise alleged was without consideration. (3) Because plaintiff in no way connected himself with the suit in the Coffee superior court referred to. These demurrers were overruled. We think they should have been sustained; but, in view of what is said hereafter, it is not necessary now to pass on them.

The defendant, in her answer, though she did not remember the exact amount of money paid her, admitted all of the plaintiff's allegations, except as to the promise to repay. She denied absolutely that there was ever such an agreement on her part as was alleged by the plaintiff upon that subject

The controlling, and indeed only, issue of fact raised by the pleadings was whether the defendant promised to return the money to the plaintiff upon the terms and conditions he set up. The judge directed a verdict for the plaintiff, and the defendant excepted.

There was evidence in behalf of the contentions of both parties. The legal quarrel, begun in the pleadings, warmed into a well-drawn battle in the testimony. And the lines of the two armies of fact at issue did not harmonize or fraternize any more after the heavy cannonading of the witnesses than they did at first in the desultory firing along the picket lines of the pleadings. For this reason we think the judge erred in directing a verdict. In a Georgia trial the judge is the impersonation of the law he expounds, construes, and enforces. The jury is the sole arbiter—the only god of battles—to still the conflict and decide the victor, in the struggle between antagonistic testimony marshaled under opposing leaders, each contending for supremacy. After the legal battle lines have, by the permission of the judge, moved from the skirmishing of the pleadings into full action and real conflict between contending statements of fact, he is transformed into a mere representative of a neutral power, friendly alike to both belligerents—the law—who will see that there is no violation of those rules of war, enforced by law, and that neither combatant shall smuggle or receive from the territories of law any contraband of war in the form of illegal evidence. The law, whose representative he is, is friendly to both. But he cannot stop the conflict as long as it proceeds under law's rules of war. Should the two armies meet, panoplied in their pleadings, and either fail to fight, for the total lack of the ammunition of evidence, then, as the representative of his country, the law, he declines to recognize a state of war, and makes no protest when the victor overruns and absorbs his opponent's territory. If they fight until the arbiter of battles of fact, the jury decides the conflict and acclaims the victor, the judge then only embodies in his judgment proclamation to the world at large of the law's recognition and approval of the substantial results accruing to the victorious party.

In the justly ordered universe of jurisprudence there has never been friction between these separate nationalities, the law and the evidence. Law has ever held a protectorate over facts, and guarantees its autonomy. These nations differ greatly in intrinsic characteristics. The law is serene and conservative through the ages, and peace and order are universal in her wide domain. The territory of facts is in well-nigh constant revolution, and its every inhabitant is volatile, erratic, or capricious, and especially inclined to change his costume or disguise himself at the behest of each new forensic tailor. The law does not exercise her suzerainty over the domain of evidence with an iron hand with a view of enforcing absolute peace among its inhabitants, because the very reason for her sovereignty is found in certain, continual, and irrepressible feuds and dissensions. Frequent as are these contentions, and however well calculated to tax the patience of law's ministers, the law will not allow her judge to enter the domain of evidence while it is unsettled, nor even to express an opinion as to which side should win. Since the birth of Magna Charta—one of law's leading citizens—whenever internal dissension or revolution arises in the territory of evidence, to determine which contending faction shall be entitled to the jewel truth, she calls in, as sole arbiter to settle the dispute, the jury, who under law's irrevocable appointment shall settle, in every nook and corner of law's protectorate—the domain of facts—all issues, great and small. The wisdom of all men most enlightened, the experience of those most familiar with the practice, the innate sense of justice, all concur in the opinion that disputes between such varying and variable characters as visit and inhabit the domain of facts cannot be satisfactorily adjusted and finally determined by any umpire more absolutely reliable and just than the jury.

In the very beginning of its official existence this court desires to place itself on record as standing for the exclusive right of the jury to determine every issue of fact in the trial of every case in Georgia. And we so willingly and cordially follow the decisions of the Supreme Court in 63 Ga. 85, and 89 Ga. 571, 16 S. E. 116, that we quote from them, not only as an expression of our views, but also, if possible, to emphasize them as a proper construction and analysis of the separate functions of our judicial system. It is true that the rulings quoted related to grants of new trial, where the jury had passed upon the evidence, while in the present case the complaint is that the court made the verdict instead of the jury; but the principle is the same. In Central R. R. Co. v. Ferguson, 63 Ga. 85, Judge Bleckley says: "The evidence is not conclusive. It pushes the mind into that great pitfall called 'doubt,' and there leaves it. The jury are the best doctors of doubt that we know of." In Richmond & Danville R. Co. v. Allison, 89 Ga. 571, 16 S. E. 116, Judge Gober, delivering the opinion, says: "These dicta could be multiplied indefinitely from the hundreds of cases wherein this point has been considered. This much is offered, not that it is new, but it is profitable. There is no safety, except in standing on the rule. * * * The jury has passed upon the case as presented, and their conclusion is embodied in this verdict. The argument that a verdict is the result of prejudice and bias is one that is easily made. It is the baldest of platitudes, and can be offered in the face of almost any state of facts. It is no concern of the appellate court what verdict is rendered, where such finding is proper and fair from the evidence. The prevailing party who gets a verdict has a property right in it. The court that sets it aside without some sufficient reason forgets the Constitution, which declares that the right of trial by jury shall remain inviolate.

* * * The appellate court, as the expositor of the law, must obey the law. It is bound by the law, as other courts are bound by it. It must follow precedent, as other courts follow it. * * * Courts must take the verdict of juries, when proper from the evidence, as a right conclusion as to what is the truth of a case. * * * Whoever has had any experience with juries must concede that they endeavor to do right. They take questions of fact in a practical way, unimpeded by the legal fetters that restrain a professional mind. They may not find sometimes as a court would find. The reply is: The law has left this work to them. If they do their work fairly under the rules, courts ought not to disturb their verdicts. In 'Trial by Jury,' by Forsyth, he says: 'It was said of Socrates that he first drew philosophy from the clouds, and made it walk upon the earth; and of the civil jury it may be also said that it is an institution which draws down the knowledge of the laws to the level of popular comprehension.' From this standpoint, in a practical way, by practical men, verdicts are made. * * * When we reflect that the ultimate object of all our laws is to put 12 upright and intelligent men in the jury box, before whom the humblest citizen may demand redress for any invasion of his rights, the matter is seen as it is and assumes its true importance."

No principle is better settled in Georgia than that a verdict should not be directed, unless there is no issue of fact, or unless the proved facts, viewed from every possible legal point of view, can sustain no other finding than that directed. In this case the plaintiff swore that the defendant agreed, in a certain contingency, to pay back certain money. The defendant swore just as unequivocally and positively that she made no such promise. It only adds force to the statement to say that both parties were corroborated. In such situations, as remarked by Judge Bleckley, the jury is the only doctor our law will permit to prescribe. "Where the evidence on the controlling issue in a case is conflicting, it is error for the judge to direct a verdict in favor of one of the parties." Colson v. Meyers, 80 Ga. 499, 5 S. E. 504. The paramount right of the jury to decide any issue of fact in every case, in Georgia, is absolutely exclusive of any such prerogative on the part of the judge. The exercise of this power by the jury, unless waived by the parties, is an indispensable requisite of a legal trial in this state, and an invasion of this right (as has been held by our Supreme Court times without number) demands the grant of another trial. It is true that the Code now authorizes verdicts to be directed. "Where there is no conflict in the evidence and that introduced with all reasonable deductions or inferences therefrom demands a particular verdict, the court may direct the jury to find for the party entitled thereto." Civ. Code 1895, § 5331. To the mind of the writer the fact that this section was ingrafted upon the Code by the codifiers, by modification of language used in Hooks v. Frick, 75 Ga. 715 (a case that was itself submitted to a jury, and that after argument by counsel and charge by the court), and not codified (as is usual) from a statute passed by the General Assembly, is quite significant. When, however, the seal of legislative enactment was placed on the entire Code, it became the law.

Speaking for myself, I think that the opinion rendered by Chief Justice Jackson in Manning v. Mitchell, 73 Ga. 665, when he said: "On what principle the case was decided by the court below, we cannot see. Indeed, unless it is a case which is so plain that it would be useless to send it back, it would be done because the court directed the verdict, which, under Georgia practice, it had no power to do"—is in keeping with the principles of our Constitution. And I can hardly believe that this great judge ever expected that his decision on the precise question of directing verdicts, quoted above, would be overturned by his own language, used when the question being discussed was the right of the judge, under "the dumb act," to intimate an opinion on the evidence, and when the court was holding that a judge may, in his charge, assume and assert the existence of any fact proved and not controverted. The doctrine of permitting a judge to direct a verdict originated in affirmances of verdicts in cases where the finding was so absolutely required, under the facts in those particular cases, that for this reason the Supreme Court held the error harmless. One of the stages of this gradual evolution can be seen in Hobby v. Alford, 73 Ga. 791. First considered an error, but not reversible if harmless to the losing party, after many evolutions it finally received legislative sanction in order to economize time. But, if section 5331 be analyzed, the word "may" imports no command. It is merely permissive, and is weighted with the implication that the power is to be most carefully and cautiously exercised in those cases—and those only—in which there is no possibility of doubt or dispute as to the evidence. And the words "no conflict" are so sweeping and full of meaning as to withdraw the permission if there be even the slightest conflict in the testimony. When each proved fact has been subjected to every possible analysis, and there is only one solution which will fuse them into homogeneity; when the light has been thrown on the evidence from every direction, and it presents but one view; when it is certain that no other verdict than that directed could be found or stand—then a court may direct a verdict. And this because the case has resolved itself into a question of law.

Having noted the birth and descent of section 5331, we will say that we shall follow this section (sprung from the union of judicial construction and legislative acquiescence, ushered into our legal world by the midwife of codification, and its paternity only admitted because it finds itself in the household of the Code) as the law, where we are bound to do so, but not a step further. In view of the fact that we hold that the directing of a verdict in the case was such error as demanded a new trial, it becomes unnecessary to consider the various other assignments of error. If error was committed as to any of these, the learned trial judge will no doubt correct it on the next hearing.

Judgment reversed.

(1 Ga. App. 244)

LESTER-WHITNEY SHOE CO. v. OLIVER CO. (No. 73.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Feb. 20, 1907.)

1. BILLS AND NOTES—PRESENTMENT FOR PAYMENT—EFFECT OF DELAY.

In order to hold the payee of a check liable for failure to present it, in the event of the failure of the bank on which it is drawn, the maker of the check must have in bank, subject to the payment thereof at any and all times after the drawing of the check, either funds of his own subject to the check, or some positive agreement or understanding with the bank which will guarantee the payment of the check at such time as it may suit the pleasure, convenience, or interest of the holder to present it.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 7, Bills and Notes, § 1045.]

2. SAME.

Before the payee of a check can be held liable for damages in not presenting the check, it must appear, either directly or from the circumstances of the transaction, that he has accepted the check from the drawer, or that he is under some obligation to do so.

3. SAME—CHECK—CONTRACT OF MAKER.

The issuance of a check includes two guarantees on the part of the maker—that the bank on which the check is drawn is solvent, and that his check will be paid on presentation.

4. SAME.

If the maker of a check has on deposit in a bank money sufficient to pay the same, and the owner fails to present it for payment within a reasonable time, during which time it would have been paid if presented, and the bank fails between the time of drawing and the presentation thereof, the drawer is discharged from liability to the extent of the injury he may have sustained by reason of such failure. The requirement of presentation within a reasonable time on the part of the holder of the check is coupled with the requirement, as to the maker, that the check shall certainly be paid when it is presented.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 7, Bills and Notes, § 1045.]

5. SAME.

If the drawer has no effects in the hands of the drawee, and there is no positive agreement to pay by the drawee, the making of the check will be considered fraud on the part of the drawer, and presentation and notice will be excused.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 7, Bills and Notes, § 1042.]

6. EVIDENCE—DOCUMENTARY—BOOKS OF ACCOUNT—PAYMENT BY CHECK.

The admission of the book of which complaint is made in the fifth ground of the amended motion for a new trial was error. It was not sufficiently identified as one of the books of the bank, nor was it shown who kept it or that it was correctly kept. Talbotton R. Co. v. Gibson, 32 S. E. 151, 106 Ga. 236. But the error was harmless, because, when the defendant attempted to set up his damages accruing by reason of nonpresentation of his check against the claim of the plaintiff, it devolved upon him to show affirmatively that the funds were on hand to meet the check throughout the entire period from the making of the check to the failure of the bank. If the defendant failed in this, he was not entitled to a credit, because a check is not payment until itself paid; and it devolves upon the maker, in the event of its nonpayment, to show why it should be treated as a payment for his benefit.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 20, Evidence, § 1628; vol. 39, Payment, § 87.]

7. ACCOUNT, ACTION ON.

Consequently the correctness of that portion of plaintiff's account which was covered by the check and equal thereto in amount being admitted, and defendant failing to show damage by the nonpresentation of his check, a verdict for the plaintiff was demanded.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Macon; Hodges, Judge.

Action by the Oliver Company against the Lester-Whitney Shoe Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Hardeman & Jones and E. P. Johnston, for plaintiff in error. John P. Ross and Erwin & Callaway, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. The plaintiff (now defendant in error) sued the defendant (who brings this writ of error as plaintiff in error) on an account in the city court of Macon. To part of the account the defendant pleaded failure of consideration, and no complaint is made as to so much of the verdict as relates to that portion of the alleged indebtedness. As to the other portion of plaintiff's account the defendant pleaded plaintiff's failure to present within a reasonable time, and before the failure of the bank on which it was drawn, a check sent by defendant in payment of that part of the account; and the assignment of error is addressed to this portion of the account, and based on the refusal of the trial court to award a new trial thereon.

The third ground of the motion for new trial asserts that the verdict is contrary to law, because "the evidence showed that defendant, on the 9th day of December, 1903, sent by United States mail to Jorolomon Oliver & Co. its check on I. C. Plant's Son Bank for the sum of $214.10, which said check was duly received by the said Jorolomon Oliver & Co., and accepted by it as a payment on said account. At the time defendant sent said check to said Jorolomon Oliver & Co., it had on deposit with said I. C. Plant's Son Bank, subject to said check, a sufficient sum to pay the same, and continuously since said December 9, 1903, it has on deposit with said bank a sufficient sum to pay said check. But so it is that said check has never been presented to said bank for payment, and on May 16, 1904, the said I. C. Plant's Son, Banker, became insolvent, and he has since been duly adjudged a bankrupt. Wherefore defendant says it has paid upon said account the sum of $214.10, and defendant is entitled to have said payment credited upon the account sued on; and by reason of the conduct of said Jorolomon Oliver & Co. defendant has been discharged from liability to the plaintiff upon said account to the extent of $214.10." In the fourth ground it is insisted that the court erred in directing a verdict for the amount of the check. The fifth ground of the motion complains that the court erred in admitting in evidence, over the objection of defendant, certain pages from a book offered in evidence as the ledger of I. C. Plant's Son, Banker—the objection being (1) because the identity of the book had not been established; (2) because it had not been shown to have been correctly kept; (3) because it does not appear who kept it; (4) because the book is not relevant on this hearing, and is the transaction of a third person, whose action and conduct cannot be used to bind the Lester-Whitney Shoe Company in this case; (5) because it does not appear that the Lester-Whitney Shoe Company had anything to do with the keeping of the book. And movant insisted that the admission of this book was distinctly hurtful to the defendant, because, in the absence of said book, there was no evidence to contradict the testimony of L. P. Lester that they had money on deposit to meet the check from the date he gave it until the failure. The sixth ground assigns error in the following charge to the jury: "With reference to the check introduced in evidence, in the opinion of the court as to the law of the case, you will bring in a verdict in any event in favor of the plaintiff in this case for the face value of that check, with interest from the date of it, because in the judgment of the court that is the law of the case, and that will control you in reference to the check. So, whatever your finding may be upon the other branches of the case, you will bring in a verdict in favor of the plaintiff against the defendant for the value of the check with interest from the date of the check." The error, as insisted, is that plaintiff was not entitled to recover the amount of the check as a matter of law, and the court should either have left to the jury the question whether or not the defendant was guilty of fraud towards plaintiff sufficient to relieve the plaintiff of the duty of presenting the check, and whether or not under the circumstances plaintiff was under any necessity or duty to present the check, or should have instructed the jury as a matter of law, under the undisputed facts, defendant had sustained injury to the amount of the check by the failure of the plaintiff to present it.

It appears from the evidence that the defendant gave the plaintiff an order to manufacture certain shoes according to samples; the plaintiff being a shoe manufacturer, and not carrying the shoes in stock. It was an entire contract. The plaintiff manufactured and shipped the shoes, and they were duly received by the defendant. The defendant sought to accept a portion of the shoes and to reject about one-third of them. The plaintiff refused to consent to the partial rescission of the contract, and the defendant retained all of the shoes, but refused to pay for any of them unless the plaintiff would credit the purchase price with the contract price of the shoes the defendant had sought to reject. It appears from the evidence in the record that, "after much controversial correspondence, on December 9, 1903, the parties being still at issue as to the debt due, the defendant tendered the plaintiff its check for $214.10, and the shoes which the defendant desired to reject, and the return of which the plaintiff had refused, in settlement of the matter." The material part of the letter accompanying the check (after again complaining of the shoes) is as follows: "We again tender you a settlement of the matter. We inclose our check on I. C. Plant's Son Bank for $214.10, to pay for the portion of the bill we accepted. Remainder of the goods, to the amount of $101.40, are here subject to your order. They have not been opened since they came in the last time." The plaintiffs had possession of this check from December until May, during which latter month the bank of I. C. Plant's Son, on which the check was drawn, failed. The charge of the court on this subject amounted to the direction of a verdict, and is to be closely scanned. In every case where a verdict is directed, it is at the peril of an invasion of the right of trial by jury. For, as this court held in Davis v. Kirkland, 1 Ga. App. 5, 58 S. E. 209, to direct a verdict was originally always error, and is only sanctioned by the Code where the error is harmless, because, under the evidence in that special case, no other verdict would be right or could legally be found. The whole issue, then, so far as here contested, turns on the questions (1) whether the plaintiff was bound to present the tendered check for payment; and (2) if so, did the defendants suffer such damage by reason of the failure of the plaintiff to present the check as would entitle the defendant to credit for the amount, as though the check had been presented and paid? It was admitted that, if there was damage at all, the measure of the defendant's damage by the nonpresentation was $214.10, the amount of the check. Had the plaintiff accepted the tender of settlement, it would have been bound to present the check for payment within a reasonable time, and it would have been liable for any loss occasioned defendant by its failure so to present the check. Had the plaintiff presented the check for payment, such act would have been an acceptance of the tender of settlement, and the plaintiff would have been bound to accept the return of the objectionable shoes in response to the letter above quoted.

The plaintiff promptly notified the defendant that it would not accept the tendered settlement, and that it would not accept the check for $214.10 and the return of the shoes objected to in settlement of the debt due by defendant, but stated that it would hold the check to give the defendant an opportunity to remit the balance of the debt due. It is manifest that the plaintiff meant to convey to the defendant the information that it would not present the check for payment, or otherwise manifest an acceptance of the tender of settlement made, but would hold the check to await another check to cover the balance the plaintiff claimed to be due on the debt, and would then present both checks for payment. And it is clear that the defendant so understood; for the defendant, on December 19, 1903, in answer to the letter of the plaintiff's agent, giving notice of the rejection of the tendered settlement and the conditional holding of the check, recognized that the plaintiff had rejected the tendered settlement and refused to accept the check, saying, "We offered our check, * * * but the A. H. Oliver Company declined to accept same." Then, did the evidence by any possible construction show that the plaintiff was bound to present the check, or, failing to do so within a reasonable time, thereby entitled defendant to a credit of its amount on plaintiff's account? It is well settled that the failure to make demand within a reasonable time is at the risk of the holder; and some of the authorities go to the length of saying that the onus of showing that the drawer has sustained no loss by the delay lies on the holder. Daniels v. Kyle, 1 Ga. 304. And the charge of the trial court on this subject which was then approved, and which was certified to have been given when the case again appeared in 5 Ga. 245, was as follows: "If the defendant had on deposit in said bank money, or any effects of value, at the time of drawing said check, and the owner thereof failed to present the same for payment within reasonable time, and the bank failed between the time of drawing and the presentation thereof, the drawers were discharged from liability to the extent of the injuries they may have sustained by reason of such failure." To the same effect is Comer v. Dufour, 95 Ga. 378, 22 S. E. 543, 30 L. R. A. 300, 51 Am. St. Rep. 89. This is the rule as to holders; but the antecedent question to be determined is: Was the plaintiff ever, in the sense of the law, a holder, so as to be subject to these well-settled rules? The evidence of both the plaintiff and the defendant, as shown by their letters, demonstrates, without question, that the check was first offered by the defendant in settlement, that it was never accepted by the plaintiff, and that the defendant knew, recognized, and in writing admitted this fact. A check is not payment until itself paid, and, of course, a check declined is not such acceptance as to make the party to whom it is sent, and who expressly refuses to accept it, and who keeps it only while further negotiations are pursued, merely to see if he cannot effect a collection of his entire claim, a holder. If there had been dispute on this proposition, it should have been submitted to the jury. But, as there was none, the charge of the judge directing a verdict as to this portion of plaintiff's claim is not reversible error.

We think it was error to admit the bank ledger in evidence in this case, in the face of the timely objection made; but the burden of showing that there were funds on hand to meet the check was upon the drawer of the check, and if he does not show that there are funds subject to his check at all times after the making of the check, or some other arrangement by which payment of his check is guaranteed at any time the payee may desire to present it, he cannot claim damage against a holder for unreasonable delay in presentation. Leaving out of the case the book erroneously admitted, no proof was adduced on that subject by the defendant, except that he had overdrawn at bank when the check was drawn, and may have overdrawn several times afterwards, instead of proving, as he was bound to do, by something more than mere inference, that it was the duty of the bank to pay this check whenever presented, either out of his money or by express contract to allow an overdraft. We understand the rule in Tomlin v. Thornton, 99 Ga. 585, 27 S. E. 147, just as, no doubt, the learned judge understood it. While the law limits the guaranty of the maker of the check as to the solvency of the bank to a reasonable time, it is perfectly plain that the law does intend that the holder shall find enough money there at any time he may present his check, and all of the time until the bank becomes insolvent, to pay it. "If at the time the check was delivered to the payee the bank was solvent, and held funds of the drawer sufficient to meet it, it would be a fraud for the drawer, after giving a check upon them, to withdraw the amount which should pay it; and as he could not rightfully withdraw the amount, it would be unjust to require that, however long the check holder might permit it to remain, it should be at the drawer's risk." So that we think that there was no error in directing the verdict, because no other verdict could have lawfully been found.

Judgment affirmed.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Waycross; Myers, Judge.

Action by E. H. Crawley against Stricklin & Co. D. C. Stricklin only was served. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants bring error. Affirmed.

J. H. Tipton and J. L. Sweat, for plaintiffs in error. W. F. Crawley, J. L. Crawley, and Leon A. Wilson, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. Crawley brought a suit in the city court of Waycross against Stricklin & Co. (D. C. Stricklin & Co.) on the following draft:

"$1000.00. Micanopy, Fla., 12, 8, 1899.

"At sight, pay to the order of E. H. Crawley one thousand dollars, value received, and charge the same to the account of "Stricklin & Company.

"To the Downing Company, Brunswick, Ga."

Upon the above the following indorsement appears:

"Noted and protested for nonpayment, December 11, 1899.

"E. D. Walters,

"Notary Public, Glynn Co., Ga."

Only D. C. Stricklin was served. Upon the trial the jury rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for the amount sued for. A motion for new trial, based upon the statutory grounds, was filed by the defendant. It was overruled, and thereupon a writ of error was sued out, assigning error upon the overruling of the motion.

The defendants, in their answer to the petition, denied indebtedness, and denied that D. C. Stricklin was a member of the firm of Stricklin & Co. They further pleaded a total failure of consideration, though they admitted the execution of the draft in question and their refusal to pay the same. The answer was not sworn to. The defendants assumed the burden of proof. It was uncontradicted in the evidence, therefore, that the defendants made and delivered the draft sued upon, and there was no dispute that it was given in part payment of some interest, or supposed interest, in a certain tract of land, the appurtenances thereto belonging, the live stock, and commissary, or stock of merchandise, etc., known as the "Coleman Place." There was conflict as to who were to be included as partners in the purchase, and also as to whether any written transfer of the plaintiff's interests was executed and delivered to the purchasers. There was also conflict as to whether the plaintiff had any interest to convey. But upon every disputed point in the case, except as to partnership, and as to whether D. C. Stricklin was a member of the firm of Stricklin & Co. (the signers of the draft), the plaintiff's case was supported by substantial testimony which fully authorized the verdict. Having held, in Davis v. Kirkland, 1 Ga. App. 5, 58 S. E. 209, that it is the exclusive province of the jury to determine all disputed issues of fact, there are really only two questions suggested which require any determination on our part. In the first place, was the loss of the "option" sufficiently shown to authorize the introduction of parol evidence as to its contents? And, secondly, was the membership of D. C. Stricklin in the partnership of Stricklin & Co. sufficiently shown?

With reference to the first question it appeared from the evidence that Crawley & Ellington had taken an option, in writing, on the Coleman property. The option was in the possession of Ellington and in his safe. Crawley testified that he made a written transfer of his two-thirds interest to Stricklin & Ellington and turned the paper over to Ellington. Ellington testified that he put it in his safe, that it was in writing, that it was transferred to himself and Stricklin in writing, and was placed in his safe in his private drawer some seven years ago. He further testified that he had made search for it, and it was not to be found. This showing was made to the court, who thereafter allowed testimony as to the contents of the option or writing to be delivered; and we are not prepared to say that this was error. We think the foundation was sufficiently laid for the admission of parol evidence as to the contents of the lost paper. It is insisted by plaintiff in error that the original option and transfer should have been tendered in evidence, and, if not, a certified copy from the record, and, if it was not recorded, that parol evidence would have been admissible; but the parol evidence must have shown all the essentials of a legal document. This, plaintiffs insist, it failed to do, as the evidence did not show any right or title in the parties giving the option, or a sufficient description of the property, or any attestation by witnesses. We think the evidence establishes a full description of the property to be conveyed, both realty and personalty, and of the right of Coleman & Wilson to sell; for they are shown to have been in possession, and that the maker of the draft was acquainted with the character and extent of that possession. An option, being merely an agreement (upon compliance with certain conditions) to sell and properly convey the property therein described, does not necessarily require attestation. A bond for title is valid without attestation, though it cannot be recorded unless it be attested as prescribed by law.

The second error insisted upon is that the plaintiff should have been required to prove that D. C. Stricklin was a partner of Stricklin & Co. As we have already stated, the defendant's plea was not under oath. The draft being an unconditional contract in writing, the plea must have been under oath before the burden was shifted. Civ. Code 1895, § 5655. And as to partnership: "Partners suing or being sued in their firm name, the partnership need not be proved unless denied by the defendant, upon oath, on plea in abatement filed." Civ. Code 1895, § 2637; Henderson Warehouse Co. v. Brand, 105 Ga. 221, 31 S. E. 551. Under the above-recited section of the Code it is not necessary, where partners are sued in their firm name, that the partnership should be proved, unless denied on oath by a plea in abatement. "In the absence of such, it is too late after the verdict for him to complain, and the verdict cannot be set aside on this ground." Under the ruling in Martin v. Lamb, 77 Ga. 252, 3 S. E. 10 (3), it was the duty of the defendant, D. C. Stricklin, to show, if he could, that he was not a member of the firm of Stricklin & Co. and that his wife was. On the contrary, we think several circumstances shown by the evidence would have fully authorized the jury to believe that he was a partner. The evidence showed that he drew the draft, that it was drawn as from Micanopy, Fla., and that he stated to Ellington that he had two places in Florida, etc. But, however this may be, it was incumbent upon the defendant in the court below to have established the fact of the partnership, inasmuch as his plea was not verified as provided by law. The plea in this case was not verified at all, and certainly, therefore, could be in no better condition than one verified to the best of one's knowledge and belief; and in 77 Ga. 252, 3 S. E. 10, above cited, it was held that "a plea of nonpartnership, sworn to by the defendant to the best of his knowledge and belief, does not cast the onus upon the plaintiffs, but only entitles the defendant to go to the jury and establish his defense."

Upon the subject of consideration the testimony was conflicting, but it does not appear that plaintiff in error did not have an opportunity of getting all that he bargained for. It is undisputed that the plaintiff in error and one Ellington had an option on the Coleman turpentine place originally for 30 days, which then had more than 20 days to run, at the price of $23,000; that they paid $100 for their option. Stricklin agreed to buy a half interest in the place at $28,000 as the price for the whole. If the jury believed the testimony of Crawley, Ellington, and Sharpe, the property to be conveyed was fully described, and included the land making up the Coleman turpentine place on the Satilla river, in Ware county. It included the leases, and the horses and mules, wagons and harness, and commissary stock. And, as the contents of the option were admitted by the defendant in the court below to be known to him, the jury were fully authorized in finding that, had he complied with the terms of the purchase, he could have obtained the property he contracted for. All these issues of fact having been fairly submitted to the jury, who are the only chemists in a case of facts, the court, being satisfied with the verdict, was right in refusing to invade their province by granting a new trial. The judge, as a juror might or might not have found a different verdict; and so might this court in some cases, if impaneled as jurors, have refused to find some verdicts which we are not empowered to set aside. The operation of a jury trial may be likened to that of a weighing, sorting, mixing, and registering machine, so delicately adjusted that it attracts every molecule of evidence and is responsive to every pulsation of the truth, while in turn it is responsible to the law to separate fact from fiction, and correctly registers its verdict on the dial. By the terms of its creation the Court of Appeals is a court for the correction of errors in law and in equity only. It has no jurisdiction whatever to consider errors of fact.

HASTINGS & CO. v. CHRISTOPHER. (No. 285.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. April 25, 1907.)

1. WRIT OF ERROR—REVIEW—VERDICT ON CONFLICTING EVIDENCE.

The settlement of issues of fact is the exclusive prerogative of the jury. The Court of Appeals, by the express terms of its creation, was established for the correction of errors of law and in equity only.

2. SAME.

When enough legal evidence is submitted by both plaintiff and defendant to create a manifest issue as to the material contention of each, or to raise a doubt as to the veracity of any witness in such case, the settlement of such issue of fact, as well as the solution of such doubt, is exclusively within the province of the jury.

3. SAME.

A verdict of a jury, approved by the trial judge, will not be disturbed by this court when it appears (no matter in how many various forms the question may be presented) that the motion for new trial is urged solely on the ground that the verdict is contrary to evidence, unless it be made to appear that the verdict is totally unsupported by the evidence. If there is no evidence to support a verdict, such verdict is, for that reason, contrary to law; and in such case to refuse a new trial would be such error of law on the part of the lower court as that this court could constitutionally correct it, and should do so.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vl. 3, Appeal and Error, §§ 3943, 3950.]

4. SAME.

The Court of Appeals is without jurisdiction to consider an assignment of error addressed solely to the finding of the jury upon issuable facts.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Atlanta; Reid, Judge.

Action by one Christopher against Hastings & Co. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Affirmed.

E. M. & G. F. Mitchell, for plaintiffs in error. Dorsey, Brewster, Howell & Heyman and A. H. Thompson, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. Christopher sued Hastings & Co. in the city court of Atlanta for damages resulting to him from a breach of contract entered into between the parties with reference to the sale of a large quantity of cotton seed, which Hastings & Co. agreed to buy, but which they declined to accept, on the ground that the seed did not come up to the sample by which they were sold. It is insisted with great earnestness by counsel for the plaintiffs in error that Christopher filed no replication denying their plea that the sale was by sample, and that Christopher did not, as a witness, deny that the sale was by sample until after both sides had finished their direct testimony, "when he went upon the stand and testified that the trade was that 'due allowance should be made for defects appearing in a crop lot'"; and counsel argue that if Christopher "had not testified, in rebuttal, to a different sort of a contract from the one on which the case had heretofore been tried, he would have been without evidence to sustain his case," and that "the jury could only have rendered the verdict they did by accepting Christopher's testimony to a different sort of a contract, when he went on the witness stand a second time."

No matter at what stage of the testimony the evidence was introduced, the question of its credibility was solely for the jury. The argument addressed to us could be considered by the jury, but it comes too late when presented here. The only question we can consider in regard to the evidence is that of its legal sufficiency or insufficiency to support the finding reached by the jury. The constitutional amendment creating the Court of Appeals, in its express terms, restricted it to the correction of errors of law and in equity only. If a verdict is without evidence to support it, it is, for that reason, contrary to law, and this court can correct that error; but if the verdict is the settlement by the jury of disputed issues of fact, and if there is any evidence to authorize the finding, this court is without jurisdiction. It is the exclusive prerogative of the jury to settle every issue of fact to be determined; and, where there is an issue of fact, that power of the jury is paramount and exclusive. The trial judge has discretion conferred upon him to review the evidence upon the motion for new trial. This court has no such discretion. We can only determine from the evidence in a case, where there is no evidence to support a verdict which has been approved by the trial judge, that for that reason such verdict is contrary to law. The subject has been fully treated by this court in Davis v. Kirkland, 1 Ga. App. 5, 58 S. E. 209, Stricklin v. Crawley, 1 Ga. App. 139, 58 S. E. 215, and other cases. It is useless to expend argument, labor, or money in prosecuting writs of error directed solely to the fact that the witnesses of the defendant in error were believed in preference to those of the plaintiff in error. Nor will it alter the case when skillful counsel present the matter in varied and various forms. It can be said once for all that this court has neither the power nor the disposition to assume the duty of the jury in determining the credibility of witnesses.

While the plaintiffs in error sustained by their testimony the contention that the cotton seed in question were bought by sample, and that the seed were not up to the sample, still, by a review of the testimony for the defendant in error, it is placed beyond any question that the defendant in error (plaintiff in the court below) was fully entitled to the verdict awarded him by the jury, in case the jury, as they had a perfect right to do, preferred to believe the testimony he submitted. The evidence disclosed that Hastings & Co. are seedmen, dealing in garden and farm seed of all descriptions, and doing a large business in cotton seed. In the summer or early fall of 1904 Christopher was approached at his home in La Grange, Ga., by an agent of Hastings & Co., and asked if he had any of his seed for sale. Christopher replied that he had none of his own growth, but that he controlled a crop lot, which was grown from the Christopher seed. The agent asked him to get him a sample of the seed and take it to Atlanta, and said that, no doubt, he and Mr. Hastings could make a trade about it. The seed that Christopher had in view was the crop for 1904 and 1905, grown by W. F. Hinds, a farmer in Troup county. Christopher thereupon got a sample of seed from Mr. Hinds, took out some of it to take with him to Atlanta, and kept the remainder of the sample at La Grange. He came to Atlanta to see Mr. Hastings, and after a considerable discussion made a trade with Mr. Hastings, as a result of which Hastings agreed to pay him 70 cents per bushel for the entire crop grown on the plantation of Mr. Hinds, to run up somewhere about 3,000 bushels. Hastings had been making very large preparations for the coming season, and for that reason desired credit extended him, which was agreeable to Christopher. It was agreed that one-half the purchase price should be paid the next February, and the balance a little later. There was a dispute between Hastings and Christopher as to the exact terms of the contract. Hastings was to send sacks to sack the seed. Hastings claimed that he bought the seed strictly according to sample. Christopher testified that, while the quality of the seed was evidenced by a sample, it was agreed between the parties that due allowance should be made for a crop lot. It was understood, however, that the seed were not to be picked seed, but were to be as coming from the ginnings. Hastings' contention was that the sample shown him by Christopher was the finest he had ever seen, practically free from faulty seed, and that he was entitled to seed of substantially the same character. Christopher contended that, while they sat talking together, Hastings, either consciously or unconsciously, picked out the faulty seed in the sample he brought to Atlanta and threw them away.

As the season advanced the seed business showed signs of great depression. Cotton went down, and there was not near the demand for cotton seed that Hastings & Co. had expected. They therefore did not ask for delivery. Christopher began calling on Hastings & Co. to give instructions with reference to the seed, and to send some one down to receive them. Hastings & Co. began then writing letters explaining the hard times in their business, and that the seed would probably have to be dumped into an oil mill, and suggesting that Christopher give this direction to the seed, and that they would give their notes, payable at some time off, for the difference between the contract price and the price obtained from the oil mill. This was not satisfactory to Christopher, and finally, on his repeated demands that Hastings & Co. send somebody down to inspect and receive the seed, Hastings & Co. sent a Mr. Holder for that purpose. He went in alone where the seed were, and, after having been in the house 15 or 20 minutes, came out with a small sack of cotton seed, which he undertook to compare with what he claimed to be the sample given him by Hastings & Co. as the sample upon which the trade was based. Holder claimed that the sample seed were better than the seed he had himself taken out of the sacks. Christopher and Hinds claimed that the seed were substantially the same. Holder returned to Atlanta, making the statement to Christopher that the seed were too good to be dumped into an oil mill, and that he was going to endeavor to get Hastings & Co. to hold the seed for the next crop. Upon his return to Atlanta, Hastings wrote a letter rejecting the seed on the ground that they were not up to sample.

On the trial of the case four samples of seed were offered in evidence and considered by the jury: The sample that Hastings claimed was the trade sample, but from which Christopher claims Hastings had picked out the faulty, leaving only the best, seed; a sample that Christopher claimed was part of the sample that he brought with him to Atlanta, but which appeared to have in it a few more faulty seed than the sample Hastings produced in court; the sample that Hastings claimed had been brought to him by Holder, and which seemed to contain a few more faulty seed than any of the other samples; and a sample which was produced by Christopher as a sample taken out of the seed which had been rejected. All of these samples were allowed to go out with the jury, and the evidence showed that all of them were the same general character of seed; some of the witnesses testifying that they looked substantially the same, and some of the defendants' witnesses testifying that what Hastings called his "trade sample" had fewer faulty seed than any of the others, and that the sample which was rejected contained more faulty seed than any of the others. The evidence made it clear that a sample of cotton seed could be manipulated, either by picking out the faulty seed and thus improving the appearance of the sample, or by picking out the good seed and thus injuring the appearance of the sample. The evidence for the plaintiff showed that the seeds tendered were up to sample, and that the trade sample offered by Hastings & Co. had the evidence of having been picked; and Christopher swore that Hastings had picked the faulty seed out of it. The evidence further showed that Hastings stood to lose a considerable sum on account of this contract, and that, when it became evident that he was endeavoring to get out of the contract, it was too late for Christopher to make any other disposition of his seed. The strong preponderance of the evidence was in favor of the plaintiff's contention in the cause. The jury evidently took into consideration all of the circumstances that developed, and properly returned a verdict for the plaintiff.

Judgment affirmed.

CHARLES v. BROOKER. (No. 99.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Feb. 14, 1907.)

APPEAL—REVIEW.

No error of law appearing, this court will not disturb the verdict of a jury, where there is evidence to support their finding. The right of the jury to settle disputed issues of fact is supreme and exclusive. Davis v. Kirkland, 58 S. E. 209, 1 Ga. App. 5. This court was created for the correction of errors of law and in equity. [Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, § 3928.]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Whitfield County; Flite, Judge.

Action by one Brooker against one Charles. Judgment for plaintiff before a justice. From an order overruling the certiorari, plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

J. M. Rudolph and Sam. P. Maddox, for plaintiff in error. George G. Glenn, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. This was a suit on a note in the justice's court, with a verdict by the jury in favor of the defendant. The plaintiff carried the case to the superior court, where his certiorari was dismissed; and this order overruling the certiorari was the only error assigned.

The only portions of the record specified and sent up are the assignments of error stated in the petition for certiorari, the answer of the magistrate, and the order overruling the certiorari and refusing a new trial. It is complained in the petition for certiorari that the justice erred in allowing introduced an extract from a former certiorari, setting out the evidence of the witness Martin Warren; that it should have been excluded, because it was immaterial, irrelevant, and not evidence. As the extract complained of was not specified as material, and therefore was not transmitted to this court, we are, of course, unable to determine whether the evidence objected to was immaterial and irrelevant, or not. And it would be unnecessary for a court to consider that portion of the objection; for, if the words "not evidence" can be considered to have been used instead of the word "inadmissible," then it is autoptical that an extract from a petition for certiorari purporting to set forth the testimony of a witness on a former trial would be inadmissible, in any view of the case, as evidence of any fact stated therein. In the language of the assignment of error, it is "not evidence." But the justice, in his answer, says this statement of error is untrue. And as the magistrate's answer, untraversed, is controlling in determining what actually occurred on the trial, his positive statement that the extract was never admitted or read to the jury sweeps away the only legal hope of the plaintiff to get another trial. Nothing else is left in the case; for the evidence of the defendant, if believed by the jury, fully authorized their verdict.

It appears, from the evidence in the record, that the plaintiff sold the defendant $85 worth of hay belonging to a tenant, in order to collect a $75 debt, and, although the tenant was present at the bargain, neither disclosed to the buyer the truth as to the ownership. The plaintiff was very anxious to sell, in order to get defendant's note, instead of his claim on his tenant debtor or the hay which he volunteered to help him sell. The tenant wanted to sell the hay so as to pay his debt. The defendant knew nothing of these deals between the plaintiff and his debtor. He testified: "I bought the hay from Mr. Charles, and if Dukes (the tenant) had anything to do with it I did not know it." He was not willing to buy the hay unless it could remain where it was until later, when he could move it. He would never consider the question of buying until the plaintiff stated that it could stay there, and assured him (according to the testimony of defendant) that it would be safe, and that nothing would damage it, except fire. The defendant paid, in lumber, $17.91, a cow taken at $20, and cash $25, on the note. The defendant left the hay where he purchased it, and the answer proceeds: "After I had gone, somebody turned some cattle in the field where the hay was, and they ate and ruined all the peavine hay, and did some damage to the rough hay. The whole damage was $30, or more." It appeared, from the evidence of the plaintiff himself, that the cattle were turned in the field where the hay was, by an arrangement with the very tenant whose hay had been sold to enable plaintiff to transform his debt into the note against the defendant.

This court cannot review the findings of juries on issues of fact, unless, as a matter of law, a verdict has no evidence to support it. Therefore we can only say that the assignment of error that "the verdict is contrary to evidence and the law of the case" is not sustained. We heartily indorse the general principle urged by the diligent counsel for plaintiff in error with reference to the maintenance of right, regardless of the number of trials. If it appeared to this court that any material error of law had deprived plaintiff in error of any legal right, it would be a matter not to be considered by us that the case had been twice tried in the justice's court and passed upon by jury, and twice taken to the superior court by certiorari. No number of wrongs make a right. Our decision is based upon the record of the one trial under review, and upon what is legally disclosed by that record, and nothing else. Judged by the record, we are not at liberty under the law, to order another trial in this case merely to give either party another chance. There must be somewhere and somehow an end to litigation. And though the amount involved, no matter how small, shall, we hope, never even incline us to shrink from or neglect the most careful and conscientious scrutiny of every error alleged and sought to be corrected, yet when we find no error, we can but note a comparison between the labor and the reward. With a difference between the parties of little more than $20, we think this case is one of which it can well be said that it is "a humming bird with all the plumage of a peacock."

Judgment affirmed.

HAINES v. CHAPPELL. (No. 126.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. March 22, 1907.)

1. LANDLORD AND TENANT—DISTRESS—PROCEDURE.

When the counter affidavit to a distress warrant is dismissed, there is no case before the court. The dismissal of the counter affidavit carries with it the replevy bond. There can be no judgment entered; for the distress warrant, without the counter affidavit, is already a judgment and fi. fa.

2. BAILMENT—CONVERSION BY BAILEE.

Where a check is deposited in aid of a bond and to strengthen the security, the transaction is a bailment. The application of the check to any other purpose than that for which it was deposited is a conversion on the part of the bailee, and entitles the bailor to recover by trover the check, or the value thereof, with interest.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 6, Bailment, §§ 64, 65.]

3. SAME—DUTIES OF BAILEE.

The bailee is such an agent of the bailor as that he is required, not only to use the property for the special object only for which he was intrusted with it, and in conformity with the purposes of the trust, but to act in good faith where the interests of his principal are concerned.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Dublin; Burch, Judge.

Action between one Haines and one Chappell, as administrator. From the judgment, Haines brings error. Reversed.

William Faircloth and Hines & Jordan, for plaintiff in error. George W. Williams and Ira S. Chappell, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. Haines brought an action in trover against Chambers to recover a check for $82.50. Chambers defended by denying all the allegations of the plaintiff's petition. On the trial the jury found in favor of the defendant. The plaintiff moved for a new trial on the statutory grounds, the motion was overruled, and by writ of error we are asked to review the judgment on the motion for new trial.

It appears, from the evidence, that one Dent swore out a distress warrant against one Guyton, and that Haines (the plaintiff in this case) signed a replevy bond as security for said Guyton, who had been distrained for $82.50. The defendant in trover was the bailiff who levied the distress warrant. It appears that, some question having arisen as to the solvency of the replevy bond, Haines, in order to strengthen the security, gave the check which is the subject-matter of this suit. The understanding between Haines and the bailiff (now defendant) was that the latter was to hold the check, with the bond, as a bond, until the final determination of the distress warrant between Dent and Guyton, and, if Guyton lost on his defense, then he was to use the check in settlement of the distress warrant. The property levied upon, at the time that plaintiff gave the replevy bond and the check, consisted of 333 bundles of fodder, 25 bushels of corn, and 573 pounds of seed cotton, and also one mouse-colored mule. This property was released when Haines went security on the bond and gave his check. It appeared, further, from the evidence, that there had been a former levy of the distress warrant upon two bales of cotton, one weighing 470 pounds and the other 502 pounds, which levy had not been dismissed. It further appeared that in his counter affidavit to the distress warrant, which was produced in evidence, Guyton denied the indebtedness, and claimed that the same had been fully paid off. Upon the trial of the distress warrant the counter affidavit was dismissed. Guyton certiorari'd the case, and in the superior court the certiorari was overruled. Counsel for Dent thereupon brought a rule against Chambers, as constable, alleging that he had had placed in his hands a distress warrant in favor of B. J. Dent against Bill Guyton on September 16, 1902, with instructions to make the money, $82.50, by levy and sale of two bales of lint cotton made on the premises of the plaintiff in the distress warrant, and the property of the defendant, Guyton; that said Chambers, constable, failed and refused to levy the distress warrant on said cotton, but, on the contrary, without authority from plaintiff, sold said cotton to J. R. Dent, taking a check upon a bank, payable October 11, 1902, which check was not paid, but payment of same refused upon its presentation by Chambers; that Chambers has never made said money, and thereby petitioner is damaged $82.50. The defendant constable answered: It is true that he had the distress warrant placed in his hands, and now has it. He does not admit or deny that the two bales of cotton were pointed out to him, or were raised on plaintiff's premises by Bill Guyton, but admits that plaintiff pointed out certain property for him to levy upon. He denies that he refused to levy the distress warrant. He admits that he accepted the check for $76.16, of which payment was refused. He further says that he levied the distress warrant on certain mules as the property of Bill Guyton, and Bill Guyton made affidavit before J. T. Chambers, the justice of the peace having jurisdiction, denying that he owed plaintiff on rent any amount for 1902, and then and there tendered him (the constable) bond in manner and form prescribed by law, and deposited with him $82.50, the amount of said distress warrant, to be paid to plaintiff in the event he (plaintiff) won his cause; that he (the constable) went with plaintiff to seize said property, being two bales of cotton, and take it to his house, when plaintiff refused to allow him to seize it, stating that he preferred that he would take bond for it, and J. R. Dent claimed then to have purchased it for value before he had notice of plaintiff's lien, and defendant then accepted the check from J. R. Dent aforesaid, payment of which was afterwards refused; that he was informed and believed that J. R. Dent had so purchased the cotton in good faith, and that the same was not subject to distress warrant. He further answered that said case before the aforesaid justice of the peace was decided adversely to Guyton, who certiorated the cause to the superior court, where the same is now pending, and that he (the constable) has in his hands the said sum of $82.50, and is ready to pay the same over under order of court. Upon this evidence the jury found in favor of the defendant, and the judge refused a new trial.

We think that the plaintiff is entitled to a new trial, and that the overruling of his motion, under the evidence submitted, was error. This court stands unequivocally committed to the doctrine that the jury are arbiters of all issues of fact. Davis v. Kirkland, 1 Ga. App. 5, 58 S. E. 209. But where there is no evidence which, when applied to the law pertinent to the cause, will support the verdict, this lack of evidence constitutes an error of law. Under the undisputed evidence it cannot be questioned that the check of Haines was deposited with the bailiff as a bailment. "A bailment is a delivery of goods or property for the execution of a special object, beneficial either to the bailor or bailee, or both, and upon a contract, express or implied, to carry out this object and dispose of the property in conformity with the purpose of the trust." Civ. Code 1895, § 2894. The bailee becomes, therefore, such an agent of the bailor as that he is required not only to use the property for the special object only for which he was intrusted with it, and in conformity with the purpose of the trust, but also to act in good faith with the bailor and his interests. The written receipt, as well as the testimony of the defendant himself, showed that the check was deposited as a bond for replevin in the matter of B. J. Dent v. Bill Guyton, distress for rent. This was the special object for which the check was intrusted to the constable, and yet, in his answer to the rule, the constable answered that he had in his hands the sum of $82.50, without informing the court that the counter affidavit, the bond, and consequently the check deposited, according to the terms of the receipt, as a bond, had all been dismissed. Certainly, if either this plaintiff or the constable should suffer, it should be the constable. Furthermore, the rule which the officer was called upon to answer required him to show cause why he had not levied upon two certain bales of cotton, or why, having levied upon the cotton, he had not made the money out of it; and it appears that he had levied upon it and sold it, without authority of law, for a worthless check; and it appears plainly to us that after this action he determined to save himself by converting the plaintiff's check to his own use, for, in disposing of the check in a manner not authorized by the terms of the agreement under which he received it, this disposition amounted to a conversion, which at once terminated the bailment and the defendant's right of possession, and entitled the plaintiff, by trover, to recover his check or the value thereof.

The defendant insists, however, that the certified check was not deposited with him as a bond, nor as strengthening a bond, but as a conditional payment of the distress warrant in the event that the case went in favor of the plaintiff in the distress warrant. We find no such evidence in the record. The receipt taken at the time, as shown by the brief of evidence, stated that the check was deposited as a bond for the replevin in the matter of B. J. Dent v. Bill Guyton, distress for rent, and that, if Bill Guyton finally lost the case, A. B. Chambers would have the check to indemnify him and apply it to the payment of claim for rent. This receipt, being in writing, afforded, under a well-known rule, the best evidence of contract of bailment; but, to place the matter beyond any dispute, the record gives the testimony of the defendant himself, as follows: "I agreed [to release the property], thinking that money would be a legal bond." There was, therefore, no evidence on the part of either this plaintiff or the defendant to contradict the purpose of the bailment, as contended for by the plaintiff, that it was to take the place of the replevin bond. When the counter affidavit was dismissed, the plaintiff had no case, and a judgment for the plaintiff for the amount of rent claimed could not be rendered. So that if, as insisted by counsel for defendant, the check was deposited as a conditional payment of the rent, the position of the constable would be no better than if it is assumed (as is shown by the evidence) that it was deposited to strengthen the replevin bond; for constables, like other citizens, are presumed to know the law, and if this constable had acted with the good faith imposed by law upon him as regards his bailor, and had answered, in response to the rule against him, that he had had deposited in his hands a check for $82.50, and had attached thereto a copy of the receipt which he was required to sign before he received plaintiff's certified check, instead of answering that he had $82.50 in his hands (though it was more than three months before he collected the check), we hardly think that upon this statement of the facts any judgment would have been entered up against him for $82.50, though there might have been a judgment entered up against him for the value of the two bales of cotton, which he levied upon, as appears by the record, on September 16, 1902, more than two months before the levy which is the occasion of this suit, and which, if the constable had not, without any authority of law, sold for a check which was worthless, might have fully paid the claim of the plaintiff in the distress warrant. In collecting the check and paying the money therefrom, not on the bond which the plaintiff in error had signed, and to further secure which he had given his certified check (for this bond had been dismissed with the counter affidavit), but applying the check to relieve himself from a rule brought for an apparent dereliction of duty, more than two months before the bailment of the plaintiff in error, the defendant in error was clearly guilty of a conversion; and for this conversion the plaintiff was entitled to recover his check or the value thereof, with hire.

If there was any question of conflict in the evidence as to any issue which could lawfully be presented, the verdict of the jury would remain undisturbed. But we are unable to overrule the well-settled principle that, when a counter affidavit is out of court, the entire case goes out with it (Anders v. Blount, 67 Ga. 41; Habersham v. Eppinger, 61 Ga. 199; McCulloch v. Good, 63 Ga. 519), and cannot repeal section 2894 of the Civil Code of 1895, nor find in the record any evidence in conflict with that of the defendant in error himself as to his understanding that he agreed to release the property, thinking that the money would be a legal bond, and yet (though an agent of the plaintiff in error) applied it to relieve himself from a rule involving a different levy. We must, therefore, reverse the judgment of the court below and order a new trial.

Judgment reversed.

CRANKSHAW v. SCHWEIZER MFG. CO.
(No. 33.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Jan. 24, 1907.)

1. WRIT OF ERROR—REVIEW—QUESTIONS OF FACT—VERDICT ON CONFLICTING EVIDENCE.

The verdict was warranted by the evidence. Where the error assigned is that the verdict was without evidence to support it, and there is any evidence to support it, the verdict should not be interfered with, unless there is further complaint that (a) some ruling of the court improperly withheld evidence from the jury, or (b) illegally permitted the jury to consider evidence which should not have been submitted to them, or (c) that the court's instructions, when applied to the evidence, were erroneous, inapplicable, or misleading.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, § 3935.]

2. SAME.

In this case the proper issue was submitted to the jury, there was conflict in the evidence, and the verdict as to the issues of fact was fully authorized.

3. TRIAL—COURSE AND CONDUCT—RIGHT TO OPEN AND CLOSE.

In order to entitle the defendant, in an action arising ex contractu, to the opening and conclusion of the argument, the defendant must, before the introduction of any evidence, admit facts authorizing a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for the amount claimed in the petition, without imposing upon the plaintiff necessity for proof of any kind. The admissions of the defendant in this case did not concede a prima facie case.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 46, Trial, § 50.]

4. SAME.

Compliance with the warranties in this case was essential to a recovery, and to allege a breach of this material part of the plaintiff's contract destroys the admission of plaintiff's prima facie case.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 46, Trial, § 50.]

5. EVIDENCE—OPINION EVIDENCE—SUBJECT OF.

There was no error in admitting the testimony of which complaint is made in the second ground. The witness had the right to express an opinion, after having stated the facts from which he deduced it, and also to give his opinion as an expert, as appears from the evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 20, Evidence, §§ 2343, 2349.]

6. SALES—ACTIONS—BREACH OF WARRANTY—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

The court did not err in refusing to allow the questions set forth in the third and fourth grounds. The questions asked referred to the operation of jewelry cases in Field's store, and had no relation to the similarity in appearance between the jewelry cases involved and the Field cases.

7. EVIDENCE—ADMISSIONS—BY AGENT—PAROL EVIDENCE—CONTRADICTION OF WRITTEN CONTRACT.

There was no error in rejecting testimony as to the alleged statements as set forth in grounds 5 and 6, nor in rejecting the letters referred to in the seventh ground.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 20, Evidence, §§ 898, 2030, 2035.]

8. WRIT OF ERROR—REVIEW—HARMLESS ERROR—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE.

The question and answer of which complaint is made in the eighth ground are objectionable for irrelevancy, but neither could have been harmful to the defendant.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, § 4153.]

9. EVIDENCE—ADMISSIONS—BY AGENTS.

There was no error in excluding the testimony quoted in the ninth ground; it not appearing from the evidence that that person whose declarations were sought to be proved was an agent of the defendant, authorized to speak, as to these things, in his behalf.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 20, Evidence, §§ 887-892.]

10. SAME.

The court properly excluded the questions referred to in the tenth ground; the evidence not showing that the alleged declarant was an agent of the defendant, authorized to bind the defendant by his statements. And there was no error in rejecting the letter written by the defendant after the arrival of the jewelry cases. If the letter was admissible on the theory of notice, its exclusion did no harm in this case, because it was conceded that the defendant always claimed that there were certain defects in the cases he bought.

11. TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—SUFFICIENCY.

The charge of the court gave the defendant the benefit of every contention which he was legally entitled to have considered by the jury. It could, perhaps, have been more full and specific with relation to some matters therein presented; but the defendant cannot complain that an abstract principle of law pertinent to the issue was not given in charge, when the court in the charge made clear the specific application of the principle by enumerating all defenses set up by him, and stated to the jury that they should find for the defendant on any of them which was proved to their satisfaction.

12. SALES—WARRANTY—IMPLIED FITNESS FOR PURPOSE INTENDED.

That the plaintiff knew the purpose for which the articles purchased by the defendant were to be used was immaterial in this case. "If an order be given to a manufacturer or dealer for a specific article of a known and recognized kind and description, and if the defined and described thing be actually supplied, there is no implied warranty that it will answer the purpose for which it is intended to be used. The only implied warranty or condition of the contract is that it will conform to the description and be of good workmanship and material."

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 43, Sales, §§ 772-776.]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Atlanta; Calhoun, Judge.

Action by the Schweizer Manufacturing Company against one Crankshaw. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

The suit was for a balance alleged to be due upon a contract for installing certain wall showcases in the defendant's storehouse. The defense, as stated in the plea, was "that it was made a stipulation and warranty, attached to and growing out of said contract, that the said cases were to work perfectly smooth and without friction; that said cases were to be so made and installed as to support bric-a-brac, clocks, and heavy articles of sale of various natures; that the doors were to be arranged hung with bicycle chains, weights, and pulleys, weights to slide in pockets in back of the case, work to be finished in best style and workmanship to match sample of store-finish work furnished by defendant, and the said cases to be installed without injury or damage to or disfigurement of defendant's cases; * * * that the said wall cases were not installed in the manner stipulated in said contract; that said cases did not work smoothly and free from friction; that great injury and disfigurement were done to the defendant's cases in the installment of said cases; that some of the sashes of said cases warp from side to side and stick; that the side and top rails of said sashes were rubbed in many places; that the doors were not arranged to slide up, hung with bicycle chains, weights, and pulleys, weights to slide in pockets in back of the cases, but, on the contrary, were hung with ordinary trunk rollers, and in such manner as with great difficulty to be moved up and down; that the shelves were so heavy and brackets so light as to be incapable of supporting articles of any weight or breakable articles of any character with safety; that the sashes were warped and ill-fitted to the cases, and various and other defects exist in said cases and in the installment thereof;

* * * that great expense and trouble has been occasioned by virtue of the necessity of calling, at inconvenient times, defendant's employes from their ordinary and regular pursuits to assist in moving the sashes in said cases up and down, great inconvenience caused customers in inspecting and examining articles exhibited in said cases, and great loss sustained in the inability of the defendant to display in said cases his heavy articles and many delicate articles of breakable character, because the cases were and are so illy constructed and installed as to be incapable of supporting articles of weight or articles easily broken"; and that by reason of the failure of the plaintiff to comply with the contract, "and to carry out the stipulations thereof and the warranties connected therewith, defendant has been injured and damaged in the sum of $1,000, besides the sum of $720.41 alleged by [the plaintiff] to be due on said contract." Under the evidence and the charge, the jury found for the plaintiff the amount sued for. The defendant excepted to the overruling of his motion for a new trial. For the grounds of the motion and the other material facts, see the opinion.

Payne, Jones & Jones, for plaintiff in error.
Rosser & Brandon, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. 1, 2. The plaintiff in error assigns the refusal of a new trial, upon his motion and amendments thereto, to be the error which should be corrected. The first three grounds of the motion are in the stereotyped form commonly called the "general grounds," and sometimes known as a "skeleton motion"; but they call for a complete review and weighing of the evidence as it appears in the record, which in this case is by no means brief. We have taken the pains to travel deliberately more than once through the very voluminous record in this case and to examine its contents most critically. We have been enlightened on some of the principles of natural philosophy as applied to cabinetmaking, and have become conversant with some phases of the jewelry business. This court, however, being restricted to the correction of errors of law and in equity, the only legitimate purpose of our journey through the evidence embodied in the record is the discovery of errors of law, and especially to determine, so far as the three original grounds of the motion are concerned, whether the refusal of a new trial is an error of law, because the verdict is without evidence to support it. In considering the three general grounds alone, it may be stated as a general rule that, if the evidence is sufficient to support the verdict, it should not be interfered with, unless (a) some ruling of the court improperly withheld from the consideration of the jury evidence which they should have had, and which might have contributed to a different result; or (b) unless the judge illegally permitted matters to be considered by the jury which were foreign to the true is sues, and which he should not have allowed them to use in making their verdict; or (c) unless the court's instructions to the jury in the charge were erroneous, inapplicable, or misleading. We use the word "matters" in subhead "b," for the reason that it may include, in some cases, not only testimony of witnesses, matters of proof, but also various matters of fact, such as improper conduct of the court, counsel, parties, officers of court, spectators, or the jury themselves. This statement is not exhaustive, and, of course, has reference peculiarly to motions based on ordinary general grounds. It has no application to motions dependent on refusals to grant continuances on newly discovered testimony, or other extraordinary grounds, nor to a ground based on the denial of a right—such as is insisted on in this case—of opening and concluding. Considering the general grounds first, taken by themselves, it is our opinion that there was no error in refusing a new trial upon either contention of the skeleton motion, or upon all three of them taken as a whole. We therefore proceed to consider the several grounds presented in the amendment. These are 13 in number.

3, 4. In the first the movant insists that he was wrongly deprived of the right to open and conclude the case in the argument before the jury. He was the defendant, and the justness of his claim to the opening and conclusion is to be determined by the extent of his admissions. Did he admit a prima facie case? It cannot be doubted that this question is to be answered by a comparison in this case of the allegations in the petition with the answer thereto. We think the placing of petition and plea in parallel columns demonstrates that a prima facie case was not admitted.

Petition.

The plaintiff entered into a contract with the defendant to furnish him four wall cases for the sum of $2,800. The cases were delivered and installed in the store of the defendant on April 21, 1903. The plaintiff has fully complied with its contract. The defendant has paid $2,079.59, leaving due $720.41, besides interest, payment of which has been refused on demand.

Plea.

The cases referred to were delivered and installed in the defendant's store; but the petition does not set up the contract between the parties. The real contract is set up in paragraph 5 of the answer. The cases were not duly set up. The plaintiff did not fully comply with its contract, and the defendant is not indebted in any sum. Demand for payment was made, and rightly refused.

And the remainder of the plea mentions many other items in respect to which a contract was not complied with. We do not think that to say "a" contract has been made, but has failed in any material or essential particular, can be construed as an admission that the contract was fully complied with. It is possible for cases to arise, and for the petition to be so skillfully framed, that to admit the plaintiff's case would bring, as an inevitable result, a verdict for the plaintiff; and it is perhaps true in this case. Nevertheless the law requires such an admission of a prima facie case as would entitle plaintiff to recovery without proof of any material fact before the defendant can gain the conclusion. Abel v. Jarratt, 100 Ga. 732, 28 S. E. 453; Reid v. Sewell, 111 Ga. 880, 36 S. E. 937; Phoenix Ins. Co. v. Gray, 113 Ga. 433, 38 S. E. 992. The original petition in this case seeking to recover upon a contract between the parties, before there could be a recovery for the full sum sued for, it must have been either admitted or proved (1) that the contract sued upon was in fact made (2) and that the plaintiff had fully complied with that contract. The plea denies both these defenses. It disputes the contract sued on being the one made, and affirms that it was not complied with. The very essential allegations of the petition are negated. It denies that the contract was ever complied with, and denies that there is any sum due. The admission that "a" contract was made does not meet the requirements, when it is insisted that it was only partly complied with. The main body of the contract cannot be admitted for the purpose of making a prima facie case, and at the same time the plaintiff's case be destroyed by showing a breach of warranties inevitably forming a part of the contract. Every stipulation and warranty is as much a part of the contract as the consideration is, and just as inseparable as the names of the parties. "Often they are the heart and soul of the whole contract, without which neither party could have been induced to contract." We think it clear that defendant was not entitled to the opening and the conclusion. The opening and conclusion in a case on trial before a jury is a very important and substantial right, and its improper refusal is ground for new trial; and in this case to have taken this right away from plaintiff, and to have awarded this advantage to the defendant, would, we think, have afforded the plaintiff just ground of complaint.

b. In the second ground of the amended motion the plaintiff in error insists that the court erred in admitting in evidence, over the objection of the defendant, and in refusing to exclude on motion of the defendant's counsel, the following testimony: "These bent plate glass doors will never work as smoothly as a straight door." And the further testimony: "The friction is more in a bent door than in a straight door. There is no way under heaven to have it otherwise." And the further testimony: "In case it [the sash] is stuck [in moving it up and down] a little, you simply adjust the door to a level, and down it comes. That is the way those doors work, and work beautifully. They could not be made to work better." At the time of the introduction and admission in evidence of said testimony, the defendant moved to exclude it, on the ground that it consisted in the mere conclusion of the witness, and was in effect an abrogation of the functions of the jury. The court overruled said objection. The only objection offered at the time to the inroduction of this testimony was that the statements were mere conclusions of the witness. This objection was made to the testimony as a whole. The court did not err in declining to rule all of it out. Part of such testimony is clearly a statement of facts. But, even if it were all a conclusion of the witness, we do not think the court erred in overruling the objection, because the witness giving the testimony was, as appears from the evidence, an expert of skill and long experience in the construction of such jewelry cases, and therefore entitled to give his opinion for whatever the jury might think it worth. Civ. Code 1895, § 2587. And, further, it appears that the witness Johnson had supervised the construction of these cases, and before expressing these opinions had already given all the necessary facts upon which he based his opinion, and upon the statement of facts, even if he was not an expert, he was entitled to express an opinion, the weight of which was to be determined by the jury upon consideration of the facts previously stated. Civ. Code 1895, § 5285. Even if the statement, "They could not be made to work better," be objectionable as being an opinion even beyond the limits of expert knowledge, a casual examination of the very voluminous evidence in this case leads us to the conclusion that the introduction of this evidence could not have influenced the verdict. We think, however, there can be no doubt that the court admitted the evidence on the proof of the witness's expert knowledge, and it is our opinion that there was no error in so holding.

G. The third and fourth grounds of the amended motion for a new trial complained that the court below erred in refusing to permit defendant's counsel to ask the witness Johnson questions with respect to the resemblance or lack of resemblance between certain jewelry cases in Marshall Field & Co.'s store and those placed in the defendant's store in Atlanta. The court had admitted in evidence, as part of the contract, a letter of the defendant, in which it is specifically stated that the cases to be installed in defendant's store were "to look exactly like those we saw in Marshall Field's, with columns and all." It was therefore competent to prove that the cases were to look like Field's with columns and all. The questions to which answers were sought were as follows: (1) "Are there any appearances of friction or biting of the slides or ends when the sash comes down in those cases?" (2) "When the doors were pushed open in those cases, did the doors stop while being pushed up and down?" It is perfectly clear that the second question would have elicited an answer, not as to the appearance of the cases, but as to their operation, or how they worked; and, for reasons hereafter to be stated, we think the action of the cases in use is immaterial, if they were made and set up according to the specifications of the contract, of good material, and constructed in a workmanlike manner. And while the word "appearances" is used in the first question above, it is manifest, by the words that follow, "friction or biting of the slides or ends when the sash comes down," that the word "appearances" only relates to such effects as were caused by the working or operation, and does not refer to their looks or resemblance as originally constructed. Furthermore, it does not appear in the evidence that the desire expressed by the defendant that his cases should look like Marshall Field's was agreed to by the plaintiff, and, unless this had been expressly done, the purpose of defendant that they should look like Field's cases must yield to the plans and specifications signed and agreed upon by both parties, even though under the plans and specifications agreed upon there should result a dissimilarity of appearance. Even granting that by the plaintiff's silence it acquiesced in the stipulation that the cases look like Field's, and that this similarity became an additional obligation of the contract, and that defendant was entitled to similarity in appearance, the two cases might look exactly alike, and yet the doors in one might work smoothly, and the doors in the other might not do so. In other words, to show by their appearance or otherwise that the doors did not work smoothly and accurately would not result in showing dissimilarity in appearance.

7. In the fifth and sixth grounds of his amended motion the defendant insists that the court erred in refusing to allow him to ask the plaintiff's agent the following question: "Did Mr. Swanson tell you that he had any difficulty in installing said cases?" And further: "Did Mr. Swanson make any statement in your presence that, if he knew it was a job like that, he would not have come here [to Atlanta]?" These questions were asked with the purpose, no doubt, of eliciting information with respect to the unworkmanlike construction of the cases, and evidence upon that subject was material and proper; and the statements of an agent while actually engaged in the business of his principal within the scope of his agency are generally admissible. But it must first appear from the evidence that the agent is speaking within the scope of his authority, and authorized to bind the principal by his sayings, before the principal can be held bound thereby; and, so far as the evidence discloses, the cases were in a state of complete manufacture before they were sent to Atlanta. The witness Swanson occupied no official position with the plaintiff company, and his sole duty was to set the cases up in the defendant's store; and the evidence further shows that the witness Johnson (the agent of the company) was not in Atlanta, but in Chicago, during the whole of the installation. But, even if that were not true, Swanson was not an officer of the corporation, but simply its laborer, and his conversation with an officer of the defendant company after the termination of the contract would not be heard as against the plaintiff's interest; and if the statements of Swanson are a part of the res gestæ, the statements in connection with his work, even when a part of the res gestæ, cannot be heard against his employer, in the absence of any evidence showing that he was so authorized to speak, and acting in such capacity as to bind the employer by his utterances. Nor was there error in excluding from the evidence the letters which defendant sought to introduce. A critical examination of each and all of them demonstrates that the letters which the judge refused to admit in evidence were mere negotiations and counter propositions. All of the prior negotiations were merged in the proposals and specifications of the plaintiff, when accepted by the defendant; and we presume that the trial judge admitted the letter from plaintiff and one from defendant, which went to the jury, mainly for the purpose of showing the transmission and the acceptance of the contract or proposal which was submitted in writing. The letter of the plaintiff says: "We inclose specifications, and will send measurements of the inside of the drawers, etc., as soon as possible. Specification is in duplicate; and if you will sign the original, and return to us, this will constitute a contract." In reply defendant wrote: "I received this morning specifications and contract, and return herewith signed copy." With the specifications signed the contract would have been complete without more; but plaintiff in his letter asked whether the shape of the glass shelves was to follow the curve of the case or be straight on front edge, and also asked which color to follow (it appearing that a mahogany sample sent by defendant had a different color on each side). The defendant, in replying, said nothing about the mahogany, but selected "the shelves curved to go with swelled sash." It is evident, therefore, that there was but one point outside of the specifications which was thereafter agreed to by the parties, to wit, the curved shelves, although the defendant asks the plaintiff to "make these cases to look exactly like those we saw in Marshall Field's," etc. The plaintiff gave the defendant an option in the selection of the shape of the shelves, and was bound to act upon defendant's expressed choice in that respect as to them; but the evidence nowhere discloses that plaintiff ever agreed to make the cases look exactly like those he saw in Marshall Field's, unless consent may be construed from silence. If silence gives consent, the plaintiff added to the original contract the additional stipulations contained in defendant's letter inclosing the signed contract. In any event it is perfectly clear that all of the letters excluded by the trial court merely presented proposals, none of which were agreed to by both parties; that there was no meeting of the minds, nothing binding upon either party, no definite understanding, no contract.

8. We fail to see the relevancy of the following question, which the court permitted to be asked of the defendant: "Did not you know there were certain physical laws involved by which one glass could not be made to work as easily as two?" We are aware that great latitude is allowable in cross-examination; but it seems to us that the true question is not what the defendant knew of physical laws, nor what was the purpose to which he intended to apply that knowledge, nor what was the purpose to which he intended to put the cases which he proposed to purchase. But the real question was: Did he get what he ordered and what plaintiff contracted to supply? For this reason we think the objection of defendant's counsel was erroneously overruled. But in our view of the case the error is too harmless to work a new trial.

9, 10. The defendant complains in the ninth ground that the court erred in excluding the following question and answer: "Did Mr. Miller make any statement in your presence, or in Mr. Johnson's presence, in regard to said cases?" Answer: "Yes, he would not undertake to fix those cases for less than $500." Counsel for defendant insists that as the statement of Miller was made in the presence of plaintiff's agent, U. S. Johnson, showing certain defects in the case and in regard to the expense necessary to remedy its defects, the statement constituted an admission on the part of the agent as to the truth of the same, in that plaintiff's agent stood by and did not deny the statement, though it called for an admission or denial, and that he therefore had thereby acquiesced in the same; and, further, that Miller, who made the statement in examining and overlooking said cases, was acting for and in behalf of the plaintiff, and as such his statements were such admissions as were entitled to go to the jury. There are many circumstances under which the silence of an individual will count against him, but only where the statement made fairly and reasonably called for an answer. It is questionable whether Johnson's silence would have counted against him if he had been the plaintiff, instead of plaintiff's agent, and Miller had said to him that he would not fix the cases for $500. The headnotes sufficiently cover the further exceptions taken to the exclusion and admission of evidence. These assignments are without substantial merit, if the trial judge entertained a correct view of the law applicable to the really controlling questions in the case.

11, 12. We come, therefore, to determine what is, to our minds, the most difficult question in the case: Whether the doctrine of implied warranty is involved and should have been given in charge to the jury. The twelfth ground of the amended motion is as follows: "Because the court erred in failing, as movant contends, entirely to charge and put before the jury the main defense relied upon by the defendant, and to sustain which abundant evidence had been introduced, to wit, that the plaintiff company, in undertaking to make for, deliver, and install in the defendant's store the said four cases, impliedly warranted that the same would be reasonably suited for the purposes intended; that is to say, that the same would be jewelry cases, and as such would be reasonably adapted for the display of jewelry, bric-a-brac, silverware, and other articles of like nature, such as are displayed in jewelry stores—it not appearing, as movant contends, from the evidence or the pleadings, that the said implied warranty had been from the nature of the transaction or expressly excepted. The evidence, as movant contends, showed that the said cases had been purchased as jewelry cases, and as such were intended for the display of jewelry, bric-a-brac, silverware, and other like articles in the defendant's jewelry store; and, further, that the plaintiff company, through its agent and authorized representative, the said U. S. Johnson, was fully apprised of the purpose and use for which jewelry cases were to be adapted before the alleged contract for their construction and installation in the defendant's store had been completed and concluded. It was one of the main contentions of the defendant, as disclosed by his pleadings and the evidence introduced thereunder, that the said cases were not reasonably adapted and suited for the purposes intended, to wit, the display of jewelry in the defendant's jewelry store, and more especially in that the said cases did not work smoothly and free from friction; that great injury and disfigurement were done to defendant's cases in the installation of said cases; that the sashes of some of the cases warped from side to side, and stuck; that the sides and top rails of said sashes were rubbed in many places; that the doors were not arranged to slide up and hang with bicycle chains, weights, and pulleys, weights to slide in pockets in back of the cases, but, on the contrary, were hung with ordinary trunk rollers and in such manner as with difficulty to be moved up and down; that the shelves were so heavy and brackets so light as to be incapable of supporting articles of any weight or breakable articles of any character with safety; that the sashes were warped and ill-fitted to the cases; and that various and other defects existed in said cases and in the installment thereof. The court failed, as aforesaid, to charge said jury upon the law of implied warranty, covering one of the main issues upon which the defendant's case was predicated, and, as movant contends, the court erred in failing to so charge upon the grounds and for the reasons as aforesaid. Nor was the failure of the court to charge the jury upon the law of implied warranty, governing this substantial issue, cured or remedied, as movant contends, by the general charge of the court to the effect that the cases must be constructed and installed in the defendant's store in a workmanlike and reasonably skillful manner, and that the defendant would be entitled to recover any damages for the failure to so construct and install them. Such a charge had the effect of confining the consideration of the jury to the determination of the sole issue whether the cases were constructed and installed in a reasonably skillful and workmanlike manner, and absolutely eliminated and removed from the scope of the jury's consideration the entire contention of the defendant, and the evidence produced to prove the same, that the cases must not only be constructed and installed in a reasonably skillful and workmanlike manner, but that they must be reasonably adapted to the purposes for which they were installed." And the thirteenth ground, relating to latent defects undisclosed, will be considered with the twelfth, for the reason that the warranty that the seller knows of no latent defects undisclosed is one of those which may be implied, if the case be such that any warranty can be implied. The plaintiff in error insists that the sashes in the cases frequently stuck and could not be moved without very great effort; that his evidence further shows that plaintiff's agent was aware of a means for working the sashes properly, or of causing the same to work, and yet he failed to make known the same to the defendant, or to take any steps whatever to remedy said defects. And plaintiff in error insists, in this ground of the motion, that "the failure of the court to charge or put before the jury this implied warranty of the plaintiff, that he knew of no latent defects undisclosed, removed from the consideration of the jury the contention and evidence of the defendant to the prejudice of his defense."

Not infrequently a mere shade of difference determines whether the issue calls for the application of the doctrine of implied warranty or excludes it. In many cases in our experience the line of demarcation was very dim, and we think there can be cases in which as to different portions of even the same transaction the law of express warranty will control, so far as there has been express warranty, without excluding the application of an implied warranty to other portions of the contract. We are aware that this statement seems contradictory and is not in accord with the general view; for in Johnson v. Latimer, 71 Ga. 470, it was held that "It is only in the absence of an express warranty that resort can be had to implied warranty, and where there was an express warranty the court could refuse to charge on the subject of implied warranty." In that case the court not only refused to charge "that, if the machine sold defendant by plaintiffs was not reasonably suited for the use intended, the plaintiffs could not recover unless there was a special contract as to size," but, on the contrary, charged, as to the wheat separator in question, "that the warranty which the law required the plaintiffs to make was that the article sold was a separator—that is to say, that it would separate the grain from the chaff—but he did not warrant that it was suitable for transportation over the roads in the country, or that it was such a machine as could be pulled by defendant's team." This is an express holding that there can be no implied warranty if there is an express warranty. We yield to it as binding authority and no doubt it influenced the trial judge in his charge to the jury. Civ. Code 1895, § 3555, raises an implied warranty for the protection of those purchasers who have not preferred to try to protect themselves by an express covenant of warranty, or where, from the nature of the transaction, there can be no warranty in the absence of an expressed warranty. Section 3555 is a provision for the protection of purchasers, but not extended to "all" purchasers. "If there is no express covenant of warranty, the purchaser must exercise caution in detecting defects. The seller, however, in all cases (unless expressly or from the nature of the transaction excepted) warrants (1) that he has a valid title and right to sell; (2) that the article sold is merchantable, and reasonably suited to the use intended; (3) that he knows of no latent defects undisclosed." It excepts the purchaser who prefers to safeguard himself by an express covenant of warranty, him who fails to use that degree of caution which would easily detect patent defects, and him whose transaction is such that by its very nature no warranty can be expected to arise or be implied. If the plaintiff in error properly belongs in either of these classes, he can derive no benefit from the law of implied warranty. It affords him no protection; and the refusal of the court to charge as set out in the twelfth and thirteenth grounds of the motion was proper. An inspection of the charge of the court, as transmitted in the record, shows, however, that the complaint can only be a qualified one; for, while the judge did not expressly refer to section 3555, he explicitly stated all of the defects insisted upon by the defendant in his plea, and thereafter three times instructed the jury, in substance, as follows: "If, on the contrary, according to the defendant's plea, the contract was not complied with, and the work was not done according to contract, then you give the defendant such damages as you think he is entitled to recover by reason of the failure of plaintiff to comply with its contract."

The only complaint that plaintiff in error can make is that the court did not charge the jury that the company impliedly warranted that the manufactured cases would be suitable to the purposes for which he intended them. The judge did not so charge. In our opinion he was right in not charging as the plaintiff in error insists that he should, for the reason that by the very nature of the transaction there could be no implied warranty. From the nature of the contract there could be no implied warranty of suitability of purpose. Crankshaw did not go to the manufacturing company and purchase jewelry cases relying on its judgment. If he had done so, an implied warranty would have arisen. On the contrary, he employed the manufacturing company to make cases according to plans and specifications of his own; and when these jewelry cases were made according to Crankshaw's plans and specifications, with good workmanship and proper materials, the company had complied with its contract, whether the cases did or did not meet the purposes of Crankshaw. If the company, by reason of its experience had known that the specifications furnished by Crankshaw would not make a good jewelry case, it could not have altered his plans and made a different jewelry case. This would have been a violation of its contract, and Crankshaw could well have relied, to the suggestion of superior knowledge and consequent action in pursuance therewith, that this was none of its concern. If the cases were made according to contract and his own plans, Crankshaw got what he bargained for, and whether the cases thereafter did not suit his purposes was wholly immaterial. To hold a manufacturer responsible for defects which he may know will arise from peculiarities of proportion or construction, because he knows the use for which the manufactured article is intended, and yet is powerless to prevent the defects, because he cannot alter the plan, would be indeed a harsh rule. The distinction is aptly drawn by Prof. Parsons (1 Pars. Con. 586, 587): "If a thing be ordered of the manufacturer for a special purpose, and it be supplied and sold for that purpose, there is an implied warranty that it is fit for that purpose. This principle has been carried very far. It must, however, be limited to cases where a special thing is ordered, although this be intended for a special purpose." In Leake on Contracts, 404, the rule is thus aptly stated: "If an order be given for the manufacture or supply of an article to satisfy a required purpose, and not any specific article, being the essential matter of the contract, the seller is then bound, as a condition of the contract, to supply an article reasonably fit for the purpose, and is considered as warranting that it is so. But if an order be given for a specific article of a recognized kind or description, * * * and the article is supplied, there is no warranty that it will answer the purpose described or supposed, although intended and expected to do so."

If Crankshaw had applied to the manufacturer for manufactured jewelry cases, and had depended upon the judgment of the manufacturing company to furnish him cases such as he needed, then the warranty of suitability of purpose would have at once arisen. Inasmuch, however, as he did not rely upon the judgment of the manufacturing company to furnish him the jewelry cases, but ordered certain cases to be made by certain plans and specifications, then no such warranty arises, and Crankshaw would be bound to pay for the cases, whether they in fact suited his purpose or not. The questions whether such cases met the contract, and were properly made out of good material, were the only issues that could have arisen between Crankshaw and the manufacturing company. This case is somewhat similar to that of Goulds v. Brophy, 43 N. W. 834, 42 Minn. 109, 6 L. R. A. 392, where the defendant ordered a 15-inch auger to make a 20-inch hole, and the plaintiff sent him the machine. In that case the Supreme Court of Minnesota held that "if an order be given to a manufacturing company or dealer for a specific article of a known and recognized kind and description, and if the defined and described thing be actually supplied, there is no implied warranty that it will answer the purpose for which it is intended to be used. The only implied warranty or condition of the contract is that it will conform to the description and be of good workmanship and material." The same rule was announced and applied in Cosgrove v. Bennett, 32 Minn. 371, 20 N. W. 359. There the defendant ordered a specific article of a known description, which was manufactured by the plaintiff. "There was an implied warranty, or, more correctly speaking, condition of the contract, that it should conform to the description, and be of good material and workmanship according to that description, but none that it would answer the purpose described or supposed." The manufacturer only warrants the workmanship and material.

One of the issues in this case was whether the workmanship and material were the best quality, and the charge of the court shows that that issue was clearly and fairly submitted to the jury. As authority for the principle herein ruled, see Seltz v. Brewer's Ref. Co., 141 U. S. 518, 12 Sup. Ct. 46, 35 L. Ed. 837; 2 Benj. Sales, §§ 987, 988; Addison on Contracts, *977; Milwaukee Boller Co. v. Duncan, 58 N. W. 234, 87 Wis. 120, 41 Am. St. Rep. 33, and citations; Ollivant v. Bayley, 5 Q. B. 288; Dist. of Columbia v. Clephane, 110 U. S. 212, 3 Sup. Ct. 568, 28 L. Ed. 122; Kellogg Bridge Co. v. Hamilton, 110 U. S. 106, 3 Sup. Ct. 537, 28 L. Ed. 86; Hoe v. Sanborn, 21 N. Y. 552, 78 Am. Dec. 163; Deming v. Foster, 42 N. H. 165. If these jewelry cases were made according to Crankshaw's design, of good workmanship and good material (and this does not seem to be questioned in the evidence), it would not matter whether there were defects, latent or patent; for "according to the principle of decided cases, and upon clear grounds of justice, the fundamental inquiry must be always whether, under the circumstances of the particular case, the buyer had the right to rely and did rely upon the judgment of the seller and not upon his own." No matter how he reached his conclusion, the design of these jewelry cases was Mr. Crankshaw's. He furnished his own plans and specifications; and if, as the jury found, under the charge of the court, the workmanship was good and the material good, no one is responsible for defects in their operation or unsuitableness to his purpose except the defendant himself. We agree with the proposition that, in the absence of an express warranty, the implied warranty that the article is reasonably suited to the use intended will apply, unless clearly excepted; but we have no hesitation in holding that the trial judge was right in his view that the nature of this transaction excepted this contract of sale.

The decision in Elgin Jewelry Co. v. Estes, 122 Ga. 807, 50 S. E. 939, cited by plaintiff in error, is not in point. The holding there was merely that there was no express warranty in that case, and that the so-called "warranties" or agreements to replace articles that were unsatisfactory, and those not selling readily, with new articles of like kind, was no express warranty as to the character, quality or title of the goods. And for like reasons it was held in National Computing Scale Co. v. Eaves, 116 Ga. 511, 42 S. E. 783, that there was "no express warranty in the contract." The case of Malsby v. Young, 104 Ga. 212, 30 S. E. 854, is also cited. This case is certainly not in point. The judgment of the lower court was reversed because the law of implied warranty was incorrectly charged, and the Supreme Court in the decision reaffirmed the opinion in Johnson v. Latimer, 71 Ga. 470. The case of McNeel v. Smith, 106 Ga. 215, 32 S. E. 119, was one where the parties to the contract expressly excepted implied warranties as to the health, life, and soundness of certain mules. And in the case of Floyd v. Woods, 110 Ga. 850, 36 S. E. 225, the judgment against the defendant was sustained because he bought, as we think the defendant in this case did, "entirely upon his own judgment." The guano cases, cited by the very able counsel in his exhaustive brief for the plaintiff in error, in our judgment afford no authority and are not applicable in this case; for the guano is necessarily manufactured according to the formula and process of the seller, while the jewelry cases were to be made, and it appears from the record that they were made, according to the specifications of the buyer. If the workmanship and material were good (as the jury found they were), the designer of the jewelry cases would be responsible for their probable operation, just as the maker of the guano for its probable results.

The jury having settled the disputed issues of fact, and there being in our judgment no reversible error in either the rulings or the charge of the court, the judgment must be affirmed.

DAUGHTRY v. SAVANNAH & S. RY. CO.
(No. 45.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Feb. 14, 1907.)

1. WRIT OF ERROR—REVIEW—QUESTIONS OF FACT—VERDICT ON CONFLICTING EVIDENCE.

The settlement of disputed issues of fact is wholly within the province of the jury; and it is not within the power of this court to set aside their verdict, unless it appears that it is without any evidence to support it. Where disputed issues of fact, each supported by a number of witnesses, have been settled by the jury under fair and appropriate instructions by the court, and the verdict has been approved by the trial judge, the judgment of the lower court will not be disturbed, unless grave and material error has been committed.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, §§ 3935, 3949.]

2. SAME.

The error must be such as induced or largely contributed to the erroneous finding, and such an error that, if a new trial is granted, the result should in all probability be different on another trial.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, §§ 3949, 3950.]

3. SAME—REVIEW—HARMLESS ERROR—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE.

While it is error to allow a witness to testify that the "deceased appeared to be a careless man; that was my experience with him"—the judgment will not be reversed on that ground, where the record discloses that similar testimony had previously during the trial, without objection thereto, been allowed to be introduced, or where it appears there was proper positive evidence of the same fact.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Statesboro; Brannen, Judge.

Action by Queen Daughtry against the Savannah & Statesboro Railway Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

H. B. Strange, for plaintiff in error. G. S. Johnston, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. Queen Daughtry brought suit against the railway company for $5,000 for the homicide of her husband. She alleged that he was an employé of the defendant company and was engaged in the performance of his duties as trainhand; that while so engaged and without fault on his part, by the negligence of the defendant, its servants, agents, and employés, and by the use of the defective, rotten, and worn-out wire rope, and by the careless and negligent erection and maintaining of the guard post, and by the negligence and careless operation of the engine, locomotive, cars, and machinery of the defendant, and by the improper and negligent use of a spur track, and by carelessness and negligence of defendant in employing as conductor of the train a young boy, who was inexperienced and incompetent, her husband was struck, knocked down, and killed; that her husband was in the performance of his duties; that, but for the negligent use of said spur track, guard post, and rotten and defective wire rope, the careless and negligent stopping of the engine, the incompetency and inexperience of defendant's conductor, and the orders of defendant's agents, her husband would not have been killed. The defendant, admitting jurisdiction and that plaintiff was an employé and was killed, denied all other allegations of the petition, and set up as its defense that the deceased was an employé of defendant, and had been in its employment in different capacities for a number of years, and was quite familiar with the track, side tracks, and the stations along the line of the road; that at the time of his death he was perhaps the oldest employé, in point of time, of any of the crew of the train he was then assisting to operate; and that he met his death by his own negligence, and by putting himself unnecessarily in a perilous position which he was cautioned a moment before by the conductor not to assume. The jury found in favor of the defendant. The plaintiff filed a motion for new trial, which included the three general grounds, and was afterwards so amended as to make complaint of the admission of certain evidence introduced on the trial, over her objections.

The evidence in this case was conflicting. It may truthfully be said that a verdict would have been authorized for either party. A large number of witnesses unimpeached (except by the conflict which their testimony created) sustained by their testimony the contentions of each party. We are compelled to leave the finding of the jury undisturbed. The jury had the exclusive right to say what was the truth with reference to the catastrophe in which the plaintiff's husband lost his life—whether his death was caused by the negligence of the railroad company and its servants, or whether by his own carelessness he forfeited his life. From its first decision upon that subject, Davis v. Kirkland, 1 Ga. App. 5, 58 S. E. 209, it has been the unanimous opinion of this court that the verdicts of juries upon the facts (if the conclusion reached is honestly attained and warranted in any view of the evidence) are entitled to even more than the highest respect and consideration of the court; not only this, but that parties who fairly gain such verdicts have a property right therein, of which they should not be deprived; and furthermore, that this court is clothed with no power to set verdicts aside. The errors for which a new trial should be granted, where there is evidence to support the verdict, have been alluded to in Crankshaw v. Schwelzer Mfg. Co., 1 Ga. App. 363, 58 S. E. 222. The error must be such as induced or largely contributed to the erroneous finding, and such an error that, if a new trial is granted, the result should in all probability be different on another trial. In most of the suits for damages we have heretofore considered the verdict was in favor of the plaintiff. In this case the verdict was in favor of the defendant company; but the rules of law are strangers to the character or quality of litigants, and, this court being bound by its obligation to law, we are not able to assume the province of the jury and either measure the credibility of the witnesses or harmonize their conflicting statements. The verdict, therefore, must stand, unless the admission by the trial judge of the evidence of which complaint is made in the amendment to the motion was such error as either induced the verdict, or harmfully contributed to shape the finding, and unless the lower court again erred in refusing to grant a new trial when the previous error was brought before him by the motion.

Civ. Code 1895, § 5478, provides: "The superior courts may grant new trials in all cases where any material evidence may be admitted to, or illegally withheld from, the jury against the demand of the applicant." The evidence admitted in this case as appears from the motion was: "Daughtry appeared to be a careless man. That was my experience with him." And the objection urged by the plaintiff was "that the testimony of acts of carelessness and negligence at other times than at the time of the injury were irrelevant and inadmissible." In the motion it was insisted that the overruling of this objection was error, because this testimony was illegal, irrelevant, and did not show negligence at the time of the injury, and was calculated to prejudice the jury against the plaintiff, and cause them to believe the testimony of the defense when they otherwise would not believe it. We think that the objection urged by the plaintiff should have been sustained; but we have not been shown any reason why the admission of this evidence should have prejudiced plaintiff's case, as stated in the motion for new trial. Considered in connection with evidence previously and subsequently introduced without any objection on the part of the plaintiff, the refusal to rule out this evidence, in our view, is at best harmless error. According to very high authority in this state, the admission of the evidence of which complaint is made was not only not error, but perfectly proper. We are of opinion that the only proof of carelessness or negligence that can be shown against a party to defeat or diminish his recovery for damages must relate to his acts at the time of the injury, and therefore that the evidence complained of should have been excluded; and the weight of authority certainly tends in that direction, but the trial judge was not without eminent authority, contrary to this view, to support his ruling. In Enright v. Atlanta, 78 Ga. 293, one of the exceptions taken was that the court admitted, over objection, testimony to prove that the plaintiff had been intoxicated on several occasions prior to the date of the injury, from a witness who knew nothing of his condition at that time. This evidence, as shown by the charge and caution of the trial judge, must have been admitted simply to throw light on the evidence as to whether the acts of plaintiff at the time were or were not negligent; for upon this evidence the trial court charged as follows: "If you believe from the evidence that the plaintiff was intoxicated or so far under the influence of intoxicants as to affect his conduct at the time he was injured, and that for that reason or any other he failed to exercise ordinary care and diligence and was injured as a result of his own negligence, he could not recover. Mere proof, however, of a habit of using liquor, or of instances of its use by plaintiff, to excess, even on the very day of the alleged injury, would not bar his recovery, if the jury believe that its effect did not extend to the time he was injured, or that he was, notwithstanding, in the exercise of ordinary care and diligence." And in the third headnote of the decision (78 Ga. 288) the court held that there was no error in admitting the evidence of repeated drunkenness for some years before the injury; the judge having cautioned the jury that such testimony could not affect plaintiff's case unless he was under the effects of liquor on the night of the injury. In rendering the opinion in that case Chief Justice Jackson says: "There was no error in admitting evidence of repeated drunkenness for some years before this misfortune of plaintiff in error, and even afterwards, for the purpose of throwing light on the issue whether or not he was under the influence of spirituous liquors that night; the judge having cautioned the jury that, unless the plaintiff was under the effects of liquor that night, such testimony could not affect his case." The controlling issue in the Enright Case, as in this, was whether or not the negligence of the plaintiff should defeat his recovery. In the Enright Case the habit of drunkenness was used to illustrate the plaintiff's negligence; and in this case the trial judge allowed the witness' testimony as to the habit of the plaintiff's husband for carelessness for the same purpose. In concluding the opinion in the Enright Case Chief Justice Jackson says: "The way of the transgressor is hard, and frequent drunkenness, and the calaboose as its consequences, are calculated to make character for rashness and imprudence, which tell disastrously upon the future of life, and with other disasters sometimes causes the loss of a lawsuit"—showing that in that case the evidence may have been very damaging. In this case we think the statement of the witness was of but little effect. In S. F. & W. Ry. Co. v. Flannagan, 82 Ga. 579, 9 S. E. 471, 14 Am. St. Rep. 183, it was held that it was not error to receive evidence showing that an engineer habitually neglected to ring a bell, nor evidence showing the habitual high speed of the same engine when run previously by the same engineer on the same street; this being evidence introduced by the plaintiff. And while Judge Bleckley, in rendering the opinion, says that this testimony is of doubtful admissibility, he cites, as sustaining the opinion of the court, State v. Boston R. Co., 58 N. H. 410; State v. Manchester R. Co., 52 N. H. 528; Shaber v. St. Paul R. Co., 28 Minn. 103, 9 N. W. 575; Randall v. Tel. Co., 54 Wis. 140, 11 N. W. 419, 41 Am. Rep. 17; Craven v. Cen. Pac. R. Co., 72 Cal. 345, 13 Pac. 878; Henry v. So. Pac. R. Co., 50 Cal. 176; Sheldon v. Hudson River R. Co., 14 N. Y. 218, 67 Am. Dec. 155—and says: "Upon so doubtful a question we think the court did not err in admitting the evidence. There are several cases in our Reports holding that doubtful evidence is to be admitted rather than excluded."

Judged by these authorities alone, the trial judge was warranted in his ruling of which the complaint is made. But while believing, as we do, that the objection of the plaintiff should have been sustained, and that the evidence that plaintiff's husband was a careless man, or at least always appeared that way to witness, should have been rejected, was it error prejudicial to the plaintiff, or reversible error? It is well settled that a new trial will not be granted for harmless error in admitting evidence. Ford v. Kennedy, 64 Ga. 537 (6); Mays v. State, 88 Ga. 399, 14 S. E. 560; McCrory v. Grandy, 92 Ga. 319, 18 S. E. 65; Wolff v. Ga. So. R. Co., 94 Ga. 556, 20 S. E. 484; Harvey v. West, 87 Ga. 553, 13 S. E. 693. It has also been decided that, where evidence of doubtful admissibility is submitted to the jury, it will not work a new trial where its exclusion would probably not change the result. Eagle Mfg. Co. v. West, 61 Ga. 120 (4). We do not think that the admission of the evidence complained of, when taken in connection with the other testimony, could possibly have had any perceptible influence in determining the verdict of the jury, especially in view of the fact that the same thing, to wit, the negligence of the plaintiff, which was sought to be proved by the testimony objected to, was abundantly proved by legal evidence to which no objection could be offered. The conflict in the evidence is to be reconciled by the jury. In this case it was marked and striking. We cannot say that the jury erred; and we are bound to hold that their solemn finding should not be set aside for an immaterial error of the trial court, especially where it appears from the record that similar testimony to that objected to had been introduced without objection on the part of the plaintiff. It may be that the other witnesses testifying were of lesser weight and humbler character before the jury. Of this we cannot judge. While it is error to allow a witness to testify over proper objection, and in a general way, that the "deceased appeared to be a careless man; that was my experience with him"—the judgment will not be reversed on that ground, where the record discloses that similar testimony had previously during the trial, without objection thereto, been allowed to be introduced, or where it appears there was other positive evidence of the same fact.

Judgment affirmed.

1. BAILMENT—DUTIES OF BAILEE.

A bailment implies and requires, on the part of the bailee, the utmost good faith as to every matter whereby the rights of his bailor may be affected. This is not the imposition of extraordinary diligence.

2. SAME—DUTIES OF BAILEE.

While a bailee or depository for hire is not bound to exercise extraordinary diligence in the care and keeping of his bailment, still he is bound to ordinary diligence, measured by good faith towards his bailor—a golden rule of the law—the same diligence in the preservation of the bailor's property as in the preservation of his own.

3. SAME—DEMAND—COLOR OF PROCESS.

When property in the custody of a bailee for hire is demanded by a third person under color of process, it becomes his duty to ascertain whether the process is such as requires him to surrender. If the proceeding is illegal or void, it is the right and duty of the bailee to refuse to surrender the property of the bailor committed to his care. It is his duty to offer such resistance to the taking, and to adopt such measures for reclaiming it, if taken, as a prudent man would if his own property had been demanded and taken under a claim of right without legal process.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Atlanta; Reid, Judge.

Action by Mrs. Wilkes against the Morris Storage & Transfer Company. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Mrs. Wilkes sued for $300 damages on account of the failure of the defendant storage company to deliver to her, on demand, certain household goods that she had intrusted to it for keeping. It appeared that the defendant had suffered the goods to be removed from its warehouse upon the exhibition by a constable of a paper purporting to be an attachment in favor of the R. S. Crutcher Furniture Company against Mrs. Wilkes. Under the evidence and the court's charge the jury found for the plaintiff $175, and the defendant excepted to the refusal of a new trial. For the other facts see the opinion.

Arminius Wright, for plaintiff in error.
R. B. Blackburn, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. The plaintiff in error complains that its motion for new trial was refused, and this is the only assignment of error in the bill of exceptions. The motion was based on the general grounds, and on four grounds which were added to the original motion by amendment. We will first consider the amended grounds, because, under the ruling of this court in Crankshaw v. Schweizer, 1 Ga. App. 363, 58 S. E. 222, there is no merit in the general grounds, unless some error produced or contributed to the result and the verdict complained of.

The first ground of the amended motion is that the verdict is contrary to the evidence on the subject of value and not authorized by the evidence. Plaintiff in error insists that in no event could the verdict have been greater than $100; that the only evidence offered by the plaintiff on the subject of value, delivered by the husband of plaintiff, was to this effect. It is true that the husband of plaintiff testified, on cross-examination, that "they would have brought about one-half of what they cost had they been sold"; but this was not the only evidence on this subject. Not only did the plaintiff's husband swear as above quoted, which was merely his belief of what the goods would bring at a forced sale, but, in further testifying, he said that the furniture in question cost $200, that it was still not quite a year old, and that he could not have gotten the same furniture at the time it was taken from the storage company for what he bought it for. C. A. Morris, of the defendant company, testifying in its behalf, it is true, placed the value at $50, $75, or $100; but on cross-examination he admitted that at a forced sale household goods, such as the personal property in question, very seldom brings what it is worth, and gave his opinion, as an expert, that if he had household furniture that answered his purpose, and which originally cost $200, and which it would take $200 to replace, the furniture taken away from him would be equal in value to the new furniture. We think that the jury had the right, under the evidence, to fix the value of the property at the amount of their finding, under the proper charge of the court upon the subject of value: "The question of value is one of fact, which you will decide for yourself. You are not bound by the opinion of a witness as to value. You are not required to take opinions as representing the value of the articles mentioned. You will take into consideration all the evidence that will illustrate the question to you; take into consideration the opinion of witnesses as given to you; take into consideration what it cost to purchase the goods, if the evidence discloses it; take into consideration what it would cost to replace the goods, if the evidence discloses it, and all the evidence on the subject that will illustrate the subject—and then yourself decide what sum would represent a reasonable and proper value of the articles involved; and that sum, if the plaintiff recovers, should represent the amount of her recovery." Under the evidence above referred to, the jury would have been authorized to base their finding on the testimony in favor of the plaintiff, on this subject, in preference to that of the bailiff, who is denominated an expert, or the witness who did the multifarious service of swearing out the attachment, going security on the bond, and separating and seizing the property in question, and finally giving expert testimony in behalf of the corporation.

The second ground of the amended motion complains that the court refused to allow the defendant to show that Mrs. Wilkes was indebted to one Crutcher for the property for which she was suing, and upon which the attachment was levied for the purpose of recovering the purchase money of the same. There was no error in this ruling. The reply of the trial judge, in rejecting the evidence offered on this subject, was exhaustive, when he said, "You cannot take her goods and pay Crutcher's debt."

In the fourth ground of the amendment to the motion the plaintiff in error complains that the verdict is contrary to the charge of the court, quoted above. This ground, for the reason stated above, is not well taken.

The last ground of the amended motion asks for a new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence. The evidence discovered after the trial and verdict purports to be a certain conditional bill of sale, signed by the plaintiff, and in favor of R. S. Crutcher Furniture Company, describing the goods sued for in this case, by which title to the goods was reserved in the furniture company, and it was provided that in default of payments therein stipulated the furniture company should have the right to take possession of the property "without any legal process." We think the court rightly refused to grant a new trial on this newly discovered evidence, because the most ordinary diligence, under the circumstances of the case, would have disclosed the existence of the document in question before the trial. The Morris Transfer & Storage Company did not deal with the R. S. Crutcher Furniture Company as with strangers afar off. The record does not disclose the exact distance which separates their respective places of business, but it does disclose the fact that they are both in the city of Atlanta, and upon terms of comity, if not of amity, by reason of which any inquiry addressed by the one to the other would have received a truthful response; for the evidence disclosed that the storage company actually allowed the agent of the Crutcher Company to go into the storage company's warehouse, take out the property that they identified, and move it to the Crutcher Company's place of business before any attachment was levied. The goods were carried away in Mr. Crutcher's wagon. The bailiff testified that "Mr. Poole [an employé of the Crutcher Company] was at the storage company's; that Mr. Crutcher telephoned me to meet him there; and when he did come there, the goods had been taken out of the storage, and were ready to be loaded up." Every circumstance of the delivery shows that if the storage company had been only as anxious, in good faith, to protect and care for the property of its bailor (in the same manner as it would if the property in question had been its own) as it was to accommodate Crutcher, even the slightest degree of diligence would have caused it to inquire whether Mr. Poole, as agent for Crutcher, did not have, as his conduct would have indicated, title to the goods in question.

Motions for new trials upon the ground of newly discovered evidence are not favored by the law, and should not be. They are tolerated where it is apparent that grave injustice would result unless the newly discovered evidence is admitted on another trial, and only then when it is clear that ordinary diligence could not have discovered the evidence sought to be adduced, and that a different result in view of the discovery ought to obtain. As said before, we think that ordinary diligence would have discovered the additional bill of sale; and therefore there was no abuse of discretion on the part of the trial judge in overruling this ground of the motion for new trial. And we are not clear that, even if it could not have been discovered and a new trial ordered, the result of the trial should be different. The only province of this conditional bill of sale would be to show that under certain conditions the R. S. Crutcher Furniture Company had the right to take possession, without legal process, of the property described in the bill of sale. This might be a good contract between Mrs. Wilkes and the furniture company; but the effect of its being authority to the bailee to deliver the goods on mere demand would be to make him the judge and jury to determine whether or not the contract had been fully complied with and all payments made, whether the property in his possession was the same as that originally sold by the Crutcher Company, and whether the instrument offered was in fact ever executed by Mrs. Wilkes. As he would occupy his position as court and jury at his own risk, this ground of the motion is imperfect, and was rightly overruled by the trial judge, unless the ground of newly discovered evidence had been supplemented by proof showing that the payments had not been made. As the purported bill of sale is dated November 21, 1899, and the payments are provided to be at $10 a month, if they had been promptly met, all payments would have been fully made and the contract discharged long before 1902, which was the date of the storage; and the very provision for repossession of the property upon default of any of the payments might give rise to the presumption either that the payments had been met or that the stipulation with reference to taking possession of the property without legal process had been waived. In our judgment the verdict was right, and the trial judge was right in overruling the motion for new trial upon all of the grounds therein stated.

It is undisputed, from the evidence, that the plaintiff stored her household furniture with the defendant for safe-keeping upon agreed valuable consideration. The defendant became thereby a bailee for hire. Under Civ. Code 1895, § 2890, a warehouseman is a depository for hire, and is bound even for ordinary diligence; and failure to deliver the goods on demand makes it incumbent on him to exercise ordinary diligence. And under Civ. Code 1895, § 2896: "In all cases of bailment, after proof of loss, the burden of proof is on the bailee to show proper diligence." Under the facts disclosed by the record, the defendant in error showed the bailment, the proof of loss, and established demand upon the bailee. This should be a prima facie case. Did the plaintiff in error shift the burden? Its defense was it delivered the property to an officer of the law under legal process. It was bound by law to ordinary diligence in caring for and keeping it. Civ. Code 1895, § 2898, says: "Ordinary diligence is that care which every prudent man takes of his own property of similar nature." As was held by this court in Haines v. Chappell, 1 Ga. App. 480, 58 S. E. 220, the bailee is not only bound for ordinary diligence, but he must exercise good faith in his relations with the bailor. This good faith is measured by a golden rule of the law: The same diligence by the bailee for the bailor's property as for his own; doing for the bailor as he would do for himself. Measured by this rule, it would have taken a wide stretch of the imagination on the part of the jury to conceive that the defendant would have acted as to property it believed to be its own as it did act with reference to the delivery of the bailor's property in this case. Could the jury have reasonably believed that if the Crutcher Company had laid claim to property of the storage company of similar nature, the storage company would, without let or hindrance, have allowed an agent of the furniture company to go into its warehouse and select for the furniture company such property as he claimed belonged to it, and would have delivered it to him and taken his receipt therefor, and allowed him to carry it to the sidewalk, receiving directions from a bailiff who was acting under process absolutely void, and have made no inquiry or protest in the premises?

The very able counsel for plaintiff in error, of course does not and cannot deny that the attachment was void. The affidavit did not state that the property was in the possession of the defendant, or in possession of any other person who held it for the benefit of the debtor in fraud of the attaching creditor; and no valid bond was given, because the affiant to the affidavit to obtain the attachment was the surety on the bond, and the agent who separated and moved the goods. But the plaintiff in error contends that he should not be held liable for the delivery to the constable of the goods described. Waiving the facts that the receipt in the record show that the goods were delivered to Crutcher, and not to the constable, and admitting for the sake of argument that delivery was made to the constable, we do not think that the position assumed by plaintiff in error, that he delivered the goods because he thought he was compelled to deliver them to the constable, affords him any defense. A knowledge of the law is presumed. The bailee, like every other citizen, is presumed to know the law; and, if he did not, he is presumed to inquire as to it before he would allow his property taken from him. So he should inquire before allowing property entrusted to his care to be taken therefrom; and, if he misjudges, it is at his own risk. Such a requirement is not, as contended by counsel for plaintiff in error, an imposition of extraordinary diligence, but is the application of ordinary diligence in the spirit of good faith required on the part of a bailee. He must protect the bailor's property and regard the bailor's rights with the same care that he would his own. To sustain the contention of the plaintiff in error that it was not its business to inquire into the apparent defects in the attachment proceedings, but simply to surrender the property of the bailor, under the circumstances disclosed, without any liability to account therefor, would be to abrogate the fundamental principles recognized as governing bailment for hire. It would be to say that if a stranger knocked at the bailee's door, and claimed to be an officer of the law, and claimed to have a process from a court, it was his duty to surrender the property held by him in trust, without even going to the trouble of investigating the genuineness of the paper, as to its legality, or the right of the holder to carry away the property. To state such a position is to decline to receive it seriously.

The plaintiff in error contends, further, that he exhausted the requirement as to ordinary diligence by notifying one Mr. Johnson of the levy. The ordinary diligence required by the bailee is to be ascertained in every case, as a question of fact, by the particular circumstances of the case. Negligence and diligence are peculiarly questions of fact for the jury. If the evidence had shown that Johnson was the agent of the bailor, the jury would have been authorized to find that the storage company exercised ordinary diligence in bringing knowledge of existing conditions to the bailor through her agent. She could then have protected herself. But the burden of proving the agency, as the bailee had parted with the property, was upon the bailee, who failed to show that Mr. Johnson was in any respect the agent of the bailor for any purpose whatever; the evidence being undisputed that Mr. Johnson only introduced the agent of the bailor to the bailee, and thus provided it with a customer. The right upon this subject was clearly presented to the jury by the trial judge, and their finding that Johnson was not the agent of Mrs. Wilkes was demanded by the evidence.

It being admitted in argument before this court that the attachment levied upon the goods in question was void, counsel insists that the rule of ordinary diligence did not require the bailee, at expense to himself and at the risk of a forcible entrance of his warehouse by an officer, to take steps to resist the process, although void. We fail to find any case in which the exact question has been determined in this state. But in view of what we have stated above as to the good faith required of the bailee, in the exercise of ordinary diligence, where the rights of the bailor are affected, and especially in view of the definition contained in Civ. Code 1895, § 2898, we think the ruling in Roberts v. Stuyvesant Safe Deposit Co., 123 N. Y. 57, 25 N. E. 204, 9 L. R. A. 438, 20 Am. St. Rep. 718, is persuasive authority upon the point involved. That case was an action to recover damages for the alleged negligence of the defendant as a bailee for hire. The Stuyvesant Company, like the defendant in this case, was a corporation receiving property on deposit, as bailee, for safe-keeping and storage. The plaintiff, as in this case, was a woman. The process to be enforced was a search warrant being served by an officer, but the process was invalid. The defendant's officers protested against the seizure of the bailor's property, but they furnished the levying officer with the means to identify its whereabouts, and he thereupon made the seizure. The facts of the two cases are similar, except that the Morris Storage Company did not even protest against the levying of the attachment. In the New York case, as in this, the levy or seizure was made after the bailee had pointed out the property and surrendered its possession. The trial court held that the defendant performed its duty with reference to the property which it held as bailee; but the Court of Appeals reversed that judgment, and held, as we hold here, that the defendant neglected to exercise that degree of diligence and fidelity to which it was bound in the care and keeping of the property which the plaintiff had confided to its charge. In rendering the opinion the court says: "The persons who took the property had no process that authorized them to do so; and hence the defendant had the right to make such resistance to it as they would have had if the same parties attempted to take it without any process whatever, and, if overcome by superior force, they could pursue and reclaim it by legal proceedings or otherwise in the same manner as if the search warrant had not been procured. When property in the hands of the bailee for hire is demanded under color of process, it becomes his duty to ascertain whether the process is such as requires him to surrender the property, and, if it is not, then it is his right and duty to refuse, and to offer such resistance to the taking, and adopt such measures for reclaiming it, if taken, as a prudent and intelligent man would, if it had been demanded and taken under a claim of right to the property by another without legal process. The defendant did not discharge the duty that it owed to the bailor and owner of the property by merely making a formal protest against entering the vaults where the property was. A person who would allow his own property to be taken away from him under like circumstances, and without doing more to prevent such a result, or to repossess himself of it when taken, could scarcely be called a prudent man."

Judgment affirmed.

STUBBS v. STATE. (No. 227.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. March 22, 1907.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW — APPEAL—DIMINUTION OF RECORD.

Under Civ. Code 1895, § 5526, the court may look to any part of the record to enable it to clearly understand the error complained of; and, it appearing in this case that the substance of the affidavit asked to be sent up is identical with what the plaintiff in error contended it to be, it is unnecessary to have the affidavit itself transmitted.

2. SAME—EVIDENCE.

The verdict was authorized by the evidence.

RUSSELL, J. The plaintiff in error suggests a diminution of the record, and asks that the affidavit of the prosecutor, on which the accusation was based, be ordered transmitted to this court as part of the record. We think it unnecessary to order the affidavit sent up, because, even if its contents can be considered on review of a motion for new trial, the truth of the contention of the plaintiff in error that the affidavit upon which the accusation issued was for a misdemeanor is already apparent from the record. But if the affidavit is a part of the accusation, and for any reason is defective, the objection should have been urged by demurrer, motion to quash, or, even after conviction, by motion in arrest of judgment. Neither on a motion for new trial, nor by a writ of error whose only assignment of error is the overruling of a motion for a new trial, can advantage be taken of the defects of the accusation. This brings us to the merits of the motion. It appears that there was evidence which would have authorized either an acquittal or a conviction, and that the jury, in the exercise of their prerogative, gave the preference to the witnesses for the state. The verdict, under the decision in Davis v. Kirkland, 1 Ga. App. 5, 58 S. E. 209, should not be disturbed. Judgment affirmed.

1. CRIMINAL LAW — DEMURRER — ARREST OF JUDGMENT—NEW TRIAL.

An objection to an accusation, on the ground that it was based on a defective affidavit, must be made by demurrer or motion in arrest of judgment. Such objection furnishes no reason for granting a new trial. Rucker v. State, 39 S. E. 902, 114 Ga. 13; Boswell v. State, 39 S. E. 897, 114 Ga. 40.

2. SAME—DIMINUTION OF RECORD.

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Feb. 14, 1907.)

1. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE—PROCESS—REQUISITES—STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

The terms of Civ. Code 1895, § 4116, requiring a copy of the cause of action sued on to be attached to the summons in a justice's court, do not necessitate a specific allegation of negligence, or a detailed relation of the acts from which negligence may be inferred, or by which it is to be proved, or that the plaintiff set out a statement of the facts which constitute the alleged negligence.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 31, Justices of the Peace, § 253.]

2. SAME.

Hence a summons, in a suit in a justice's court against a carrier for damage to goods shipped, which alleges that the plaintiff claims the difference between a named amount which his goods were worth when sound, previous to the injury, and a stated sum for which he sold the goods after they had been damaged, and alleges damage in a certain amount, due to the negligence of defendant and without fault of plaintiff, is not demurrable, under the ruling in Louisville & Nashville R. Co. v. Cody, 46 S. E. 429, 119 Ga. 371. The requirement as to summons and copy in a justice's court is an exception to the general rules of pleading. The form of the action is not changed by appeal to the superior court.

3. CARRIERS—CARRIAGE OF FREIGHT—ACTIONS—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY—INSTRUCTIONS—EXPRESSION OF OPINION.

It was not error to allow evidence as to the condition of the car, thus enabling the jury to determine whether the car was or (as alleged by the plaintiff) was not a safe car, and whether the injury (if any) was caused by the act of God or by the negligence of the carrier. There was no error in the charge of the court to which exception is taken.

4. SAME—PLEADING—VARIANCE.

A variance between the allegata and probata, which arose merely from the introduction in evidence by the defendant of a waybill in which the initials of the consignee's name were different from those of the plaintiff (though the surname was the same), was not necessarily material or fatal. When it appears that such waybill was prepared and issued without the direction and knowledge of the plaintiff, and in his absence, and the evidence of variance presented by the one party is fully met by evidence on the part of the other, showing the true consignee and owner, and it is further shown that the carrier treated such party (whose initials do not correspond with those in the waybill) as the owner, delivering to him the freight and accepting from him the charges for its carriage, it is not a question of variance between the allegations and the proof, so far as the plaintiff's case is concerned, but instead raises squarely an issue of fact for determination by the jury. A variance between the allegations and the proof, to be material or fatal, must be apparent and uncontradicted.

5. SAME—ACT OF GOD.

No injury can be said to be the act of God which can, under any fair view, be attributed to the negligence of man.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 9, Carriers, § 525.]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Bibb County; Felton, Judge.

Action by H. L. Barfield against the Georgia Southern & Florida Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Hardeman & Jones, for plaintiff in error.
M. G. Bayne, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. H. L. Barfield brought an action against the Georgia Southern & Florida Railway Company in a justice's court, and obtained judgment for $57.89. The defendant company appealed to a jury in the superior court of Bibb county, where a verdict was rendered by the jury for the same amount as that of the judgment of the justice. The defendant moved for a new trial. The judge of the superior court overruled the motion, and thereupon the writ of error, which brings the case to our consideration, was sued out.

The action was begun by issuance and service of the following summons from the justice's court: "Office of J. H. L. Gerdine, N. P. & Ex Officio J. P. State of Georgia, Bibb County. 564th district, G. M. To Any Lawful Sheriff, Deputy Sheriff, or Constable of Said County—Greeting: The defendant, Georgia Southern & Florida Railway Company, is hereby required to be and appear at the next justice's court to be held in and for said district, at the Masonic Temple, 518 Mulberry street, Macon, Georgia, on the first Saturday of May next, by 10 o'clock a. m., to answer the complaint of H. L. Barfield for damages to property as set out below, and is annexed to this summons, or, in default, the court will proceed as to justice shall appertain. Hereof fail not. Given under my hand and seal this 20th day of April, 1905. J. H. L. Gerdine, N. P. & Ex Officio J. P. [Seal.]

"(Copy.) For that on Jan. 1st, 1905, said plaintiff caused to be loaded on a car furnished by said defendant as a safe car, at Hahira, Ga., 128½ bushels of sweet potatoes, to be shipped to him at Macon, Ga., in good condition; and by negligence of said defendant said potatoes were injured and damaged in the sum of $57.89, by being allowed to freeze while in possession of said company, said potatoes being of the value of $128.50 delivered to said defendant, and when delivered were only worth $70.61—all of said damage being by the fault and negligence of said defendant, and without fault of the plaintiff. M. G. Bayne, Plaintiff's Attorney."

This was afterwards amended as follows: "And now comes plaintiff and amends his itemized statement, and says that the said potatoes were shipped on Jan. 25th, 1905, instead of Jan. 1st, 1905."

In the justice's court, and also before the trial of the appeal in the superior court, a demurrer was filed, asking that the suit be dismissed for the reason that the summons set forth no cause of action against the defendant, and also especially because "there is no allegation of negligence against the defendant that would authorize plaintiff to recover." This demurrer was overruled by the judge of the superior court, and exceptions pendente lite were filed to this ruling. In its motion for new trial the defendant complained: (1) That the verdict was directly contrary to the evidence and without evidence to support it, (2) Because the allegata and probata failed to correspond, and there was a fatal variance between the allegations and proof; the summons alleging shipment to H. L. Barfield, and the proof showing shipment to J. F. Barfield. (3) Because the verdict is contrary to law and to the principles of justice and equity, and especially to the following principles of law: A common carrier is not liable for goods in his care where the injury is occasioned by the act of God, unmixed with the carrier's negligence. "Movant contends that the evidence in this case showed, without contradiction, that the goods in question were frozen while in the carrier's possession, and that the weather was so extreme as that they would have frozen in the best protected cars; hence no act or default of the carrier contributed to the said injury."

(4) Because the court erred in permitting H. L. Barfield, the plaintiff, to testify: "I found that the car was an old car, and there was a board off the end of it, right at the corner. The board or opening was possibly six inches wide at the top and come to a point about half way the car; and the door, in addition, was not in good condition. It had been opened and shut, and nailed and fastened, in the way the freight cars open and shut, so often that you could not fasten it closely, although it would have answered any purpose for ordinary purposes, but it did not exclude the air at all; and the fact that the door not being in good shape and the hole in the end of the car, I called Toole's attention to it, and told him at the time I did not believe the potatoes would have frozen if that had been a real good box car at that time." To the introduction of said testimony defendant objected because there was no notice of any such defect or negligence in the summons; and the court overruled the objection and admitted the evidence. (5) Because the court erred in charging the jury as follows, to wit: "They may do that by showing that they have exercised that degree of diligence which the law requires of them, in the particular character of cars subject to investigation and under investigation at the time, and with reference to freight the rule is that no loss or damage which is inflicted upon freight while under their control is one that they are not liable for; that is to say, no excuse avails the carrier, unless the loss was occasioned by the act of God or the public enemies of the state. In order for the carrier to avail himself of the act of God as excuse, he must establish, not only that the act of God ultimately occasioned the loss, but that his own negligence did not contribute thereto." Defendant's objection to this charge is that it excluded any and all defenses, and was an expression of opinion that defendant was liable, and not excused by the act of God or of public enemies.

Upon the hearing, the judge overruled the motion for new trial. In his bill of exceptions the defendant (now plaintiff in error) excepted to the order overruling the demurrer, and to the order refusing a new trial; and therefore the questions we are to determine are: (1) Was it error to overrule the demurrers? (2) Should a new trial have been granted upon the grounds stated?

We think there was no error in overruling the demurrer. Probably, under the doctrine laid down in Louisville & Nashville R. Co. v. Cody, 119 Ga. 371, 46 S. E. 429, the demurrer might have been good if the cause had originated in some court other than the justice's court; but in the justice's court no formal pleadings are required. "The law does not enjoin upon the plaintiff the obligation to fully and distinctly set forth his cause of action with the same minuteness and clearness that is required in pleadings in courts of record. The suit is brought simply by the issuing of summons, attached to which is usually a statement giving some indication of the nature of the debt sought to be recovered. This is sufficient, if enough stated to put the defendant on notice * * * as to the character of the claim sought to be enforced." Jones v. Dodd, 108 Ga. 516, 34 S. E. 169. The act of September 21, 1881, which is now embodied in Civ. Code 1895, § 4116, is a remedial statute, and, as was well said by Chief Justice Fish, delivering the opinion in Southern Ry. Co. v. Collins, 118 Ga. 413, 45 S. E. 308: "Before its passage * * * the plaintiff in an action in a justice's court was not required to put the defendant upon notice of the nature of the demand upon which he was sued. Defendants were, therefore, often placed at a disadvantage in defending suits instituted in justice's courts. To remedy the defect in the law the statute of 1881 was passed. The general rule is that remedial statutes are to be liberally construed, and in construing them the old law, the mischief, and the remedy are to be taken into consideration. The rule of liberal construction applies with peculiar force to a statute relating to pleadings in a justice's court, where the same degree of strictness and precision in pleading is not required as in the higher courts. * * * The object of the law requiring a copy of the cause of action to be attached to the summons being that the defendant shall be informed of the nature of the plaintiff's demand against him, it is immaterial whether the statement of the cause of action is contained in the body of the summons or is actually attached to the summons." The present case, like Southern Ry. Co. v. Collins, falls within the provision of Civ. Code 1895, § 4994, which declares that "no technical or formal objections shall invalidate any petition or process, but if the same substantially conforms to the requisitions of this Code, and the defendant has had notice of the pendency of the cause, all other objections shall be disregarded: provided, there is legal cause of action set forth as required by this Code." As bearing upon the same principle, see Howell v. Field, 70 Ga. 592; Southern Ry. Co. v. Varn, 102 Ga. 764, 29 S. E. 822; Davis v. County of Bibb, 116 Ga. 26, 42 S. E. 403. We do not find that the case of Harrison v. Southern Ry. Co., 120 Ga. 1064, 48 S. E. 408 (cited by plaintiff in error, and which was a suit in the superior court), has any bearing upon the question now before us. The court was right in overruling the demurrer.

We come, then, to the second assignment of error, based upon the overruling of defendant's motion on the ground therein stated. The evidence shows that the plaintiff was the owner of the potatoes which he alleged had been damaged, and that he was so treated by the defendant, who delivered them to him and accepted from him the freight for their carriage. There was no evidence that he was not the owner. It is true that the bill of lading which was introduced was in these words: "Received by the Georgia Southern & Florida Railway Company at Hahira, Ga., Station, 1/25/1906, from H. L. Barfield, the property described below, in apparent good order, marked, consigned, and destined as indicated below, which said carrier agrees to carry to said destination," etc. "Consignee, J. F. Barfield, Place, Macon, Ga. Articles, 60 sacks S. potatoes; weight, 7071; freight, collect; car, Sou. 200279. [Signed] J. M. Johnson, Agent." Now, in view of the fact that the plaintiff swore he was the owner and should have been the consignee, and in view of the further fact that there was no evidence that he was at Hahira at the time the bill of lading was issued, or had any knowledge of its contents, or was in any way responsible for its wording, the fact that the name of the consignee was written as J. F., instead of "H. L.," Barfield, could have well been treated as being a clerical mistake of the company. But, if that contention of the defendant in error be not sound, the bill of lading was introduced by the defendant, and at best would but raise the issue as to who was the owner; and the jury, having the testimony of the plaintiff that he was the owner, would have the right to determine that issue of fact, finding as they might determine the truth to be from the conflicting evidence. Variance between the allegata and probata as to the ownership would be fatal (as insisted by the counsel for plaintiff in error) if the evidence did not show that H. L. Barfield was the owner, or if by any rule he was estopped by the contents of the bill of lading from asserting his ownership. But, in view of his testimony that he was the owner, there was no variance, so far as plaintiff's case was concerned, between the allegation and the proof. In view of the fact that the plaintiff could not take the goods from the depot without paying the freight, and that it was his duty in case of partial damage to do (as he did) everything within his power to lessen the damage devolving upon the company, and in view of the further fact that he was treated by them as the owner, we see nothing to prevent him from maintaining an action in the form in which he proceeded. The conduct of the railroad company estops it from relying upon its bill of lading, at least so far as the individuality of the consignor and consignee are concerned.

The next contention of the plaintiff in error is that the verdict is contrary to law, especially because a common carrier is not liable for injury occasioned by the act of God, unmixed with the carrier's negligence. He contends that the evidence shows "that the goods in question were frozen while in the carrier's possession, and that the weather was so extreme that they would have frozen in the best protected cars; hence no act or default of the carrier contributed to the said injury." And we may consider the fourth and fifth grounds of the motion together with the foregoing (which is the third), because they are so closely connected that it is impossible to separate them; the fourth having reference to the evidence, and the fifth to the charge of the court bearing upon this subject. The evidence objected to was: "I found that the car was an old car, and there was a board off the end of it, right at the corner. The board or opening was possibly six inches wide at the top and came to a point about half way the car; and the door, in addition, was not in good condition. It had been opened and shut, and nailed and fastened, in the way the freight cars open and shut, so often that you could not fasten it closely, although it would have answered any purpose for ordinary purposes, but it did not exclude the air at all; and the fact that the door not being in good shape and the hole in the end of the car, I called Toole's attention to it, and I told him at the time I did not believe the potatoes would have frozen if that had been a real good box car at that time." As to the portion of the charge to which objection is made, it appears that (after having stated proper rules with reference to the burden assumed by the plaintiff, and the amount of evidence necessary to enable him to shift that burden, and after having stated the presumption arising against the company and the burden thereby placed on them to show nonliability) the court continued as follows: "They may do that by showing that they have exercised that degree of diligence which the law requires of them, in the particular character of cars subject to investigation and under investigation at the time, and with reference to freight the rule is that no loss or damage which is inflicted upon the freight while under their control is one that they are not liable for; that is to say, no excuse avails the carrier, unless the loss was occasioned by the act of God or the public enemies of the state. In order for the carrier to avail himself of the act of God as an excuse, he must establish not only that the act of God ultimately occasioned the loss, but that his own negligence did not contribute thereto."

The objection urged in the fourth ground of the motion was that the evidence to which the defendant company objected was not specified in the summons; and, as we have said above, we think this subject is fully settled by the decisions relative to summons in justices' courts, which we have cited. The complaint of the charge excepted to was that it was an expression of opinion that the defendant was liable, and was not excused by the act of God or of public enemies. We think that the portion of the charge excepted to, especially taken in connection with the context of the charge, is without error. The testimony to which objection is made was not objectionable upon the ground made, and was pertinent to the plaintiff's case. The charge, so far from being an expression of opinion that the defendant was liable, clearly left it open for the jury to determine whether the freezing of the potatoes was occasioned on account of the unusual severity of the weather to which some of the witnesses had testified, to which no act of negligence on the part of the company contributed, or whether the character of the car was such that the negligence of the company did contribute to the injury. An interesting question is presented by the brief for plaintiff's counsel as to whether a carrier is liable for injury to a shipment from cold, where the evidence shows that the goods would have been frozen, whether in or out of the carrier's possession. It is not necessary for us to decide this question or multiply words in its discussion, because in our opinion injury and loss can never be attributed to the act of God if, in any fair view of the evidence, it can be held to be due to the act of man; and a review of the evidence shows that there was ample proof to authorize the jury to conclude in this case that, if the car had been a safe and suitable car, the potatoes would not have frozen. Witness Flournoy swore that he had had experience in shipping potatoes and fruit on cars, and that, if cars were loaded on a warm day at Savannah, they would be 10 degrees warmer inside the car than outside when the car reached Macon; and, if there was an opening such as had been described by witnesses, he would say that all the warmth would have escaped. He further testified that a crack at the door would affect the temperature. He further testified that in the summer time, after you get in a box car, you would almost fall from heat; and that in cars coming from Atlanta, loaded on a cold day, if, upon their arrival at Macon, one went in there on a warm day, it would be colder than the outside, etc. He further swore that on January 26, 1905, the weather was cold, but on the 25th it was very warm; and if the potatoes had been put in a close car and taken out the next day, soon after they arrived (as they were), they would not have frozen. All of this testimony was submitted without objection, and could have well induced the belief in the minds of the jury, from the evidence of one who had years experience in the use of box cars, that the freezing of the potatoes was due to the defective condition of the car. The jury had the right to base their verdict on the testimony of this witness, rather than on that of another, which did not accord with his. It was an issue of fact for their exclusive determination. They evidently found that the defendant was negligent in not providing a safe car; and, as there is evidence to authorize their findings, we are not called upon to decide whether, if perishable articles should freeze and it was uncontradicted that the carrier used all diligence, the freezing would be called the act of God. We need only say that in this case the charge to the jury is substantially the same as section 2264 of the Civil Code of 1895, which says that "in cases of loss the presumption of the law is against him [the common carrier] and no excuse avails him unless it was occasioned by the act of God or the public enemies of the state." It may be that if goods freeze in transit which are loaded under such circumstances that the consignee could know as well as the carrier that they were likely to freeze, and the carrier used every known precaution to protect them against the cold, and they nevertheless froze and were damaged, the shipper would be estopped from collecting the claim for damages; but that is not the uncontradicted evidence in this case. Before the jury each case must stand upon its own facts. It is a question, in all such cases, of the negligence of the carrier; and negligence, as well as diligence, is a question of fact for determination in each case by the jury. In this case, in our opinion, the charge clearly presented the legal principles involved, and a finding in favor of either party would have been authorized; and the verdict of the jury, having been approved by the trial judge, should not be disturbed.

Judgment affirmed.

SCRIBNER'S SONS v. MUTUAL BLDG.
CO. (No. 280.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. March 28, 1907.)

1. APPEAL—REVIEW—VERDICT OF JURY.

Where the question in a case is one of fact, every presumption is in favor of the verdict of the jury, that they found what was the truth about the matter; and the record must affirmatively show that the verdict was contrary to law before it can be set aside. Maddox v. Cross, 4 S. E. 680, 80 Ga. 105.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, § 3673.]

2. NEW TRIAL—INSUFFICIENCY OF VERDICT.

Where two verdicts have been rendered in favor of the same party on substantially the same issues of fact, and two new trials have been granted by the presiding judge, the rule of discretion applicable to the first grant of a new trial has no application; and if the evidence on the last trial, although conflicting, supported the second verdict, it should not be set aside.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; Pendleton, Judge.

Action by Scribner's Sons against the Mutual Building Company. Verdict for plaintiff. From an order granting a new trial, plaintiffs bring error. Reversed.

Thomas L. Bishop, for plaintiffs in error.
Etheridge & Etheridge, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. It appears from the record that the plaintiffs sued the defendant for damages to certain books stored in the defendant's building, and recovered a verdict for $50 and costs. The case was carried to the superior court by certiorari, and a new trial ordered. It further appears that this is the third trial awarded the defendant on the same state of facts, and that no error of law contributed to these verdicts. It is not only true that a party has a property right in a verdict, but it is also true that it is one of the prime objects of the law that there shall be somehow and somewhere an end to litigation. If this were a case of a first verdict, even though the evidence fully authorizes the finding of the jury, we should not interfere with the discretion vested in the judge of the superior court. But due regard to the prerogative of the jury to decide issues of fact, as well as to the adjudications of our Supreme Court, places the second grant of a new trial on a different footing from the first grant. And we may say that the force of the argument is increased where, as in this case, the third grant of a new trial upon the same issues of fact is involved. The practical effect of it is to suggest, if not, indeed, to dictate, to the jury on the next trial that they shall believe the witnesses which the preceding juries have not preferred, and shall disregard those witnesses whom their predecessors have preferred, to credit. It is well settled that, "where a second verdict has been rendered on substantially the same issues of fact in favor of the same party, the rule of discretion applicable to the first grant of a new trial does not apply, and if at the last trial there was nothing objectionable in the rulings of the presiding judge, and the evidence, though conflicting, supported the second verdict, it should not be set aside." Lewis v. Equitable Mortgage Co., 99 Ga. 336, 25 S. E. 728; Veal v. Robinson, 76 Ga. 838. In Dethrage v. Rome, 125 Ga. 806, 54 S. E. 666, the Supreme Court says: "The liberality of indulgences by this court in favor of the discretion of the trial court in the first grant of a new trial will not be extended to a second. In the first instance the discretion will be sustained, when questions of evidence are involved, almost as a matter of course; but not so with subsequent trials. There must be an end to litigation; and after the first grant of a new trial, if the matter in controversy be one of fact for the jury, and for a second time in passing upon the same facts the verdict upon the question at issue be concurrent with the first, the mere discretion of the court can play but little part in the second motion for a new trial." And it may be remarked that this is especially true where the subject-matter of that discretion is a verdict being passed upon by the judge of the superior court as a reviewing court, and where the witnesses were not subject to his sight or hearing, as in trials in his own court. We could cite a longer array of authorities sustaining this proposition, but deem it unnecessary. As was held in Cook v. Western & Atlantic Railroad, 72 Ga. 48: "The discretion of the presiding judge in granting a first new trial had been exhausted in the case, and the grant of another was error."

It is insisted by counsel for the defendant that the plaintiffs could not recover because the evidence showed that there was no defect in the pipe which burst, or that, if there was such a defect, it was not known or could not have been known either to the plaintiffs or the defendant; that the cause of the bursting of the pipe was an act of God. Whether these contentions were well sustained was a question for the jury. The jury had just as good reason for believing that the pipe which discharged the water that damaged the plaintiff's books was improperly installed and negligently maintained in the building by the landlord as that the leakage was caused by divine intervention; for, while there was some testimony that the pipe was in perfect condition and the rain was unprecedented, there was testimony for the plaintiffs that the water pipe was defective, and certainly defectively constructed—not that the pipe burst, but, as testified by one of the plaintiffs' witnesses, "the pipe was hanging down, the joint pulled out, and the hanger hooks pulled out of the wall." To our mind this would indicate defective plumbing, if not defective piping, for both of which the landlord was responsible. The jury may have taken this view of the case, and, in any event, with causes of the damage testified to, they are the proper judges as to which was the true cause. As has heretofore been held by this court in Georgia So. Ry. Co. v. Barfield, 1 Ga. App. 203, 58 S. E. 236: "No injury can be said to be the act of God which can, under any fair view, be attributed to the negligence of man." The jury seems to have taken the defendant's view as to any damages resulting to the plaintiffs' books which were stored in the hallway; for, while the plaintiffs sued for $98, the verdict was only for $50. and, while the defendant claimed that the plaintiffs had the only key to the room in which the plaintiffs' books were stored, the evidence is ample to show that the defendant's building was a large office structure with a complete janitor service, and that access could have been had to the room. This phase of the evidence, however, relates to the removal of the books from the room after it was flooded; and whether the plaintiffs' books were removed or not, or whether it was the duty of the defendant's janitor to remove them or not, if they were deluged by a defectively constructed pipe unquestionably maintained by the landlord for the benefit of the entire building, and which some of the evidence shows was defective and defectively constructed, the plaintiffs would be entitled to recover the damages entailed upon them, whether the books were removed or not. The cases cited by defendant are not in point.

Judgment reversed.

ASKEW & CO. v. SOUTHERN RY. CO.
(No. 37.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Jan. 24, 1907.
Rehearing Denied March 2, 1907.)

1. CARRIERS—TRANSFER OF BILL OF LADING—ACTION BY ASSIGNEE.

The transferee of a bill of lading may maintain an action ex contractu against the carrier for failure to deliver to him all or any portion of the goods specified in the bill of lading; and this is true, whether the loss of the goods or the shortage occurred before or after he acquired title to the bill of lading.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 9, Carriers, § 170.]

2. VENUE—ACTION ON BILL OF LADING.

A railroad company, which in its bill of lading has agreed to deliver goods to a connecting carrier and which does deliver a portion of the goods to the connecting carrier, the remainder of the goods being lost, may be sued for the shortage, as a breach of the contract of carriage, in the county in which it undertook to deliver to the connecting carrier.

3. APPEAL—DECISION—DIRECTIONS ON REMAND.

Owing to imperfections in the pleadings, special directions are given in connection with the reversal of the judgment.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Atlanta; Reid, Judge.

Action by Askew & Co. against the Southern Railway Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs bring error. Reversed, with directions.

W. C. Wright and J. F. Gollightly, for plaintiffs in error. Dorsey, Brewster, Howell & Heyman, for defendant in error.

POWELL, J. It appears from the petition that Askew & Co., the plaintiffs, ordered from Horne & Goans, of Chattanooga, Tenn., a car load of corn. Horne & Goans shipped the corn via Southern Railway, from Chattanooga, Tenn., consigned to themselves at Newnan, Ga., "order notify Askew & Co.," and drew and sent through bank a draft on Askew & Co., with bill of lading attached, in accordance with our Civ. Code 1895, § 3554. After the arrival of the corn at Newnan, the plaintiffs paid the draft and received the duly indorsed bill of lading, and the car of corn was delivered to them, but it was found that 22,306 pounds of the corn had been lost in transit. The contract rate of freight was 14 cents per hundredweight, and the railway company demanded and collected 16 cents per hundredweight, an overcharge of 2 cents per hundredweight, both as to the corn delivered and as to that which was short. The delivery at Newnan was made through another carrier, the Atlanta & West Point Railroad Company. The plaintiff sued for the value of the lost corn and the overcharge in freight. The petition was dismissed on oral motion, upon the ground that it set forth no cause of action.

1. The specific point urged as to why the petition sets forth no cause of action is that, the corn having become lost before the plaintiff became the owner thereof by securing the bill of lading, the right of action is in the consignor, and not in the consignee. Viewed solely as a tort, this might be correct. However, the failure to deliver the corn in accordance with the contract of carriage may be treated simply as a breach of the contract of carriage. Under Civ. Code 1895, § 3072, "personality to which the owner has a right of possession in the future, or a right of immediate possession, wrongfully withheld, is termed by the law a chose in action." Under Civ. Code 1895, § 3077, "all choses in action arising upon contract may be assigned so as to vest the title in the assignee." Since a cause of action arising in tort is not usually assignable, and since, at common law, ordinarily, causes of action originating ex contractu were not, many decisions in other states and text-book citations may be found to the effect that only the consignor may sue where the goods are lost by the carrier before the consignee's title or substantial interest in the subject-matter of the shipment arises. Under the sections of the Code cited above, we think that upon the transfer to the plaintiffs of the bill of lading calling for the full quantity of corn, there was assigned to them the right of action for the defendant's loss or conversion of a part of it. When Askew & Co. became the owners of the bill of lading, they became the owners of all the corn wherever it might be, whether in the car or out of the car (Joiner v. Stallings, 127 Ga. 203, 56 S. E. 304); and if the defendant retained possession, custody, or control over a portion of it, by failing to deliver it on demand, or if the defendant broke its contract of carriage, as embodied in the bill of lading, by failing to deliver the corn to them or to the connecting carrier for them, the right to sue was complete in them. Reed v. Jones, 84 Ga. 390, 11 S. E. 401.

Chief Justice Simmons, in the case of American Nat. Bk. v. Georgia R. Co., 96 Ga. 668, 23 S. E. 898, 51 Am. St. Rep. 155, says: "A very large proportion of the business of the country is founded upon transfers of bills of lading; and if the transferee were required at his peril to ascertain from the carrier whether the representations made in the bill of lading are true or not, it would practically put an end to this class of transactions."

In the same case he also quotes approvingly from the case of McNeill v. Hill, Woolw. 96, Fed. Cas. No. 8,914, as follows: "A more modern, but still not recent, invention of like character, for the transfer, without the cumbersome and often impossible operations of actual delivery of articles of personal property, is the indorsement or assignment of bills of lading and warehouse receipts. Instruments of this kind are sui generis. From long use and trade they have come to have among commercial men a well-understood meaning, and the indorsement or assignment of them as absolutely transfers the general property of the goods and chattels therein named as would a bill of sale.

* * * If the warehouseman gives to the party who holds such receipt a false credit, he will not be suffered to contradict his statement which he has made in the receipt, so as to injure a party who has been misled by it." The plaintiffs' action is good, whether it be regarded as a suit by them as transferees of the cause of action ex contractu which would have inured to the original shippers, or by them as the actual owners on an implied assumpsit arising from the defendant's conversion by not delivering the goods to them on demand after they acquired the title through the bill of lading. "Even an action of tort may be maintained by the purchaser of personal property not in the possession of the seller at the time of the sale." Reed v. Janes, 84 Ga. 390, 11 S. E. 401. "The unlawful taking or conversion of personal property gives the wrongdoer no title. The title remains in the original owner or his assigns until judgment or satisfaction for the tort." Hall v. Robinson, 2 Comst. (N. Y.) 293. In Robinson v. Weeks, 6 How. Prac. (N. Y.) 161, it is held that the right of action for a chattel wrongfully converted may be assigned. We are not to be understood as holding that a right of action arising on account of a tort to property may or may not be assigned. That question is not before us.

2. It was insisted by the defendant in error that the case should have been dismissed in the court below, because no jurisdiction was shown, and because the suit should have been brought in Coweta county, in which the city of Newnan is located. The allegations of the petition are very indefinite and meager in this respect. The petition does allege enough, however, to show that the car of corn was not delivered by the defendant at Newnan, but that they effected this delivery through the Atlanta & West Point Railroad Company as connecting carrier. Following the precedent of Watson v. R. & D. R. Co., 91 Ga. 226, 18 S. E. 306, we take judicial cognizance of the fact that the Southern Railway Company is a foreign railway corporation operating lines partly in this state and partly in other states, and that it has a line extending from Chattanooga, Tenn., to Atlanta, Ga., but not to Newnan, Ga.; also that the Atlanta & West Point Railroad Company has a line of railway between Atlanta and Newnan, and that it has no other point of contact with the Southern Railway, except in Atlanta, or in Fulton county, in which Atlanta is situated. Under the bill of lading the defendant undertook to deliver to the connecting carrier all the corn specified, and therefore, since Atlanta is the place where that duty was to be performed, the breach of the contract is to be regarded as occurring in that city. Friedman v. Seaboard Air Line Railway, 124 Ga. 472, 52 S. E. 763. The courts of Fulton county, therefore, had jurisdiction of the action. Coakley v. Southern Ry. Co., 120 Ga. 960, 48 S. E. 372.

3. In what we have said above we have given the plaintiff the benefit of the theory that he was proceeding as upon a cause of action ex contractu. We do this because in some of its phases the petition is subject to such a construction, and the motion to dismiss was general and went to the whole petition. The court did not pass upon the special demurrers. The petition is, however, to use an expression from Chief Justice Bleckley (91 Ga. 226, 18 S. E. 306), "in many respects lamentably meager and deficient." It sets up in the same count inconsistent statements of fact, and declares upon the same cause of action as a tort as well as a contract, and is otherwise vague, indefinite, and uncertain. Since we are sustaining the action only so far as it sounds in contract, it follows that all allegations appropriate only to a suit in tort are mere surplusage and should be stricken. It is not in the interest of justice, nor in keeping with public policy, that plaintiffs should be allowed to proceed to trial with the pleadings in such shape as they are in this case. Fearing that the defendant may be regarded as having waived the special demurrers filed in the case, exercising the powers conferred on this court by Civ. Code 1895, § 5498 (2), we direct that the trial judge require the plaintiff to strike from his petition the allegations germane only to an action in tort, and that it be otherwise amended so as to make it appear that the plaintiff is proceeding either as transferee for Horne & Goans for a breach of the contract of shipment, or in his own right as owner of the goods upon the implied assumpsit arising from the defendant's keeping the remainder of the corn and not delivering it on demand, or in both of these capacities, if the petition be divided into separate counts for that purpose, and that upon the plaintiff's failing or refusing to do this his action be dismissed, without prejudice. The allegations as to the overcharge of freight show no cause of action originating in Fulton county. In fact, we infer from the petition that the overcharge was collected by the Atlanta & West Point Railroad Company, and not by the defendant, since the transaction occurred at Newnan; hence we direct that the allegations as to the overcharge of freight be stricken also.

Judgment reversed, with direction.

SOUTHERN RY. CO. v. OLIVER & MORROW. (No. 90.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. May 9, 1907.)

1. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE—PLEADING—COMPLAINT.

A statement of complaint for damages, attached to a summons in justice's court, itemizing the damages to certain buggies, giving the nature and amount of damage claimed as to each, and stating that "all the damages aforesaid were caused by the careless, negligent handling, keeping, and hauling of said buggies while in the care of said company as common carrier in the transportation of said buggies over its line of railway," was sufficient for the purposes of such an action for damages in a justice's court; and the demurrers thereto were properly overruled.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 31, Justices of the Peace, § 321.]

2. SAME—PLEADING.

In justices' courts it is neither possible, practicable, nor requisite to indulge in the niceties of pleading. All that is required is that there should be attached to the summons a copy of the "cause of action sued on." "The requirement of Civ. Code 1895, § 4116, as to summons and copy in a justice's court, is an exception to the general rules of pleading."

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 31, Justices of the Peace, §§ 307, 308.]

3. APPEAL—HARMLESS ERROR.

A new trial will not be granted for immaterial and harmless errors.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, § 4029.]

4. SAME.

Nor will a new trial be granted for an error not manifestly prejudicial to the party complaining thereof, but injurious, if at all, to the opposite party.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, § 4052.]

5. TRIAL—VERDICT.

The presumptions are in favor of the validity of the verdict of a jury. A verdict must be given a reasonable intendment, and the maxim "Id certum est quod certum reddi potest" is to be applied. Expression is to be given to the true meaning of the jury's finding upon the issues submitted to them only, and matters immaterial, and not involved in the controversy, or beyond the legitimate province of the jury, may be disregarded as surplusage.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, § 3755.]

6. SAME—SURPLUSAGE.

A verdict finding for the plaintiff, as damages, a certain sum, including the costs, is not void for uncertainty. It is without the province of the jury to determine the amount of costs to be paid or the party liable therefor. The amount of costs is fixed by law, and liability therefor, though dependent upon the verdict, is determined by law. Where a jury attempts to award costs, that portion of the verdict will be rejected as surplusage, and will not affect the residue of a verdict properly sustained. "Utile per inutile non vitiatur."

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 46, Trial, § 789.]

Action by Oliver & Morrow against the Southern Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff before a justice, and from a judgment overruling a certiorari, defendant brings error. Affirmed.

John J. Strickland, Ed. Quillian, and C. R. Faulkner, for plaintiff in error. Wilford B. Sloan, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. Oliver & Morrow brought suit in a justice's court of Hall county against the Southern Railway Company for alleged damage to three certain "Chickamauga buggies." The declaration or petition to that court, with the summons attached, was served on the agent of the Southern Railway Company at Gainesville, in that county, and the defendant company answered, denying the allegations of plaintiff's declaration or petition, and moved to dismiss the suit on the ground that there was no cause of action set out in the declaration or summons. The court overruled the motion, and the case was submitted, resulting in a judgment in favor of the defendant for costs. Plaintiff appealed the case to a jury in that court, and on the call for trial by a jury the defendant moved to dismiss, upon the same grounds urged on the former trial. The court refused to hear the motion, and overruled it, on the ground that it had been passed on at the former trial; and the case was submitted to a jury. The evidence introduced on the trial by both plaintiff and defendant disclosed the fact that the buggies alleged to have been damaged were shipped by the Chickamauga Buggy Company, of Chattanooga, Tenn., to itself at Oakwood, Ga., and the bill of lading, with sight draft on Oliver & Morrow attached, was sent to the bank at Flowery Branch, Ga., and the buggies delivered to the plaintiff on payment of the sight draft and presentation of the bill of lading to the agent of the defendant at Oakwood. The jury returned a verdict in favor of plaintiff for $15, including costs. The defendant carried the case to the superior court by certiorari, the certiorari was overruled, and defendant excepts to this judgment.

The plaintiff in error's case rests upon seven assignments of error, contained in its petition for certiorari. It alleges that the justice's court erred (1) in refusing to sustain the petitioner's demurrer, and overruling the motion to dismiss, at the first trial; (2) in refusing to hear and sustain the demurrer and motion to dismiss, at the second trial; (3) in overruling the motion of the defendant to rule out the testimony of Hugh Morrow, upon the grounds stated in the petition; (4) in stating in the presence and hearing of the jury, in ruling upon the waybill introduced by the defendant, that "the court cannot see the relevancy of the waybill, or that it has anything to do with the case, but will let it go in for what it is worth"; (5) in admitting the letter purporting to be signed by C. B. Millikin; (6) in making the remark, in the presence and hearing of the jury, that "the court will let the letter go along in with the waybill you introduced awhile ago," in making his ruling as to the letter of C. B. Millikin. (7) Petitioner further alleges that the verdict of the jury is error, first, because there is not evidence sufficient to sustain it, and it is contrary to the evidence introduced; and, second, because the verdict is not a lawful one.

The first two assignments will be considered together; for, although the reason of the justice for his second ruling may be wrong, the ruling itself both on the first trial and the second is the same. In each instance the court refused to sustain the demurrer and dismiss the suit. We do not think there was any error in refusing to sustain the demurrer. Under the rulings in Ga. So. & F. R. Co. v. Barfield, 1 Ga. App. 203, 58 S. E. 236, and cases therein cited, the petition was full enough to put the defendant on notice and to enable it to prepare its defense; and, as it is attached to a proper summons, it is immaterial whether the summons precedes the petition, or follows it. In a justice's court it is not only impossible, but impracticable, to indulge in the niceties of pleading.

In the third assignment of error complaint is made that the court refused to rule out the testimony of Hugh Morrow, as being indefinite and irrelevant. The witness seems to have known nothing of the case, and his testimony appears to be immaterial; but for that very reason the ruling of the court was not hurtful to the defendant, and it is well settled that new trials are not granted for immaterial evidence.

As to the fourth exception and the sixth, we are of the opinion that the remarks of the court afford no ground of complaint to the plaintiff in error. In so far as they are improper and harmful they tended to be hurtful to the plaintiff below, now defendant in error. Both the waybill and letter of which the justice of the peace was speaking were introduced by the plaintiff, and the remark "that the court cannot see the relevancy of the waybill or that it has anything to do with the case," which tended to belittle that paper, when followed by the remark, with reference to the letter, that "the court will let the letter go along in with the waybill you introduced awhile ago," put the letter in the same disparaged class. Under the rulings in Askew v. Southern Ry. Co., 1 Ga. App. 79, 58 S. E. 242, the holder of a bill of lading attached to a draft, possession of which has been legally secured by payment of the draft, has the right to maintain an action as a consignee pro hac vice. It appeared in this case that the original bill of lading was lost, and the waybill is circumstantial evidence of the fact that there had been a bill of lading. For these reasons, both the waybill and the letter of Milklin (notifying Oliver & Morrow that the Bank of Flowery Branch held a sight draft with bill of lading attached) were material to the plaintiff's case.

The seventh exception is divided into two parts. The first alleges that the verdict of the jury is contrary to the evidence and there is not sufficient evidence to sustain it. The second objects to the form of the verdict, and alleges that the verdict rendered is not a lawful one. In regard to the first exception to the verdict, it is only necessary to say that by repeated rulings of this court the verdict of a jury is sufficiently sustained if there is any evidence to support it; and in this case it appears that the consignors shipped certain buggies to themselves as consignees and drew a draft, through the Bank of Flowery Branch, for the purchase price, with the bill of lading attached. The plaintiffs paid the draft, and the bill of lading was delivered to them, and under the decision in the Askew Case, supra, they became, for the purposes of the case, the consignees. According to the testimony, two of these buggies were damaged—one of them, according to the evidence more than $5, and the other $12.50. The petition set forth the items of damage as follows: January 30th, by injury to one Chickamauga buggy, by tearing lining, back, and top, $5; January 30th, by tearing cushion and scratching back, $7.50; April 24th, damages to straps, shaft, and top, $12.50—making a total of $25. There was no evidence as to the amount of the damage done to the buggy on January 30th by tearing the cushion and scratching the back, so that the $7.50 item must be eliminated; but the first witness for the plaintiff testified as follows: "I know something about the injury to the three buggies sued for. The lining, back, and top of one was torn so bad we could hardly sell the buggy. We were really damaged more than we have sued for." We think that this is sufficient evidence, if believed by the jury, to fix the amount of the item of damage to the first buggy, as stated in the petition, and as contained in the notice of damage given the company. This witness and others swore that the damage to the buggy, received on April 24th was $12.50; so that the jury had evidence which would have authorized a finding of $17.50.

We come, therefore, to the assignment alleging that the verdict, "We, the jury, find for the plaintiffs, Oliver & Morrow, $15.00, fifteen dollars, including costs of suit," is not a lawful one. The plaintiff in error makes the point that the verdict is illegal and void for uncertainty. The verdict adds to its finding for the plaintiff the words, "including costs." We were inclined at first to attach considerable importance to the point; but upon more careful investigation, and upon consideration of the principle that the verdicts of juries are to be given a reasonable intentment, we are clear that the verdict is good, and the words, "including costs," may either be treated as surplusage, or the word "including" be interpreted as meaning "and," which was more probably the intent of the jury. It is well settled that surplusage may be rejected from a verdict otherwise proper and sustained by evidence. The doctrine is, "Utile per inutile non vitiatur." In passing upon the costs, the jury did a useless thing; for the costs are fixed by law, and by law follow and are carried by the verdict. The identical question as to costs has not been decided in this state, so far as we are able to discover, but has been passed upon in a number of other jurisdictions. In the case of State v. Knight, 46 Mo. 83, where a circuit judge refused to receive a verdict: "We, the jury, find a verdict for defendants, they to pay the costs of this suit"—the Supreme Court of Missouri, by mandamus, ordered the verdict received, and held that "the jury found for the defendant. The verdict was good and complete. The matter of costs was not in issue, and was not submitted to them. That part of their verdict, therefore, was merely void, and should have been disregarded as surplusage." And, while the question of costs has not been decided in this state, much more important matters have been treated as surplusage in order to maintain the general principle that expression should be given to the true meaning of the jury's finding. In Knapp v. Harris, 60 Ga. 404, the jury found for the defendant one-fifth of certain real estate subject to dower, and this was one of the assignments of error insisted upon. The Supreme Court affirmed the judgment, and held that "it was irregular of the jury to notice the right of dower, that right being wholly dehors the case on trial, but the verdict as a whole is not vitiated by this reference to irregular matter, nor by any misdirection of the court touching that matter. What is said of dower in the verdict is mere surplusage, and is to be so treated." In Hudson v. Hawkins, 79 Ga. 274, 4 S. E. 682, the jury, often finding upon the exceptions to an auditor's report seriatim, went further and found an aggregate sum for the plaintiff, which was excepted to as not being true and legal. The trial court, in making its judgment, disregarded the aggregate sum found by the jury and treated it as surplusage. This was approved; the Supreme Court holding that the court was right in treating the illegal portion of the verdict as surplusage. The case of North & South Railroad Co. v. Crayton, 86 Ga. 499, 12 S. E. 877, was, like the present case, an action for damages. A motion in arrest of judgment was made upon the ground of uncertainty in the verdict. The case went to the Supreme Court, and Bleckley, C. J., delivering the opinion, ruled as follows: "The motion in arrest of judgment was properly overruled. The verdict was in these words, 'We, the jury, find for plaintiff $800, less amount of freight, with interest,' etc. The words, 'less amount of freight,' are surplusage. There was no freight involved in the issue on trial. The verdict is for $800 less nothing, and this is equivalent to $800 simply. The jury having found no amount by which it is to be diminished, it cannot be diminished at all." "When a jury find, not only the issues submitted to them, but embrace in their verdict the determination of matters not involved in the controversy, these redundant matters are denominated 'surplusage.' The maxim, 'Utile per inutile non vitiatur,' is applicable, and such portion of the verdict as lies beyond the legitimate province of the jury may be disregarded or rejected." 29 Am. & Eng. Enc. L. (2d Ed.) 1026.

It is, of course, a generally recognized rule of practice that a verdict for damages, whether liquidated or unliquidated, if found for the plaintiff, expressly states the amount to which the jury think the plaintiff is entitled; but it is evident to our minds that the jury intended to add the costs to their finding of $15, and simply used the word "including" inaptly, instead of the proper word "and," meaning thereby that they included, with the $15 in their verdict, whatever might be costs. The maxim, 'Id certum est quod certum reddi potest,' is applicable to verdicts. In other words, they intended to include the costs, not in the $15, but in the verdict. The only complaint that can be made of this verdict is that it may be uncertain, because the amount of the costs may not be known and may not have been known to the jury. A substantial certainty to a common and reasonable intent is all that is essential to a valid verdict. Courts are inclined to favor the validity of a verdict, and, no matter what requisite may be apparently lacking, it will be supported if from the terms of the finding and the contents of the record it can be maintained. The case at bar is not like the case of Sellers v. Mann, 113 Ga. 643, 39 S. E. 11, where the finding of the jury was expressed in the words: "We, the jury, find for the plaintiff nominal damages." That was held not to be a legal verdict, because it named no amount. That strictness of construction has been greatly relaxed, so as to give effect to the reasonable meaning of a verdict, rather than to its exact words, is shown by the fact that in Jackson v. Jackson, 40 Ga. 153, the verdict was held to be void, because the jury found for the plaintiff principal, interest, and costs, without any reference in their finding to a disputed credit on the note in question; but the same question being presented in the same case, in 47 Ga. 117, the Supreme Court overruled the former decision, upon the authority of Mitchell v. Addison, 20 Ga. 50. The holding of the court, being "Id certum est quod certum reddi potest," is too trite a maxim to need elaboration. The finding is, therefore, sufficiently certain. See, also, Phillips v. Behn, 19 Ga. 298; Mitchell v. Addison, 20 Ga. 54; Giles v. Spinks, 64 Ga. 205 (3). In the latter case the Supreme Court held that a verdict finding that the plaintiff was damaged two certain principal sums on two notes, and interest at a certain per cent. on each, even though the interest was at different rates, and although the verdict was too large, was not illegal for uncertainty, and ordered that the verdict be reduced to $100 and stand for that sum as damages, with costs of suit. And accordingly the court reversed a judgment arresting the judgment on this verdict. "In Williams & Co. v. Brown, Sheriff, 57 Ga. 304, this court held that 'where a verdict may by a reasonable construction be understood, and a legal judgment entered thereon, it is sufficient.'" Seifert v. Holt, 82 Ga. 761, 9 S. E. 843; Cleghorn v. Love, 24 Ga. 591 (7). In Massey v. Duren, 7 S. C. 810, it was held: "In the case at bar the verdict, without the words which 'cumber' it, was certain as to the intention of the jury, and valid as their expression on the very issues on which they were to pass. To set it aside because of additional words which do not really qualify the judgment of the jury on the material issues involved, and thus permit a second trial, would be without any sufficient cause." In Hancock v. Buckley, 18 Mo. App. 459, the verdict was for the plaintiff, dividing the costs between the parties. It was held that this latter part of the verdict, being wholly outside of the issues submitted to the jury, was to be treated as surplusage and should not arrest judgment, for "utile per inutile non vitiatur." If the jury, in rendering a verdict, decides the whole issue, and then adds other immaterial things, the verdict is not thereby vitiated. Wallis v. Bazet, 34 La. Ann. 131. In Windham v. Williams, 27 Miss. 318, it is declared that, if more is found by the jury than is necessary, it may be disregarded as surplusage. It does not vitiate that which is necessary and well found. To the same effect is Worthan v. Brewster, 30 Ga. 115.

Judgment affirmed.

SOUTHERN RY. CO. v. CHESTNUT MOUNTAIN MERCHANDISE CO. (No. 89.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. May 9, 1907.)

1. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE—CERTIORARI TO VERDICT—FINAL JUDGMENT.

Certiorari to the superior court will lie from the verdict of the jury in a justice's court, without regard to the judgment. Civ. Code 1895, § 4149. And, where such a verdict has been rendered, it is not necessary that either the petition for certiorari or the answer of the magistrate should show the final judgment. It is the verdict, and not the formal judgment, following that verdict as matter of course, which must be attacked. Section 4149, supra, affords an exception to the general rule that a final judgment must be shown. It is based upon the reason that justice's courts have no power to grant new trials; and the party injured by a verdict of the jury in a justice's court must go to the superior court, or the verdict will stand.

2. SAME—ANSWER OF JUSTICE.

But while, in a case where there has been an appeal to a jury in a justice's court, "the certiorari is to correct the verdict," the answer of the magistrate must show that there was a verdict, and what verdict, if any, was rendered.

3. SAME.

Consequently, where the answer of the magistrate did not verify the allegations of the petition for certiorari as to the rendition of a verdict by the jury, and no exceptions were taken, to require an answer more explicit, there was no error on the part of the judge of the superior court in overruling the certiorari. Assignments of error in a petition for certiorari, which are not verified by the answer of the original trial court, present nothing for determination by the superior court or the Court of Appeals.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Hall County; Kimsey, Judge.

Action by the Chestnut Mountain Merchandise Company, for use of, etc., against the Southern Railway Company. From an order of the justice refusing to sustain a demurrer, the railroad applied for writ of certiorari; and from a judgment overruling the writ, it brings error. Affirmed.

John J. Strickland, Ed. Quillian and C. R. Faulkner, for plaintiff in error. Wilford B. Sloan, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. The plaintiff in error filed a petition for certiorari, making assignments of error as to refusal to sustain a demurrer, and as to the admitting in evidence of the receipt of its agent for the freight on certain buggies, and the allowance of an amendment making Oliver & Morrow uses of the Chestnut Mountain Merchandise Company. The petition further alleged that the verdict was erroneous, for lack of evidence. The certiorari was overruled by the judge of the superior court, and exception is taken to his judgment.

We cannot reverse the judgment overruling the certiorari. The judge of the superior court must get the truth of the case from the answer. The certiorari would not lie until the final determination of the case in the justice's court, and the answer of the justice did not show, either that the case had been finally decided by verdict, or, if so, what was the finding of the jury. Ordinarily it must appear that there has been a final judgment, and the answer of the justice must verify the judgment alleged as being the judgment which was rendered. By the terms of Civ. Code of 1895, § 4149, where a case is appealed to a jury in a justice's court, the verdict, instead of the judgment, must be excepted to. This is for the reason, as stated by Chief Justice Jackson in Boroughs v. White, 69 Ga. 844, in discussing that section (then section 4157j) of the Code, that "the purpose of this enactment is to provide for a new trial, where the facts and law demand it. No power exists in the justice court to award a new trial in any case. To obtain it, the injured party must go to the superior court by writ of certiorari, or the verdict of the five men who try the appeal in the justice court will stand forever, no matter how unjust it may be." But, while it was not necessary that the answer of the justice in this case should show a final judgment, which would follow as a matter of course upon the rendition of the verdict, it was necessary that the answer of the justice should verify the fact that the trial before the jury had resulted in a verdict, or else the certiorari would have been prematurely brought, and that it should show that the verdict complained of in the petition was in reality the verdict rendered, or else nothing was presented for the determination of the court. As the justice in this case answered merely that the case "was tried before a jury, as set forth in the petition," there was nothing before the judge of the superior court for determination, and the certiorari was properly overruled; and his decision, under the express ruling in Manning v. Gainesville, 125 Ga. 239, 53 S. E. 1002, and cases therein cited, must be affirmed.

We do this the more willingly because, under the decisions of this court in G. S. & F. R. Co. v. Barfield, 1 Ga. App. 203, 58 S. E. 236, Askew v. Southern Ry. Co., 1 Ga. App. 79, 58 S. E. 242, and Davis v. Kirkland, 1 Ga. App. 5, 58 S. E. 209, there is no merit in the other assignment of error. The opinion in Brown v. Bonds, 125 Ga. 841, 842, 844, 54 S. E. 933, cited by learned counsel for the defendant in error as authority for his contention that, even where certiorari is taken from the result of a trial on appeal in a justice's court, a final judgment must appear, is not in conflict with what we have ruled above. Nor was the question now before us involved in the case of Brown v. Bonds. For that reason it is not applicable to this case. The decision in W. & A. R. R. v. Carson, 70 Ga. 389 (2), is controlling. It distinctly and properly construes section 4149 of the Civil Code of 1895, and expressly holds that it is the verdict of the jury, and not the judgment thereon, which is to be corrected by certiorari.

Judgment affirmed.

DUNCAN v. STATE. (No. 171.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Jan. 31, 1907.)

1. HOMICIDE—ASSAULT WITH INTENT TO KILL—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where a defendant is on trial for assault with intent to murder, the intention to kill must be proved, and is a question of fact, the determination of which is the exclusive province of the jury. To charge the jury in such a case that if they believed defendant committed an assault as charged in the bill of indictment, and that the offense would have been murder if death had resulted as a consequence, then the jury would be authorized to find the defendant guilty of the offense of assault with intent to murder, is reversible error.

2. CRIMINAL LAW—INSTRUCTIONS—CURE OF ERROR BY OTHER INSTRUCTION.

Nor is the error cured by a limitation upon that portion of the charge, by reference to the indictment, in these words: "Committed an assault upon A. T. Daniel, as charged in the bill of indictment."

3. HOMICIDE—ASSAULT WITH INTENT TO KILL—INSTRUCTIONS.

The charge requested: "If you believe that, if the defendant had killed Daniel under the circumstances proven in this case, he would not have been guilty of the offense of murder, then I charge you that you cannot convict the defendant of the offense of assault with intent to murder"—was a correct statement of a principle of law applicable in this case, the benefit of which the defendant was entitled to receive. It was, however, not reversible error to refuse to give it in charge to the jury, in view of the charge given upon this subject.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 28, Homicide, § 597.]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Wilcox County; Martin, Judge.

Bill Duncan was convicted of assault with intent to kill, and brings error. Reversed.

John R. Cooper, for plaintiff in error. E. D. Graham, Sol. Gen., for the State.

RUSSELL, J. The defendant was indicted for the offense of assault with intent to murder, and on the trial was convicted. He assigns error on a portion of the charge of the trial judge, and on the refusal of the court to give in charge a written request presented by his counsel.

1. The charge of which complaint is made is in these words: "Now, if you should believe beyond a reasonable doubt, from the law given you in charge and the evidence introduced and admitted during the trial of the case, that the defendant, Bill Duncan, committed an assault upon A. T. Daniel, as charged in the bill of indictment, and that it would have been murder if death had resulted in consequence of such an assault, then you would be authorized to find the defendant guilty of the offense of assault with intent to murder. If you do not so believe, you would not be authorized to find him guilty of this offense." It is evident that this charge deprived the jury of their right to determine one of the essential elements of the crime with which the defendant stood charged; i. e., to determine it from the evidence. The intention to kill is an absolutely essential ingredient of the offense of assault with intent to murder, and must always be proved. It cannot be presumed or deduced, as stated by the learned trial judge who presided in this case. Discussion of this proposition is useless, because it has been so frequently decided as to require no elaboration. Gilbert v. State, 90 Ga. 691, 16 S. E. 652; Gallery v. State, 92 Ga. 463, 17 S. E. 863; Lanier v. State, 106 Ga. 368, 32 S. E. 335. See, also, Patterson v. State, 85 Ga. 133, 11 S. E. 620, 21 Am. St. Rep. 152. "The law will impute the intention to kill where there is killing, but not where there is none. * * * That an effect not produced, and which, if produced, would have constituted a different offense from that actually committed, was intended, is surely for determination by the jury as a matter of fact." It will be noticed that there has been no restriction in the later cases of the doctrine thus announced by Justice Blandford in the Patterson Case.

2. But it is insisted by counsel for defendant in error that the indictment charges all the essential elements of the crime of assault with intent to murder, and that therefore it was not erroneous for the court to charge that if the jury found that defendant "committed the assault on Daniel, as charged in the bill of indictment," etc., they would be authorized to find him guilty of assault with intent to murder; and we are referred to Jackson v. State, 125 Ga. 101, 53 S. E. 607, as authority. No opinion was rendered in that case; but, from reading the headnotes, we see a board distinction between the charge dealt with there and the one now under consideration. The wording of the charge in the Jackson Case is quite different from that in the present case, and the portion of the charge there complained of, directly and specifically, refers the jury to proper instructions which had been given and were to be given on the subject of intention; and with all this the Supreme Court placed its decision solely on the ground that the error was not harmful under the particular facts of that case. In the case at bar we are not prepared to say as much. The error in the charge in the Jackson Case could well have been harmless, for the first statement of the judge quoted in the headnotes was (after referring to the rules above mentioned): "If you believe * * * that the defendant was guilty of making an assault with intent to murder," etc.; not "an assault," as in this case. In the Jackson Case the judge had already given the jury the proper rules for determining whether the offense was assault with intent to murder, and then proceeded to add to the words, "If you believe that the defendant was guilty of making an assault with intent to murder," other language, some of which was erroneous, but which, even then, was qualified by the words, "under the circumstances"; and the reviewing court held that, in view of what preceded, the language used was not necessarily harmful. In the present case the trial judge charges that, if the jury believe that "the defendant committed an assault upon Daniel," it may become an assault with intent to murder, by reason of a certain presumption—a presumption which arises in cases of homicide, but which is never implied where death does not ensue. As was tersely said by Judge Lumpkin, in the Napper Case, 123 Ga. 573, 51 S. E. 593: "Where death does not result, the intent to kill is not matter of legal presumption, but is a matter to be found by the jury." We are clear that the defendant is entitled to have more specific instructions given to the jury on the vital question of intention than a mere passing reference to the indictment, which contains the words, "with intent then and there to kill," etc.; more especially as the jury were told immediately, after the mere mention of the indictment in the very next succeeding words, that, if they believed it would have been murder if death had resulted, then they would be authorized to find defendant guilty of assault with intent to murder.

3. The defendant, at the proper time, presented a written request to the court to charge as follows: "Gentlemen of the jury, if you believe that, if the defendant had killed Daniel under the circumstances proven in this case, he would not have been guilty of the offense of murder, then I charge you that you cannot convict the defendant of the offense of assault with intent to murder." This request is the converse of the charge which has been held to be erroneous; and for that reason it might be thought to be inappropriate. But in Napper v. State, supra, Lumpkin, J., very clearly shows that any supposed inconsistency is only apparent, but not real; and a request, in substantially the same words as that now before us, was approved. 123 Ga. 574, 51 S. E. 592. In the Napper Case, however, no such charge as that of which complaint is made in this case was given, and a new trial was refused because the court was satisfied, upon an examination of the entire charge, that it covered the principle included in the request. And in this case, after a critical review of the entire charge, we would hold the same thing, and affirm the judgment, were this refusal to charge the only error assigned. But, in view of that portion of the charge which is the ground of the first complaint above stated (and which has been held erroneous, in several cases subsequent to those we cite), it would have been better to have presented the request to the jury in its own verbiage. The concluding words of the particular charge of which complaint is made do not afford a substantial compliance with the request; for, when the judge added, "If you do not so believe, you would not be authorized to find him guilty of this offense," the language was so general that the jury might have well been left in doubt as to whether he referred to the assault or to the intent—both of which had just been mentioned in the same connection.

We are compelled to grant a new trial, although we might be reluctant to do so on account of the evidence as it appears in the record. Our sense of obligation to the law leaves no alternative.

Judgment reversed.

SOUTHERN COTTON OIL CO. v. GLADMAN. (No. 83.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Feb. 20, 1907.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT—DUTY TO FURNISH SAFE PLACE IN WHICH TO WORK.

The master is under absolute duty to his servant, not only to furnish him a safe place in which to work, but also to warn him of any unusual or newly developed dangers which arise in the course of the employment and which are likely to escape an ordinarily prudent servant's knowledge under the circumstances.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 34, Master and Servant, §§ 171-174, 297-310.]

2. SAME.

The servant may, without creating an imputation of negligence against himself, rely upon the master's performance of these duties until such time as he shall discover, or in the exercise of ordinary diligence should discover, that there has been a failure in this respect upon the master's part.

3. SAME—ASSUMPTION OF RISKS—WHAT RISKS ASSUMED.

The assumption by the servant of the known ordinary risks, even of a dangerous employment, does not carry with it the assumption of an unknown supervening extraordinary hazard occasioned by the master's negligence.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 34, Master and Servant, §§ 547-549.]

4. SAME.

A master is negligent and responsible to the servant for injuries resulting proximately therefrom, if by his order he causes the servant to do an act which exposes him to a danger known to the master, but unknown to the servant. *

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 34, Master and Servant, §§ 290-296.]

5. SAME.

The direct order of the master to do an act in the performance of which the servant is injured may be shown by the servant as a circumstance tending to excuse him from the exercise of that degree of caution which would lawfully be expected of him in the absence of such command.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 34, Master and Servant, §§ 778-788.]

6. SAME.

Even the direct and immediate order of the master will not justify a servant in rashly exposing himself to a known and obvious danger; and if, in compliance with the command in such cases, the servant be injured, he cannot recover of the master therefor.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 34, Master and Servant, §§ 778-788.]

7. SAME.

Although the servant, at the time of the injury, may be performing a duty so dangerous as to involve the element of rashness, yet if this rash conduct is not a natural, proximate, or contributory cause of his being hurt, and the injuries are received by reason of an independent act of negligence on the master's part, the mere fact of his being engaged in the rash conduct mentioned will not preclude his right of recovery.

8. NEGLIGENCE — ACTIONS — QUESTION FOR JURY.

Questions of diligence and of negligence, including contributory negligence, address themselves peculiarly to the jury, and a court properly declines to solve them by decision on demurrer, except in plain, indisputable cases.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Washington; Hardeman, Judge.

Action by one Gladman against the Southern Cotton Oil Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Lamar & Callaway, for plaintiff in error. F. H. Colley and R. C. Norman, for defendant in error.

POWELL, J. The exception in this case is to the overruling of a demurrer. Gladman sued the Southern Cotton Oil Company for personal injuries sustained by him pending the relation of master and servant. The parts of the petition material to an understanding of the points decided may be summarized as follows: Plaintiff was a member of the night crew at defendant's plant at Washington, Ga., and among other duties there devolved upon him the oiling of the bearings upon a certain piece of machinery. In order to perform this duty it was necessary for him to mount a ladder, as during the course of his employment he had frequently done with safety; there being no obstruction or object of danger to be encountered in his so doing. The locality in which this service was performed had been, until about two weeks prior to the date of the injury, illuminated by an electric light; and during the period while the light was present the plaintiff had so thoroughly familiarized himself with the location of objects that he was able, "with perfect safety and without peril," to perform this duty even in the dark. One night, about two weeks after the light had been removed, the plaintiff, relying upon a continuance of previously existing conditions, went up this ladder to oil the machinery. During that day, without notice to the plaintiff, the defendant had caused a metal pulley to be attached to a rapidly revolving shaft, and to be located just above the ladder, and in such close proximity thereto that to have attempted to mount the ladder and oil the machinery in a bright day would have been perilous, and at night almost impossible, without grave danger to life and limb. The plaintiff was ignorant of this new condition, and was given no warning thereof, but, on the contrary, was mounting the ladder in obedience to an expressed command from his master to go up and oil the bearings. Under these circumstances he was struck by the pulley and injured. The petition also contains the ordinary allegations as to the master's knowledge of this danger and of the plaintiff's lack of knowledge, either actual or constructive. The defendant filed a general demurrer, and amplified the grounds by contentions that it appears from the petition that the injuries were the result of the plaintiff's own negligence; that plaintiff by the exercise of ordinary care could have avoided the injury; that the defendant was without negligence contributing to the injury; that plaintiff's own negligence in going into a place known by him to be dangerous, without a light, amounted to rashness; that the plaintiff's means of knowledge or of discovering the dangers incident to the position in which he was placed was equal to that of defendant; that the plaintiff ventured, in the dark, without a light, into close and dangerous proximity to and into the midst of dangerous machinery while in motion, which was such a self-evidently dangerous performance that the plaintiff thereby assumed the risk and dangers thereof. The trial court overruled the demurrer.

1. That it is an actionable wrong for the master to so change the arrangement of his plant as to place such a dangerous instrumentality as a rapidly revolving metal pulley in close and perilous proximity to a ladder which it is the duty of a servant to mount in the dark, and to send the servant up the ladder without notice or warning, is too axiomatic to admit of discussion or the citation of authority. As Labatt says, in his Master & Servant, § 240: "A master is prima facie bound to instruct the servant as to all risks which are abnormal or extraordinary, and are at the same time of such a kind that the servant cannot be held chargeable with adequate comprehension of their nature and extent, or of the proper means by which to safeguard himself. The presumption is that all risks which belong to this category are not known to the servant. Hence the question whether the servant should have been warned is always for the jury, where the evidence is fairly susceptible of the construction that the peril to which his injury was due was one of this description, and there is no positive evidence tending to charge him with actual or constructive knowledge of that peril. This principle is equally applicable where the risks in question existed at the time when the servant commenced the performance of his contract, or were afterwards created by some material change in the intrinsic condition or relative arrangements of the instrumentalities by which the work was being done, or of the substances which the injured person or his coemployees were required to handle."

2, 3. "As a general rule, a servant is under no obligation to inspect the appliances about which he works, or that part of the plant by which his safety may be affected, for the purpose of discovering concealed dangers which would not be disclosed by superficial observation." He may rely upon the presumption that the master will perform the duties required of him as to the safety of the plant and of the instrumentalities by which the work is to be performed. Southern Cotton Oil Co. v. Dukes, 121 Ga. 787, 49 S. E. 788 (2); Duke v. Bibb Mfg. Co., 120 Ga. 1074, 48 S. E. 408. Of course, if as a matter of fact a servant knows of the creation or of the existence of the abnormally dangerous condition, or in the exercise of ordinary diligence should know of it, his relation to it is similar to what it would be if the hazard were a normal one. Crown Cotton Mills v. McNally, 123 Ga. 35, 51 S. E. 13; Stubbs v. Atlanta Cotton Mills, 92 Ga. 495, 17 S. E. 746; Skipper v. Southern Cotton Oil Co., 120 Ga. 942, 48 S. E. 359; Steele v. Georgia Iron Co., 121 Ga. 460, 49 S. E. 291. The ordinary and usual risks of the employment, though there be great dangers attendant thereon, are assumed by the servant. He does not assume the risk of additional, unknown dangers imposed by the master's negligence; nor is he bound to anticipate such dangers. Such supervening negligence of the master creates an extraordinary hazard, upon which a recovery of damages may be predicated. Southern Cotton Oil Co. v. Dukes, supra; Blount Carriage Co. v. Ware, 125 Ga. 571, 54 S. E. 637.

4. Among the absolute, continuous, and nondelegable duties of the master to the servant is the duty "to refrain from giving orders which will require a servant to put himself in such position that he will be subjected to the risks of injuries from a dangerous instrumentality." Labatt, M. & S. § 114; Moore v. Dublin Cotton Mills, 127 Ga. 609, 56 S. E. 839. Some courts have characterized a breach of this duty as being almost criminal. Herdler v. Buck's Stove & Range Co., 136 Mo. 17, 37 S. W. 115.

5. Since the servant is authorized to act upon the belief that the master will properly perform all his duties growing out of the relation, he is also justifiable in taking for granted that the master will not give him an order which will expose him to unusual danger and to risks not already assumed by him. As Justice Cobb says, in the case of Moore v. Dublin Cotton Mills, supra: "A servant is bound to obey the order of his master, unless the command includes a violation of the law, or the act required is so obviously dangerous that no person of ordinary prudence would undertake to perform it. Where the master himself gives the order, and the servant obeys it, and is injured as a consequence thereof, of course, the master is liable." We quote again from another portion of this same opinion: "If a servant, although an adult, and fully cognizant of his general duty in reference to the machine, and aware of the dangers ordinarily incident to its operation, obeys a direct order of a servant, authorized by his master to give the direction, in reference to the mode and manner of operating the machine, and injury results, the master is liable, unless the act required to be done is one so obviously dangerous that no reasonably prudent man would undertake to perform it, or the servant was aware of the danger, or could, by the exercise of ordinary care, have discovered it, and the master had equal means with the servant of discovering the danger attendant upon obedience of the order." In discussing the doctrine that contributory negligence is usually negated by evidence that the servant acted upon a direct order, Labatt, M. & S. § 439, says: "Although the circumstances, when abstracted from the facts of the giving of the order, may be such as to justify a court in holding that the servant appreciated the danger to which his injury was due, and was negligent in subjecting himself to that danger, such a conclusion is, in a large number of instances, not warrantable, if the testimony goes to show that the immediate occasion of his being subjected to that danger was his compliance with the order. The effect of this doctrine is that, where the servant, in obedience to an order, performs a duty which, though dangerous, is not so dangerous as to threaten immediate injury, or where it is reasonably probable that the work may be safely done by using more than ordinary caution or skill, he may recover, if injured. It will be seen that this rule, when analyzed, amounts to nothing more than a statement that, in determining what is ordinary care on the part of a given individual, all the circumstances of his position should be regarded, including, in cases like the present, the servant's orders, the demands of his duty, the apparent risk to be met, and the purpose of his action, no less than his physical surroundings. Having weighed all these considerations, unless the case then discloses that the risk was such as would not be taken by a man of common prudence so situated, the court cannot justly declare that the taking of that risk by the servant in obedience to orders was negligence. The practical result of such a doctrine, when stated in terms of the servant's knowledge, is that the servant may maintain an action unless he not only knows what is the risk to be encountered, but also that it will probably be attended with injury which he cannot avoid by the exercise of care and caution."

6. Of course, a servant who rashly exposes himself to a known danger, which common prudence ought to show him could not be encountered without probable injury, cannot recover in case he is thereby injured, even though his conduct be sanctioned or commanded by the master.

7. The rash act of the servant, however, in order to preclude his recovery, if his injury result from negligence of the master, must be a natural, proximate, or contributing cause of the injury. This rule is implied in the epithet "contributory," as applied to the servant's alleged negligence, and is sustained by so great an abundance of authority as to preclude the necessity for citations. In the case at bar it may have been rash for the servant to perform the alleged duty of mounting a ladder and oiling the bearings of revolving machinery in the dark. If he had been hurt by falling from the ladder, or by being struck or caught by the machinery in its usual condition, his rashness in undertaking the work would have precluded a recovery. But the quality of his rashness must be measured in accordance with the surroundings as he had known them, and as he had a right to expect still to find them. He was not hurt by the dangers he had undertaken to encounter, but by a new and unexpected thing of danger, attributable directly to his master's negligence.

8. The statement of the eighth headnote is also too well recognized to require elaboration. We announce it merely as basis for the statement that upon the trial the defendant may ask the opinion of the jury as to those matters of negligence and of contributory negligence which it is sought to have the judge solve by demurrer; and if that branch of the court shall decide that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence under the circumstances, they should find for the defendant, and this court will freely yield its acquiescence to their verdict.

Judgment affirmed.

KING v. SEABOARD AIR LINE RY.

SEABOARD AIR LINE RY. v. KING.

(Nos. 28, 29.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Jan. 29, 1907.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT—INJURIES TO SERVANT—PRESUMPTIONS.

In a suit by an employé against a railway company for an injury received in the running of the cars, where the negligent thing complained of existed independently of the acts of the plaintiff or of a fellow servant, a presumption arises, upon proof of the injury having been so received, that the company was negligent, and that the plaintiff was not at fault.

2. SAME—DANGEROUS APPLIANCES.

A servant may recover from his master for an injury occasioned by a dangerous instrumentality negligently maintained by the master, although it appear that the servant was not ignorant of the existence of such dangerous instrumentality, if it is shown that at the time of the injury the servant was rendered oblivious or otherwise incapable of exercising his information as to the existence of the dangerous thing, on account of the engrossing character of the work at hand or other excusing circumstances brought about by proper attention to duty, and not by his own carelessness. The requirement in Civ. Code 1895, § 2612, that "it must * * * appear that the servant injured did not know and had not equal means of knowing such fact, and by the exercise of ordinary care could not have known thereof," is subject to the foregoing limitation.

3. SAME.

Where the railway company by which the servant is employed uses the tracks of another railway company for the operation of its trains thereon, the former company is liable to its servant for injuries received by him on account of a negligently constructed low overhead bridge spanning such tracks, without "telltales" or other means of warning.

4. PLEADING—AMENDMENT.

An amendment to the petition, which merely varies the acts of negligence, but which does not complain of any different wrong or injury from that set forth in the original petition, is not subject to the objection that it sets forth a new cause of action.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 39, Pleading, §§ 686-700.]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Atlanta; Reid, Judge.

Action by one King against the Seaboard Air Line Railway. Judgment of nonsuit. Plaintiff brings error, and defendant assigns cross-error. Judgment on main bill of exceptions reversed; on cross-bill, affirmed.

W. R. Hammond and Andrews & Skeen, for plaintiff. Brown & Randolph, for defendant.

POWELL, J. King brought suit against the railway company for personal injuries received by him pending his employment as a brakeman. He was hurt by being struck by an overhead bridge at Magnolia street crossing in the city of Atlanta. This bridge was located over a part of the tracks of the Western & Atlantic Railroad Company, which were being used by the Seaboard Air Line Railway in reaching its freight depot, in the center of the city, from Howell's Station, three or four miles away. There were no "teltales" or other means of giving warning of approach to the bridge. The train was made up by the crew, including the plaintiff, at a point near the bridge, and among the cars was inserted an unusually high foreign furniture car. It was necessary, in order to prevent injury to the wheels, that as soon as the train was put in motion the brakeman should instantly mount the cars and release the brakes. The conductor having given orders for the train to go, the brakeman transmitted the signal to the engineer, and, as the train started, mounted the cars and began to loosen the brakes, which had been made fast on all the cars. He first turned off the brakes on the car next to the engine, and started to the second car, running as he went; and as he approached the brake at the further end of that car, which was the high furniture car above referred to, he was struck on the back of the head and neck by the bridge and knocked to the ground, where he was further injured by the train. The plaintiff had been in the employment of the defendant company as a brakeman for about 10 months, and had been in the particular employment which required him to pass under this bridge for about 10 days. The plaintiff further stated that in passing under this bridge previously he had ducked his head, and that he had seen the other employes of the company do the same. He had passed under the bridge in coming into the city that day. The injury happened about 10 o'clock in the morning on a fair day.

In explaining why he did not notice the bridge, so as to prevent his being hurt, the plaintiff, who was a witness in his own behalf, said: "I got up on top of the car and released the brakes. When I got on the second car, I had to make a step up of something like two or three feet. I kept going back until the bridge struck me. My back was towards the bridge all the time. I was in a hurry to get back, and suppose I never looked at the bridge. If I had turned clear around, I would have seen the bridge. I would not have seen it, if I looked to the right or the left. It is a very long bridge. If I had got right down under there, I could have looked to the right or left and seen it. I knew there was a Magnolia street bridge, but I wasn't thinking about it at the time. My mind was on my work, and it was on my mind altogether. I was thinking about what I was doing, and not a thing else. If I had been thinking about the bridge, and hadn't turned my back, and had ducked my head like I had always done, I would have passed under it. * * *

When I started out that morning I was in a hurry to let these brakes off. It was the rule to hurry all the time, the quicker the better. I don't remember that there was any imminent collision with us at the time. It seems that we were in a hurry for something. It was just the rules to always get them off as quick as you can. As well as I remember, it was like it always was. I don't remember anything special. The rule was always to be in a hurry in taking off brakes. It was the same as any other day I suppose. There were no 'teltales' out there on the Western & Atlantic tracks that were used by the Seaboard Air Line, and had not been since I had been working there. * * * After I got up to the train I climbed right up to the side of the car next to the engine. I was in a great hurry, with my mind on my work. It was the usual rule to be in a hurry to take off the brakes, and I took them off as quick as I could. An ordinary freight car is something like from 32 to 36 feet long. I was struck before I let the second brake off. That is right, as near as I can remember. I suppose it took something like five or ten seconds after I left the first brake before I could get to the second. * * * I didn't think about the bridge at all. You asked me yourself if I wasn't nearer the bridge than I thought I was, and I say, 'Yes, sir,' but the bridge never entered my mind. What I meant, by saying that I was nearer the bridge than I thought I was, was this: The space from where I got on the car to the bridge, after going back and looking at it after getting out of the hospital, the first place I went— I went to look at the distance from the switch to the bridge, and it was not as far as I had an idea it was; while I didn't think at the time I was at work, that is how I came to say that. I went down on the bridge and looked from the bridge up to the switch point. While I was in the hospital I got to studying how far it was from there. I found that it was nearer than I thought it was while I was in the hospital. I just looked at it from the bridge. I never thought about the distance when I was at work. It never entered my mind. I was thinking about my work. I was busy, and never thought about the bridge. After I got out of the hospital I went to look at it, and from the bridge up to the switch point. It appeared to be a great deal nearer than it seemed in thinking it over. I said I knew there was a Magnolia street bridge. I didn't know I was so near to it. I didn't know I was in the neighborhood of it. I thought I was further from it than I was. * * * I am not denying anything. I tell you I didn't think about the bridge. It is true that I walked upon the car, and didn't turn around and look, because the bridge didn't enter my mind. Anybody knows that I would not walk up and let the bridge knock me off, if it had entered my mind. I was thinking about what I was doing. I didn't have my mind on one thing else."

The petition alleged, as ground of negligence, the breach of defendant's duty to plaintiff, in that it failed to see, before allowing the train on which petitioner was employed to pass under the bridge, that the same was a sufficient distance from the track for the body of petitioner, located as he was, to pass thereunder in safety; also, that it failed to see that all proper and sufficient "telltales," guard ropes, or other devices were placed at a safe and sufficient distance from the bridge to put petitioner on notice of the approach thereto, so that petitioner could have protected himself from coming in contact with the bridge. By an amendment the plaintiff alleged the following further ground of negligence: "After the train was made up, and it was starting towards Howell's Station, your petitioner, in the discharge of his duties as brakeman, climbed the front end of the front car, next to the engine, the train being already in motion, and went back, along the top of said car, to let off the brakes. It was necessary for him to make great haste, for the reason that the brakes were on and the train had started to move, and it was not only his duty to release the brakes, but to do it as quickly as possible. For this reason he hurried up the front end of the car, and hurried along the top of the first car, and hurriedly let off the brake on that car, and then made as much haste as he possibly could to pass onto the second car for the purpose of letting off the brake on that car; his intention being to then pass onto the third car, and let off the brake on that one. So urgent was the necessity to let off these brakes quickly that your petitioner's mind was completely engrossed and absorbed with the performance of that duty, and he was hurrying along the top of the second car, with his back towards the engine and the bridge which the train was approaching, when he was knocked off the second car, near the rear end, as set forth in his original declaration. At the time he was knocked off, his mind was intent upon letting off the brakes on that car, to the exclusion of every thought about the bridge. And your petitioner avers that the car on which he was at the time he came into contact with the bridge was more dangerous than the ordinary freight car, for the reason that it was considerably higher, which increased the danger to your petitioner of being struck by said bridge. And your petitioner avers that neither before climbing upon said train nor while thereon did he receive any warning from the conductor of said train, or from any one else, of the increased danger of going upon the higher car, and that his mind was so engrossed and absorbed by the urgent necessity for releasing the brakes quickly that he did not think about or consider the fact of the increased danger, but was wholly absorbed in the performance of the duties of his position. Under these circumstances your petitioner avers that it was negligent in the defendant not to have warned your petitioner of the increased danger of the high car, and to have inserted said high car in the train without, at the same time, warning your petitioner of the increased danger therefrom. And your petitioner avers that the insertion of said high car in the train, and the failure of the defendant to warn him of the increased danger, was the cause of his being knocked off the same and receiving the injury as set forth in his original petition." To this amendment the defendant filed various grounds of demurrer. However, as counsel for the defendant, in their brief and argument, summarize these demurrers as raising the point "that the amendment set up a new cause of action, which was offered more than two years after the cause of action arose, and if it sets up a new cause of action it [the amendment] should not have been allowed, and one reason therefor would be that the statute of limitations had run," and as we find that this substantially states the matter correctly, we will not set the demurrers forth more elaborately. These demurrers were overruled. At the conclusion of the plaintiff's testimony, upon motion of the defendant, a nonsuit was awarded. This judgment the plaintiff in error in the main bill of exceptions brings up for review. In the cross-bill the defendant assigns error upon the overruling of the demurrers to the amendment.

1. The negligence complained of in this action not being the act of a fellow servant, nor being an act in the performance of which the plaintiff himself was engaged, it was not necessary for him to show affirmatively either that he himself was blameless or that the railway company was negligent, further than to prove the fact of his being injured as stated in the petition, because the proof of such injury immediately raised against the company a presumption of negligence, and the plaintiff thereupon became prima facie entitled to recover, without further proof, unless his testimony established some defense which would defeat him. Central R. Co. v. Kelly, 58 Ga. 107 (5), 113; Central R. Co. v. Kenney, 58 Ga. 489; Savannah Ry. Co. v. Day, 91 Ga. 676 (2), 679, 17 S. E. 959.

2. It is not impossible, however, for a plaintiff, after casting the burden upon the defendant in such a case, to disprove his case, by showing affirmatively that, despite the presumption to the contrary, he himself was negligent or that the company was not, or by establishing some other defense, such as that the act of negligence was embraced in one of the known risks which, under the employment, he assumed. In determining the ultimate question of liability, recourse must therefore be had to the reciprocal obligations imposed upon the master and the servant by the contract of employment. These are tersely set forth in Civ. Code 1895, §§ 2611, 2612. These Code sections are not statutory in origin, but are merely declaratory of the general law as it previously existed, and must be construed accordingly. The fact of their being codified into the written law does not add to them any quality of exhaustiveness, but still leaves them to be construed in accordance with all the various exceptions, qualifications, and extensions to which the principles announced therein were subject before they were placed in the Code. As is shown by Labatt, in the introductory statement to his most excellent work on Master and Servant, these doctrines, thus defining the extent of a servant's right to recover damages for injuries received by him in the course of the employment, represent the result of a compromise between the principle that the servant agrees to assume all the risks incident to the work undertaken by him and the principle that the master is answerable for the consequences of any negligent acts which may be committed by himself or his agents. To quote from this same author, as he proceeds further with the subject: "A proposition which has so frequently been enunciated by the courts as to have become axiomatic is that, prima facie, a servant does not assume any risks which may be obviated by the exercise of reasonable care on the master's part. In other words, the abnormal, unusual, or extraordinary risks which the servant does not assume as being incidental to the work undertaken by him are those which would not have existed if the master had fulfilled his contractual duties. * * * A second proposition, which is also beyond the reach of controversy, is that every risk which an employment still involves after a master has done everything that he is bound to do for the purpose of securing the safety of his servants is assumed, as a matter of law, by each of those servants. This doctrine prevents recovery unless evidence is introduced which warrants the inference that the injured person was incapable of appreciating the risk from which his injury resulted."

It can hardly be questioned that a jury would be authorized to find that, as to a brakeman whose duties require his presence on the top of the cars, it is an act of negligence for a railway company to maintain across the tracks, without "telltales" or other efficient means of warning, an overhead bridge so low as to strike employes passing thereunder. Savannah Ry. Co. v. Day, 91 Ga. 676, 17 S. E. 959 (1); Stirk v. Central R. Co., 79 Ga. 495, 5 S. E. 105. These cases also hold that the question of the plaintiff's contributory negligence in such cases is for the jury, and is not to be resolved in the defendant's favor by a nonsuit. But it is contended that the plaintiff is precluded from recovery in the case, for that the master's negligence in maintaining the low bridge was one of the risks assumed by the servant, because he knew there was such a low bridge and knew where it was located. The theory that the servant's knowledge or ignorance of the dangerous instrumentality by which he is hurt determines the absence or the existence of culpability on the master's part has been the subject of much judicial decision, in each and all of its various phases. With unanimity of accord it is agreed that if the servant knows, at the time of the injury, of the defect and of the danger, and is in mental position to be aware of both, the master is not to be held liable, whether the question be viewed from the juridical aspect of the servant's implied contractual assumption of the risk, or of his contributory negligence. Upon the extension of the rule to the case of a servant, who, although he has been possessed of actual knowledge of the dangerous condition brought about by his master's negligence, is for the time being deprived of the power to exercise that actual knowledge by reason of obliviousness, or by incapacity to appreciate the danger, or by temporary forgetfulness, brought about by the engrossing character of the labor which his duty requires him to be performing at the time he is injured, the courts have taken widely divergent views. Many courts hold, with unwavering rigidity, that the servant's knowledge is fatal to his case, despite the fact that any other reasonable man, with a proper regard for his master's interests, would have been subject to the same injury under the same circumstances. Other courts hold that if the forgetfulness or the incapacity to realize the danger is excusable, and is brought about by reason of proper attention to the master's business, the servant may recover.

In our judgment the state of the servant's knowledge should be considered as of the moment of the injury. We cannot know a thing until our mind is capable of grasping it, and we no longer know it when our mind is incapable of retaining it. The knowledge on the part of the servant which precludes his recovery may be actual or constructive. If he knows of the danger, or if in the due exercise of his duty toward his master he ought to know it, the rule is the same. If on account of youthfulness or mental weakness the servant's mind is incapable of grasping the knowledge of the danger, though it be before his very eyes, the courts with unanimity hold that he has not assumed the risk; for the law will not put upon the young or weak mind the burden of grasping that which it cannot grasp. It therefore seems reasonable to us to say that the law does not put upon any man's mind the burden of retaining that which it cannot retain. If the failure to retain is through inattention to duty, the servant is at fault; but if it is the result of attention to duty, of doing what he ought to do, the servant is not at fault. It is not more unreasonable to imply a constructive lack of knowledge in favor of the servant when attention to duty brings forgetfulness than it is to imply a constructive knowledge against him when attention to duty would bring such knowledge. Ordinarily an implied assumption runs with the servant's contract of employment that he will obtain and retain knowledge of the risks incident to the employment, and that he will use that knowledge for the purpose of protecting himself. It is fair that a negligent failure on his part either to obtain, to retain, or to use such knowledge should prevent his calling upon the master for indemnity for an injury resulting from his own breach of his contract of employment as to these very things. On the other hand, where the servant has done all that any one coming up to the law's standard of an ordinarily prudent man would have done, under the same circumstances, either to obtain, retain, or use such knowledge, and has not obtained it, or does not retain it, a breach of the contract in this respect is not to be imputed to him; and if the injury results, not from accident, but from negligence of the master, he should be allowed to hold the master liable for the breach of the master's implied obligation in the contract of employment. The practical effect of the cases holding to the contrary is to maintain that the servant is required at his peril to exercise in some cases of this class—especially in just such cases as this of dangerous overhead bridges—a degree of skill and vigilance which, to borrow an illustration from Labatt (M. & S. 159), is equal to, if not greater than, that which was possessed by the pilot described in Mark Twain's "Life on the Mississippi," who, when his turn at the wheel arrived, even when he was aroused at the hour of midnight in the darkest and most tempestuous weather, was expected to comprehend at a glance the exact position of the boat, without any instruction from his predecessor at the post.

Moreover, the position we are now asserting is not without an abundance of able authority to support it. In addition to the Georgia cases of Savannah Ry. Co. v. Day, and Stirk v. Central R. Co., supra, we cite Kane v. Northern Central Ry. Co., 128 U. S. 91, 9 Sup. Ct. 16, 32 L. Ed. 339 (holding that it was for the jury, where the brakeman's necessary haste in getting to the brakes caused him to forget a known defect in a car); McGovern v. Oil Co., 11 App. Div. (N. Y.) 588, 42 N. Y. Supp. 595 (sustaining verdict where brakeman was injured by an overhead beam of which he had knowledge, his attention being distracted by cries of a person near by); Wallace v. Railroad Co., 138 N. Y. 302, 33 N. E. 1069 (holding that a brakeman on top of a moving train is not, as a matter of law, chargeable with negligence simply because he does not continually bear in mind the precise location of the train relatively to a bridge over the track); Chicago, etc., Ry. Co. v. Goebel, 20 Ill. App. 163, affirmed 119 Ill. 515, 10 N. E. 369 (holding that laborers have the right to become so engrossed in their labor as to become oblivious to the approach of trains, and that such forgetfulness will not preclude recovery); Harker v. Burlington, etc., Ry. Co., 88 Iowa, 409, 55 N. W. 318, 45 Am. St. Rep. 242 (quoting from 1 Shear. & Red. Neg. § 213: "The mere technical fact of the servant's knowledge of a defect is not sufficient to exonerate the master, if for any reason the servant forgets it, and is not at fault in forgetting it, at the precise time he suffers thereby"—an urgent demand for speed on the employé's part is held as sufficient excuse for the forgetfulness); Brown v. New York, etc., Ry. Co., 42 App. Div. (N. Y.) 548, 59 N. Y. Supp. 672, affirmed 166 N. Y. 626, 60 N. E. 1107 (verdict sustained for a fireman leaning out of window, in performance of duty of watching movements of another train, struck by mail crane temporarily forgotten by him); Chicago, etc., Ry. Co. v. Cleveland, 92 Ill. App. 308 (holding under the Illinois statute, which is substantially identical in terms with our Civ. Code 1895, § 2611, 2612, "that the term 'knowledge,' as used in defining assumed risks, means no more than that all the facts and circumstances surrounding the given case must be sufficient to charge the employé with the required information," and that a trainman struck by a flag shanty negligently located might recover despite his knowledge of the location, when his attention was distracted by the engrossing character of his duty at the moment); Northern Pacific R. Co. v. Mortenson, 63 Fed. 530, 11 C. C. A. 335 (a low bridge case); Mason & O. R. Co. v. Yockey, 103 Fed. 265, 43 C. C. A. 228 (question of whether fireman was negligent in forgetting the condition which caused him to be injured, he being engrossed in his duties, is for the jury).

We are content to close this discussion by adopting the views expressed in the same valuable treatise to which we have already referred so often in this opinion (Labatt's Master & Servant, p. 166), as follows: "A correct view of the situation, it is submitted, cannot be arrived at, unless we wholly eliminate from the question the element of a freedom of will which has no existence, except in the imagination of a certain school of economists, and resort to first principles for the purpose of ascertaining what standard of diligence is demanded from the employer by those large considerations of public policy, upon which, in the last analysis, the whole law of negligence may be said to rest. If we view the subject from this standpoint, all the difficulties of the subject will vanish. All that is necessary is to construe, in a manner appropriate to the relations of the parties to the contract of service, the principle that no person has a right to keep his property in such a condition that persons who, with his consent, are brought into close relations with it, will be likely to receive injury, even though they may exercise all the care which it is justifiable to expect from them under the circumstances. If the degree of care which the servant must exercise in order to escape injury is greater than that which, considering the exigencies of the work and other matters which are likely to divert his attention and produce a temporary forgetfulness of a known danger, it is reasonable to demand from men of average prudence and average powers of observation, then it may be fairly maintained that the master ought to bear the responsibility of any accident which may occur, quite irrespective of the question whether the servant was or was not aware of the nature and extent of the danger. The acceptance of this principle would not involve any very startling changes in the law as we now have it. It would merely require us to fix the standard of care incumbent on the master, with a view to the consideration that, as, the implied agreement of the servant is merely that he will use ordinary diligence in the discharge of his functions, it is a breach of duty in the master to keep his instrumentalities in such a condition that ordinary diligence will not always save the servant from injury. A rule formulated upon this basis would not make the master an insurer, nor would it necessarily render him liable simply for the reason that his appliances were old and imperfect. It would merely make his liability dependent upon whether he had or had not acted unreasonably, and therefore negligently, in holding out inducements to do work which, at certain conjunctures not unlikely to arise, could not be performed safely without the exercise of a degree of care which no fair-minded, considerate person would demand from a servant. Such a rule would not impose any burden upon the employer which a just and sensible man would be unwilling to bear, and would effectually prevent that cruel abuse of the doctrine of assumption of risks, which has done so much to embitter the feeling with which capitalists are regarded by the working classes."

It may be proper for us to distinguish this case from the cases of Blackstone v. Central Ry. Co., 112 Ga. 762, 38 S. E. 79, East Tenn. Ry. Co. v. Head, 92 Ga. 723, 18 S. E. 976, and Price v. Central Ry. Co., 124 Ga. 899, 53 S. E. 455. In none of these cases was the decision upon this precise point. In the case of Blackstone, who was hurt by being struck by a pole located too near the track, it was shown that he was yardmaster, and not only under the duty of knowing the location of the pole, but also of warning other employes. Head's Case turned on the point that he was not acting under emergency, and that he carelessly took an unsafe time and place to look out from the engine, whereby he caused himself to be struck by a post of which he had full knowledge. In Price's Case the question of forgetfulness or obliviousness, caused by attention to duty, was not involved. Even if there be, in the reasoning upon which any of these cases are based, anything in conflict with the rule which we are here announcing, we feel justified in relying upon the older decisions in Savannah Ry. Co. v. Day and Stirk v. Railway Co., supra. These cases clearly recognize that the servant may forget, and that to guard against this forgetfulness the company ought to erect and maintain "telltails." The "telltails" would arouse him from his obliviousness, and he would be able to escape injury. Simmons v. Railway Co., 92 Ga. 658, 18 S. E. 999, is akin to the present case in basic principles; and in that action a recovery by the servant was held to be authorized.

3. It is insisted by the defendant that since the track which was being used was the property of the Western & Atlantic Railroad Company, and not of the defendant, the former company alone would be liable for the injury. Unquestionably the allegations of the petition set forth a cause of action against the Western & Atlantic Railroad Company. It is also true that in most of, if not in all of, the cases in the Georgia Reports, where employes of one railway company have been injured by the defective condition of another railway company's tracks, roadway, etc., which were being used under an arrangement between the two companies, the suits were instituted against the company owning the tracks, etc., and not against the company sustaining the relation of master. This is probably due to the fact that more defenses are open to the master company than to the other. However, the right to sue the company owning the tracks, etc., is not exclusive. As was said by Chief Justice Bleckley, in Ellison v. Georgia R. Co., 87 Ga. 722, 13 S. E. 809, under a similar state of circumstances: "Far more reasonable would it be to treat both the negligent parties as wrongdoers, and make them both answerable for the result to which they mutually contributed, than to excuse one of them because the other was also at fault."

The master's duty to furnish a safe place to work is absolute, and he cannot shift this responsibility. The well-considered case of Story v. Concord, etc., R. Co., 70 N. H. 364, 48 Atl. 288, is directly in point. There is some conflict of opinion in the decisions of the courts of the different states, as to this question, but we adopt the above as the sounder view.

We have not overlooked the contention of the defendant that the evidence as to the fact that the tracks belonged to the Western & Atlantic Railroad Company and were leased by the Seaboard Air Line Railway is hearsay, and therefore of no probative value. An inspection of the evidence set out in the record does not sustain this contention. That there was a lease of the tracks by the latter company from the former appears to be sustained only by hearsay; but the proof was direct that the tracks belonged to the Western & Atlantic Company, and that the Seaboard Company was using them for the operation of trains. This alone is material. The exact nature of the agreement by which the use came about is not so.

4. The judgment complained of in the cross-bill was not erroneous. City of Columbus v. Anglin, 120 Ga. 785, 48 S. E. 818 (6); Colley v. Gate City Coffin Co., 92 Ga. 664, 18 S. E. 817.

Judgment on the main bill of exceptions reversed; on the cross-bill, affirmed.

ATLANTA & B. A. L. RY. v. McMANUS.
(No. 107.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Feb. 25, 1907.)

1. COURTS—RECORDS—CORRECTION—INSTRUCTIONS.

Although a copy of the charge of the court has been approved and filed, the trial judge has the power to change the same, by correcting errors made in transcribing.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 13, Courts, §§ 369, 372.]

2. EVIDENCE—HEARSAY.

The testimony of a witness to a fact of which he swears he has personal knowledge is not rendered inadmissible by the further showing that he also knows it from hearsay.

3. WITNESSES—CROSS-EXAMINATION—BIAS.

"The right of cross-examination, thorough and sifting, belongs to every party as to the witnesses called against him." When the object is to show bias, great latitude should be allowed.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 50, Witnesses, § 1192.]

4. SAME.

Where a witness had testified on a former trial, as to one of the most vital questions in the case, that it would have been impossible for the deceased to have fallen from a car door if certain bars had not been removed from across the same, and on the trial under review testified that he had studied over the matter and found it to be different, whereupon he was being subjected to the following cross-examination: "Q. What do you now say, what do you swear now, do you take it back or stand to what you swore? A. I will take it back. I will leave it to any railroad man. He could easily have gone under it or over it, because it is in the center of the cab door. Q. So you take it back, do you? A. I take that question back I answered there. Q. Mr. Vance, when you swore it before, were you swearing the truth?"—and opposing counsel interrupted the examination with the following objection: "That is a totally improper question," upon which the court ruled, "Yes, I don't think that is proper," held, that counsel was within the limits of legitimate cross-examination.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 50, Witnesses, § 1230.]

5. MASTER AND SERVANT—ACTION FOR INJURIES TO EMPLOYE—PRESUMPTIONS AND BURDEN OF PROOF—HARMLESS ERROR.

In a suit against a railway company for the homicide of an employé through the alleged negligence of a fellow servant, an instruction to the jury that if the plaintiff proves that the death of the deceased employé was occasioned by the railway company in the running of its cars, and nothing further appears, a prima facie case of liability is made out, is erroneous.

(a) Such an error is not rendered harmless by giving in a subsequent portion of the charge the correct law on the subject, unless the court so plainly instructs the jury that the charge first given is incorrect as that the jury cannot be confused and misled.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 34, Master and Servant, § 955; vol. 40, Trial, §§ 705, 709.]

6. SAME.

In a suit against a railway company for the homicide of an employé, in order to authorize a recovery the plaintiff must cause it to appear both that the defendant was negligent and that the employé was free of fault; but when the death of the employé is caused in the running of the train, either one or both of these elements, according to the nature of the case, may be prima facie supplied by the proof of the injury being so received.

7. SAME—FELLOW SERVANTS—STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

Under the statute in this state, an employé of a railway company does not assume the risk of injury from the negligence of a co-employé, and it is not error for the court, in a proper case, so to instruct the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 34, Master and Servant, §§ 543, 567.]

8. SAME—ASSUMPTION OF RISK—WHAT RISKS ASSUMED.

Although an employment may be fraught with certain known dangers, yet if, notwithstanding those dangers, the conditions are such that the servant by the exercise of due care may perform the duties of the employment without probable injury, the servant, in assuming the risks of these dangers by entering or remaining in the employment, does not assume the risk of an independent, unexpected, supervening danger produced by the negligence of the master, or, in cases of railway companies, by the negligence of a fellow servant.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 34, Master and Servant, §§ 543, 547, 567.]

9. TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—INVASION OF PROVINCE OF JURY.

It is erroneous for the judge, in his charge, to assume or to instruct the jury that certain things, not directly made so by law, are or are not negligent.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 43, Trial, § 429.]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Polk County: Irwin, Judge.

Action by Mrs. McManus against the Atlanta & Birmingham Air Line Railway.

Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Brown & Randolph and Janes & Hutchens, for plaintiff in error. Janes & Hunt, Bunn & Trawick, and Arnold & Arnold, for defendant in error.

POWELL, J. A recovery for something over $11,000 was obtained by Mrs. McManus against the defendant railway company on account of the death of her husband, T. F. McManus, who was killed while in the service of the company as a conductor on a construction train. It was contended on behalf of the plaintiff that her husband, while standing in the end door of the cab at the rear of the train, which was backing slowly across a trestle, discovered the presence of a number of laborers on the trestle, about 300 feet away, and caused a slow-down signal to be given to the engineer, who instead of merely gradually slowing down, threw on the air brakes in full emergency, thus causing the train to stop instantly with a sudden jerk, whereby McManus was hurled forward through the door and out upon the track, with the result that his neck was broken. The company contended that the conduct of the engineer was not negligent; that the stop was not more sudden than was required under the exigencies; that the jerk was not greater than was ordinarily to be expected in a construction train; that the company had furnished the car with an iron rod, known as a "grab iron," which extended horizontally across the door, near the center; and that the proximate cause of the conductor's injury was the fact that he had removed this protection or had caused it to be removed. The further facts necessary to an understanding of the decision will be referred to in the opinion. In addition to assigning error upon the overruling of a motion for a new trial, the plaintiff in error also excepts to the fact that, after the trial judge had caused a copy of his charge to be filed under his written approval, he caused certain material changes to be made in it. The judge certifies that these changes were necessary in order to make the copy speak the truth.

1. It is the duty of the judge to make the record speak the truth. If by inadvertence he approves as true that which in fact is not true, it is not only his privilege, but his duty, to make the necessary corrections.

2. One of the assignments of error relates to an objection made to the testimony of a witness who gave evidence as to the amount of wages being earned by the plaintiff's husband at the date of his death. He stated that he knew this fact of his own knowledge, but also stated that he had seen his salary checks. The objection is that the testimony is hearsay. A witness may know a fact both from personal knowledge and from hearsay, in which event the testimony is admissible.

3, 4. A witness named Vance testified for the plaintiff. An examination of his testimony as set out in the record reveals many indications of bias towards that side of the case. Upon his testimony the plaintiff chiefly relied. On a former trial of the case, and also in a written statement made by him, he had said that if the "grab iron" had not been removed the conductor could not have been thrown from the car. Upon the trial under review he stated that the presence of the "grab iron" would not have prevented this result. Upon cross-examination the following colloquy occurred: "Q. What do you now say? * * * Do you take it back or stand to what you swore? A. I will take it back. I will leave it to any railroad man. He could easily have gone under it or over it, because it is in the center of the cab door. Q. So you take it back, do you? A. I take that question back I answered there. Q. Mr. Vance, when you swore it before, were you swearing the truth?" It was here that the court sustained an objection that the cross-examination was being improperly conducted. Generally the latitude to be allowed counsel in cross-examination is a matter of sound discretion vested in the trial court, but the right should not be abridged. Our Civ. Code, § 5282, which says, "The right of cross-examination, thorough and sifting, belongs to every party as to the witnesses called against him," announces a rule of ancient standing in courts of justice. Rapalje, Law of Witnesses, § 245 (3), after stating the discretion vested in the trial court, says: "There is no uniform rule governing the matter, greater liberty being allowed when the witness shows partisanship than when he evinces impartiality; and it requires a strong case to justify a reversal for the allowance of too much latitude on the part of the cross-examiner. The discretion particularly extends to the range of a cross-examination in disparagement of the character of a witness; and this without putting the witness to his claim of privilege. The court may postpone the cross-examination to a subsequent stage of the cause, or permit a party, after resting his case, to cross-examine his adversary's witnesses or call others. Where a witness has betrayed bias, partiality, or corruption, this discretionary power will be exercised in extending the latitude of the questioner, and a most searching cross-examination will be allowed." We think that counsel for the defendant had the right to compel the witness to fully disclose to the jury his change of front as to the question, and also to press him with the cross-examination, with the view of disclosing, not only his bias, but also the effects which this bias might have in coloring his testimony. Although, out of deference to the wide discretion allowed the trial judges in these matters, we would not reverse the judgment on this ground, we are constrained to hold that counsel had not exceeded proper limits in his cross-examination of the witness. Mitchell v. State, 71 Ga. 129 (6), 157.

5. At the beginning of his instructions to the jury the court charged: "Gentlemen of the jury, when the plaintiff shall have shown the killing, proved to your satisfaction that her husband was killed by the railroad in the handling of its cars, as alleged in the petition, that makes out, if nothing further appears, if she does not in that proof go further and show that the death occurred as the result of the negligence of her husband, she would be entitled to recover. In other words, the killing proven, nothing else appearing, as I said, that makes out a prima facie case, and the plaintiff, unless something further appears, would be entitled to recover such an amount as you think under the evidence plaintiff has proven." This charge is clearly erroneous as applicable to the case at bar. The true rule, of course, is that before an employé in such a case raises a presumption of negligence against the company he must show his own freedom of fault, in addition to showing the injury. While it is conceded by counsel for defendant in error that this charge is error, it is contended that the court afterwards cured the error. Prior to the conclusion of the charge the attorney for the plaintiff interrupted the judge and said to him: "If your honor will allow me, I desire to call attention to an inadvertence in your charge, and ask you to correct it. In the beginning of your instructions your honor charged the jury that, if the plaintiff showed the killing to the jury's satisfaction by the handling of the cars, such proof alone raised the presumption of the defendant's liability and made out a prima facie case for the plaintiff. Your honor by inadvertence omitted to charge, as a qualification and addition to this rule, that no presumption arose against the company unless the plaintiff had first proved that the deceased was without fault, or had proved that the defendant was at fault." To which the court replied: "I have tried to do it in every case. It must appear that he was without fault. I had intended to do it. That is the law. It must appear that he was without fault, although it may appear that the defendant was at fault or was negligent. It must in any event and at all times appear that he was without fault, and that he could not have avoided the consequences of the injury to himself, by the exercise of ordinary care and diligence. You will understand that that applies to the case, gentlemen, and under all conditions of the case." We are not prepared to say that this did not cure the error, though we must confess our doubts as to this. Where an erroneous rule is charged as to a material issue, the error is not rendered harmless, by the subsequent statement, or even reiteration, of the correct rule, unless the judge expressly calls the attention of the jury to the incorrect statement and substantially retracts it. Georgia R. Co. v. Hicks, 95 Ga. 305, 22 S. E. 251; Brush Electric L. & P. Co. v. Wells, 103 Ga. 512, 30 S. E. 538 (1); Augusta Ry. & El. Co.

v. Smith, 121 Ga. 32, 48 S. E. 681; Duncan v. State, 1 Ga. App. 118, 58 S. E. 248.

6. Exception is taken to the following excerpt from the charge: "The jury are instructed that an employé who sues a railroad company for injuries after proving the injury, may recover on proof of either of two facts. After proving the injury, if he proves that he was free from negligence, he can recover; or if, after he proves the injury, he proves that the servants or agents of the company were negligent, he can recover." This statement, standing alone and apart from the context in which it is used, might be regarded as erroneous; for, in a certain sense, the plaintiff must make both things appear—first, the company's negligence, and also his freedom from fault. However, by proving that he was injured in the running of the cars, he thereby raises a presumption which supplies for him the proof of one or the other, or both, of these additional elements, as the case may be. In case the injury is occasioned as the result of an act from which the plaintiff is disconnected, the presumption supplies proof of both these elements. Central R. Co. v. Kelly, 58 Ga. 113; King v. Seaboard Air Line Ry., 1 Ga. App. 88, 53 S. E. 252, and citations. In case the injuries are sustained by the alleged negligence of other servants, in the performance of an act with which plaintiff was connected, the presumption supplies only one of these elements in his favor. Western & Atlantic R. Co. v. Vandiver, 85 Ga. 470, 11 S. E. 781. The rationale of this latter phase of the rule is that, when the plaintiff proves that he was injured in the operation of the train, the law presumes that the injury was occasioned by the negligence of one or more of the railway company's servants operating the train; and, since the plaintiff himself is one of the defendant's servants engaged in that act, the presumption of negligence attaches equally to him as to his fellow servants, so that he must go further, and show either that he was not at fault, thereby throwing the presumed blame to his fellows, or that some other servant was negligent, thereby relieving himself from the imputation. When we consider the entire context in which the charge quoted appears, we find that the language as a whole amounts to a reasonably apt statement of the correct rule.

7. Under statute in this state, the common-law rule exempting the master from liability to a servant for injuries inflicted by a fellow servant has been modified so that it is not applicable to employes of railway companies. Civ. Code 1895, § 2610, is as follows: "Except in case of railroad companies, the master is not liable to one servant for injuries arising from the negligence or misconduct of other servants about the same business." The exception in this section is due to Civ. Code 1895, § 2323, which, in defining the liability of railway companies for injuries, provides: "If the person injured is himself an employé of the company, and the damage was caused by another employé, and without fault or negligence on the part of the person injured, his employment by the company shall be no bar to the recovery." Of course, a fellow servant may be guilty of contributory negligence by voluntarily placing himself within, or by remaining within, the range of the fellow servant's negligent conduct, and in a certain sense it may be said that in such cases he assumes the negligence of the fellow servant; but a laconic and not altogether inexact statement of the substance of the two Code sections cited above may be expressed in the words, "The employé of a railway company does not assume the risk of injury from the negligence of his co-employés," and in cases where such a statement of the rule is not likely to prove misleading, and is coupled with explicit instructions as to the element of the servant's contributory negligence, there is no error in so charging the jury.

8. Some of the grounds of the motion make complaint of charges wherein the jury was in substance instructed that, while the conductor in this case assumed the risk of the ordinary dangers connected with the operation of the construction train, he did not thereby assume the risk of the negligence of other employés engaged in the work. This principle, in the abstract, is accepted as correct by the courts of this state. Lawhorn v. Millen & Southern Ry. Co., 97 Ga. 742, 25 S. E. 492; Southern Cotton Oil Co. v. Dukes, 121 Ga. 787, 49 S. E. 788; Blount Carriage & Buggy Co. v. Ware, 125 Ga. 571, 54 S. E. 637; Southern Cotton Oil Co. v. Gladman, 1 Ga. App. 259, 58 S. E. 249. As is said in the case last cited: "The assumption by the servant of the known ordinary risks, even of a dangerous employment, does not carry with it the assumption of an unknown, supervening, extraordinary, hazard occasioned by the master's negligence." Of course, to make this rule as stated directly applicable, we must remember that in cases of railway companies the negligence of the fellow servant is regarded as negligence of the master for most purposes. In the practical application of the rule above stated it must not be overlooked that if the dangers accompanying the employment are brought about in whole or in substantial part by the negligence or wrongful conduct of the employé injured, and these dangers caused the injury or contributed thereto, such servant cannot be regarded as blameless, so as to be allowed to recover, although the supervening negligence of the master or of the fellow servant may justly be regarded as the chief, efficient agency in causing the injury.

9. Error is also assigned on several of the court's charges which approach the border line of error, and in some cases step over, in the respect that in these instructions the court states or assumes that certain conduct does or does not amount to negligence. The charge, "Even if you believe that the occupation in which the deceased, Mr. McManus, was engaged was dangerous, the jury are instructed that merely to engage in a dangerous occupation is not by itself negligence," approaches the border line; and the charge, "If you believe, from the evidence, that notwithstanding the fact that there was no bar in the door, Mr. McManus would not have been injured if the train had been handled with ordinary care, and if you believe that the death of Mr. McManus was caused by the negligence of the engineer in jerking the train, or in otherwise negligently handling the cars, then the plaintiff could recover in this case, provided, as I have charged you, and always have charged you, that he could not have avoided the consequences of such negligence to himself," steps over. The expression, "was caused by the negligence of the engineer in jerking the train," is justly open to the criticism that it assumes that the jerking of the train would be negligent. If this expression had been accompanied, either directly with, or in reasonably proximate relation with, an instruction that it was a question for the determination of the jury as to whether the jerking of the train, if any such jerk occurred, was, under the circumstances, negligent or not, the meaning given to the language of the trial judge might be regarded as unwarranted. However, we have carefully searched through the entire charge of the court, and find that nowhere did he squarely present to the jury the issue as to whether the alleged conduct of the engineer amounted to negligence, under the circumstances; on the contrary, we think it may justly be stated that a juror of ordinary intelligence would be led to believe, from the charge as a whole, that, if the engineer stopped the train suddenly and with a jerk, such conduct would in law be assumed to be negligent. This error comes at a crucial point in the case, and though, were it not for its existence, we would probably, out of our great reluctance to disturb verdicts for minor errors or irregularities, affirm the judgment, we must hold that for this injustice to the defendant we should grant a new trial. Probably the strongest defense available to the railway company, under the circumstances of this transaction, is the contention that, in view of the sudden discovery of the presence of a number of persons on the trestle a short distance away, it was not negligent for the engineer to apply the air brakes in the fullest emergency, even though a violent and sudden jerk to the train was the natural result of such a course. Such a defense, predicated upon the engineer's exertions to save human life, would likely appeal most strongly to an ordinary jury, and the judge should not have slighted it, and especially should he not have used language in his charge capable of being regarded as assuming that such conduct was, as a matter of law, negligent. Our trial

Judges are allowed no latitude in these matters. They must not assume or declare that any given conduct, not amounting to violation of law, is negligent. As to these things our judges have been stricken dumb by statute, and their very attempt to speak is made mandatory cause for a new trial.

The contention that the verdict is excessive seems not to be well founded. If the defendant was liable at all, the damage assessed by the jury seems to closely approximate the amount fairly justified by the proof. We would not disturb the verdict on the facts; but, for the errors pointed out above, a new trial must be granted.

Judgment reversed.

MOODY v. STATE. (No. 885.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. May 9, 1907.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW—FORMER ACQUITTAL.

Where, by oversight, inadvertence, or otherwise, the defendant is put on trial upon an indictment alleging the homicide of a living man, and, upon the mistake being discovered, a verdict of not guilty is entered, such acquittal cannot be pleaded in defense to another indictment charging the same defendant with the homicide of another person, although it was the intention in the first instance to indict and prosecute for the killing of the person last mentioned, and no other transaction was contemplated, in the original indictment or trial, by the grand jury, the prosecutor, or the state's counsel.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 14, Criminal Law, § 388.]

2. SAME—INSTRUCTIONS—CORRECTION OF REPORT.

The trial judge has the power to correct errors in the stenographic report of his charge, even after it has been filed as part of the record, under his approval.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 13, Courts, § 369.]

3. SAME—NEW TRIAL.

A new trial will not be granted for refusal to grant a written request to charge, where the request contains an inaccuracy of law, where it is not adjusted to the proof or the defendant's statement, or where it is fairly covered by the general charge.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 14, Criminal Law, §§ 1980, 2011, 2012.]

4. SAME.

Minor verbal inaccuracies in the charge, not calculated to mislead the jury, do not constrain the grant of a new trial.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 15, Criminal Law, § 3154.]

5. SAME—INSTRUCTIONS.

In the absence of a timely written request, no error can be successfully assigned upon the failure of the judge to charge upon the impeachment of witnesses.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 14, Criminal Law, § 2007.]

6. HOMICIDE—DYING DECLARATIONS.

While dying declarations should be received with caution, slight preliminary proof will justify the judge in prima facie admitting them, for final submission to the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 26, Homicide, § 459.]

7. SAME—INSTRUCTIONS.

It is proper for the court to instruct the jury that he passes only prima facie upon the admissibility of dying declarations, and that the jury are the judges, not only of the weight to be given them, but also as to whether they were made under such circumstances as to be entitled to consideration at all.

8. WITNESSES—CREDIBILITY.

The credibility of the witnesses is exclusively for the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 14, Criminal Law, § 1719.]

9. CRIMINAL LAW—NEW TRIAL—NEWLY DISCOVERED EVIDENCE.

Newly discovered evidence, cumulative or impeaching in its character, does not require the grant of a new trial.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 14, Criminal Law, §§ 2328, 2331.]

10. SAME—APPEAL.

A verdict not unsupported by evidence will not be set aside by this court, though the proof of the defendant's guilt may not be altogether satisfactory.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Tattnall County; Rawlings, Judge.

One Moody was convicted of murder, and brings error. Affirmed.

W. T. Burkhalter and H. H. Elders, for plaintiff in error. Alfred Herrington, Sol. Gen., L. J. Tippins, and W. W. Larsen, for the State.

POWELL, J. 1. We will first dispose of the plea of former acquittal. The defendant had killed O. D. Barnhill. Upon the investigation of this homicide the grand jury by inadvertence returned an indictment wherein the person killed was named as M. C. Barnhill. M. C. Barnhill was a witness before the grand jury, and was in life at the time of the trial. The defendant was arraigned upon this indictment, the jury was sworn, and, pending the introduction of evidence, the error was discovered. A verdict of not guilty was entered, and a new indictment was returned, charging the murder of O. D. Barnhill. The prosecutor, the state's counsel, and the grand jury were attempting to prosecute and indict in the first case for the same homicide alleged in the last case. Upon arraignment on the second indictment the defendant entered a special plea of former acquittal, and the facts were conceded to be substantially as above. The court found against the plea. If it were not for the precedent of the Supreme Court decision in Gully v. State, 116 Ga. 527, 42 S. E. 790, this state of facts would present a close question. However, the Gully Case is so closely analogous as to free the question from doubt. Gully committed bigamy by marrying Bessie Shingler. Intending to present for this offense, the grand jury preferred an indictment charging the marriage with Gussie Shingler, a sister of Bessie Shingler. The defendant was acquitted on this indictment, and a new bill was returned, charging the marriage with Bessie Shingler. It was conceded, as in this case, that there was but one offense, and that the wrong name was inserted in the first indictment by inadvertence. The plea was held bad. The meaning of that decision is that, if the first indictment be so drawn that no phase of the transaction in question can be investigated under it, there is no jeopardy as to the transaction, although it was the intention of the grand jury and the prosecuting officer that there should be. In this it is distinguished from Ingram v. State, 124 Ga. 448, 52 S. E. 759, Holt v. State, 38 Ga. 187, and several other cases of the same tenor.

2. Complaint is made that the court corrected the stenographic transcript of his charge, after having approved it and ordered it filed. No error. A. & B. Air Line Ry. v. McManus, 1 Ga. App. 302, 58 S. E. 253.

3. The defendant made a timely request in writing that the court give in charge to the jury section 72 of the Penal Code of 1895. The court did not give this section in charge literally, but did give in charge all of section 70. We think the latter section covered the issues as fully as they were made by the defendant's statement or evidence. In fact, neither of these sections was applicable under the theory of the defendant's statement, for therein he set up that the killing was altogether accidental, so far as he was concerned with it; and this the court covered fully. Another request was properly refused, because it did not contain a correct principle of law.

4. Error is assigned because the court instructed the jury that, if they believed the killing accidental, they would be "authorized" to find the defendant not guilty; the specific criticism being that the instructions to acquit under these circumstances should have been absolute. If this verbal criticism is well taken (and we are not prepared to say that it is), the error is too trivial to work a reversal.

5. Error is assigned that the court did not, without request, charge upon contradictory statements of the deceased, and upon the impeachment of witnesses. Instructions upon such questions are not compulsory, in the absence of written request. Cress v. State, 128 Ga. 567, 55 S. E. 491.

6. The foundation for the submission of the alleged dying declarations to the jury was sufficiently laid. Young v. State, 114 Ga. 350, 40 S. E. 1000.

7. An excerpt from the judge's charge on the subject of dying declarations is set out, and error assigned because the court instructed the jury that these declarations were first passed upon by the court prima facie. An examination of the context discloses that the instructions were in accordance with what the Supreme Court said should be charged on this subject in the case of Bush v. State, 109 Ga. 126, 34 S. E. 298.

8. One of the grounds of the motion presents the contention that the testimony of the defendant's witnesses was uncontradicted, and that the jury was bound to give weight to this testimony. The credibility of the witnesses is exclusively for the jury. In this case the testimony of these witnesses was contradicted in many material respects, and an effort was made to impeach them by previous contradictory statements, yet we feel sure that the jury did give weight to their testimony; otherwise, the verdict should have been for murder, not for voluntary manslaughter.

9. The last ground is upon newly discovered testimony. The showing in this respect did not come up to the rule. Besides, it was mainly impeaching in its character.

10. Though we have some doubt of the defendant's guilt, yet after a careful and painstaking study of the record we find no reversible error; and the evidence is sufficient to support the verdict, which is approved by an honest and conscientious trial judge.

Judgment affirmed.

KINARD v. STATE. (No. 172.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Feb. 5, 1907.)

1. FALSE PRETENSES—PROSECUTION—ACCUSATION—SUFFICIENCY.

The accusation was sufficient, as against the demurrers of the defendant.

2. JURY—CHALLENGE—GROUNDS OF—SERVICE AT PRECEDING TERM.

It is good ground of challenge to a juror in a city court, if the objection be timely made, that such juror served upon the jury in the same court at the next preceding term.

3. FALSE PRETENSES—PROSECUTION—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

Upon the trial of a person charged with cheating and swindling by making false representations as to the ownership of property, claim affidavits, bonds, etc., filed by third persons to a levy upon certain property as the property of the defendant, are not admissible in evidence.

4. CRIMINAL LAW—BEST EVIDENCE—CERTIFIED COPIES OF RECORDED INSTRUMENTS.

Certified copies of duly recorded instruments shown to be in the possession of the defendant are admissible in evidence against him, in a criminal case, as against the objection that the original is the highest evidence, unless he voluntarily offers to produce the originals. Farmer v. State, 23 S. E. 26, 100 Ga. 41.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 14, Criminal Law, §§ 887, 888; vol. 20, Evidence, §§ 638, 642, 671.]

5. FALSE PRETENSES—PROSECUTION—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

The evidence in this case is, as a matter of law, insufficient to sustain the verdict.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Worth County; Spence, Judge.

C. L. Kinard was convicted in a city court of cheating and swindling. On certiorari the conviction was sustained, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

C. L. Kinard was tried in the city court of Sylvester before Judge Park. The accusation (founded upon the affidavit of G. C. Ford and J. O. Holloman, to the best of their knowledge and belief) alleged that C. L. Kinard, on February 8, 1904, falsely and fraudulently represented to Ford & Holloman that he had rented land enough for 12 plows from J. R. Hill, and land enough for 5 plows from T. J. Pinson, and was going to run 17 plows that year; that he had and owned 17 mules that were unincumbered, there being nothing against them, that had cost him an average of $100 each; that he owned and had in his own name and right good and solvent notes enough to make him well worth $4,000—and thereupon obtained a credit from Ford & Holloman for commercial fertilizers to the amount and value of $1,579.16, and thereby caused Ford & Holloman loss and injury to that amount and value. The accused demurred on the following grounds: (1) The accusation is not based on a positive affidavit, as prescribed by the act creating the city court. Acts 1905, p. 378. (2) It fails to allege that defendant made or procured another to make any false representations to Ford & Holloman, with intent to obtain from them any money or other thing of value. (3) It does not allege any deceitful means or artful practices made or used by defendant before obtaining the fertilizers. (4) It does not appear that any representation was made prior to or at the time of obtaining the fertilizers. (5) It does not allege with sufficient particularity the place of the commission of the alleged crime, merely alleging that it was in Worth county, without putting defendant on notice of the particular place, without enabling him to prepare his defense, and especially failing to enable him to prepare a defense of alibi. (6) It nowhere sets forth that any fraudulent representations were made by him to any person for the purpose and with intent of defrauding Ford & Holloman. (7) It is insufficient, as a whole, to be the basis of a valid conviction. (8, 11) The representation that he "was going to run 17 plows that year" was of not a past or existing fact, but of an act contemplated to be done in the future, and could not be the basis of an accusation charging him with fraudulently obtaining credit; and it does not appear that he entertained a different intention when the statement was made, nor whether, if he did intend to run this number of plows, he had good cause for changing his mind and not doing so. (9) It is not alleged that his representations misled or deceived Ford & Holloman, or caused them to part with their property to their injury, or in what way they were injured. (10) It is not alleged that they parted with the fertilizers to him on the representations he made to them, nor that they were in any way injured in consequence of the representations. (12) It is not alleged how much Ford & Holloman estimated and considered the proposed crop to be worth, nor how much Kinard's rent contract was worth from Hill and Pinson, nor what amount of solvent notes he claimed he owned; the allegation being that all of the property rights enumerated in the affidavit, according to the judgment of Ford & Holloman, were worth $4,000, without specifying the value of Kinard's property going to make up this total, for which reason he is not notified of what he is expected to meet. (13) It does not appear what amount, or that any amount, of property or any other thing of value was parted with by Ford & Holloman upon the representations made to them.

This demurrer having been overruled, evidence was introduced under which, together with the judge's charge, the jury found the accused guilty. On certiorari the conviction was sustained, and the accused excepted. His assignments of error are shown by the headnotes, in connection with the following statement of what appears from the evidence: As a basis of credit for fertilizers sold to him by Ford & Holloman, at the date and in the county alleged, the accused stated to Holloman that he had 17 good mules, unincumbered, on which he did not owe a cent; that he had rented from J. R. Hill a 12-horse farm and from T. J. Pinson a 5-horse farm; and that he had good notes and other property to the amount of $2,300, the notes being with the Sylvester Banking Company for collection. Ford & Holloman extended him the credit, relying on this statement. He has paid them nothing, and they have lost between $1,500 and $1,600. He rented from T. J. Pinson a 2-mule farm, 80 or 90 acres, in 1904, and paid him the rent. In the same year he rented from J. R. Hill 490 acres of cultivatable land, which could be cultivated with 12 plows. There were 12 or 14 mules on this land, 8 wage hands, and 3 croppers. He planted all the land, but could not work it on account of labor falling. There was sickness among the laborers and in his family. He made a poor crop of everything. Walters, his overseer on the Hill place, testified that he ran a 12-horse farm there, and there was a cropper who started a 2-horse farm, but he quit in the spring, and they could not get labor to work the crop. They made about 150 bushels of corn with the 13 plows, and about 60 bales of cotton on both places rented.

Over objection, a copy of a mortgage from the accused to the First National Bank of Sylvester, for $315.50 principal, dated February 5, 1904, and covering 8 mules, was admitted in evidence. The objection was on the grounds that the original mortgage had not been satisfactorily accounted for, that the mortgage appeared to have been marked paid and canceled of record, and that it was irrelevant. The cashier of the bank testified that the mortgage was marked paid and turned over to the accused on his giving the bank a draft for the amount of it, which draft was dishonored on presentation. It also was put in evidence. The mortgage was foreclosed, and 5 mules were levied on to satisfy the execution issued thereunder. There was a further objection to the admission of the draft and of the testimony concerning it, and of the evidence as to the foreclosure of the mortgage, upon the ground that the same was irrelevant. Objection was likewise made to evidence concerning a mortgage on mules, made in 1903, by the accused to Sam Farkas. Another objection that was overruled was to the introduction of claim affidavits and bonds interposed by J. F. Kinard, T. M. Wilder, and C. W. Hill to the levy of the mortgage fi. fa., before mentioned, on certain mules; the ground of objection being that the evidence was irrelevant. The testimony shows that in 1904 the accused had with the Sylvester Banking Company notes to the amount of $1,800 or $2,000, though in February they had been placed in the hands of an attorney for collection. There were $2,300 worth of them at first, but the bank had collected some of them. They had been pledged to the bank in 1903, but this pledge had been released by substitution of securities. Most of these notes stood in the name of J. F. Kinard & Sons, but upon a dissolution of the partnership on distribution of assets these notes had been given to the accused. At the First National Bank of Sylvester he had between $1,000 and $2,000 worth of similar notes. It appeared from the testimony that he had about 18 mules in February, 1904; but it did not appear that any of the mortgaged mules, already mentioned, were included in this number. He had been engaged during that season in buying and selling mules.

Further objection was made to the admission of the following evidence, on the ground that it was irrelevant and immaterial: The sheriff testified, as to his efforts to find the mules described in the mortgage fi. fa. already mentioned, that he found 4 of the mules at T. M. Wilder's place and 1 at G. F. Kinard's place, but his further search did not find any. An officer of the Sylvester Banking Company testified that the consolidated note of J. F., G. F., and C. L. Kinard, held by that bank, on February 8, 1904, was for $4,048.38. J. F. Kinard testified that he paid at least $3,000 of the note made to the Sylvester Banking Company with his own money; and in answer to the question whether the defendant was worth $4,000 on February 8, 1904, he answered: "If he had it, I did not know where it was at."

(1 Ga. App. 196)

JOHNSON v. STATE. (No. 180.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Feb. 13, 1907.)

1. STATUTES—CONSTRUCTION—PENAL STATUTES.

Criminal statutes are to be strictly construed; and it cannot be presumed, as against the defendant in a criminal case, that the Legislature (in the absence of a formal expression of such purpose) intended to enlarge or extend the previously well-defined legal meaning of terms employed by that body in a new act, so as to make a new classification or cause the descriptive words to include an additional class of objects to that formerly understood by such terms.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 44, Statutes, §§ 302-306, 322.]

2. INDICTMENT—ISSUES, PROOF, AND VARIANCE—PLACE OF OFFENSE—HIGHWAYS—ESTABLISHMENT.

If the criminality of an act depends upon the place where it is committed, the allegation of place is material; and variance between the allegation and the proof is fatal.

(a) Proof that a road was commonly and largely used by the general public for a number of years, without more, will not support an allegation that such was a "public" highway, or a "public" road.

(b) The words "public highway" denote a generic term. The words "a public road," when used in an indictment based upon the act of 1905 (Acts 1905, p. 114), are descriptive of a species whose identity and characteristics are fixed by law, and are material; and the allegation must be sustained by proof.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 27, Indictment and Information, §§ 544-547.]

3. DRUNKARDS—INTOXICATION ON HIGHWAYS—HIGHWAY AND ROAD DISTINGUISHED.

The terms "public highway" and "public road" are not synonymous.

(a) The word "road" refers to the piece or strip of land taken. "Way," in legal parlance, merely denotes an easement, and that the land has been subjected to servitude.

(b) "Highway" is also a generic term, which includes other uses besides the right of ordinary locomotion over land which has been subjected to public use.

4. HIGHWAYS—ESTABLISHMENT—DEDICATION.

A road can be proved to be a public road—i. e., in use as a public highway—in four ways. A public road is created in four ways: (1) By a legislative enactment; (2) by action of the proper county authorities; (3) by dedication; (4) by prescription.

5. SAME—PRESCRIPTION—DEDICATION.

In the absence of proof of the establishment of a public road by legislative enactment, or by action of the proper county authorities, evidence of 20 years' use and working by the proper authorities will create a public highway, generally called a "public road," by prescription; and proof of 7 years' use, if accompanied by evidence of intention to give a way on the part of the owner, and like evidence of acceptance on the part of the public authorities, will establish a dedication.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 25, Highways, §§ 1-10; vol. 15, Dedication, § 13.]

6. SAME.

Consequently, where one is indicted for being intoxicated on a public highway, it is error to charge: "If the evidence shows you * * * that this road was used by the public for a number of years, or * * * by a community of people for any number of years, as a matter of convenience or necessity, or for the regular use of travel, it would not be incumbent upon the state to show that it was a public road or private highway, established by law or the county authorities, and maintained as such."

7. SAME.

It is, for the same reason, error to instruct the jury as follows: "I charge you that it is immaterial as to whether or not this road was maintained by the public or county authorities as a public highway or private way; but if you find that this road was used as a highway by a community of people for any number of years, as a means of ingress or egress to and from their homes, and that the crime was committed on said road by this defendant, it would be your duty to find him guilty."

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Douglas; Roan, Judge.

One Johnson was convicted of being intoxicated on a highway, and he brings error. Reversed.

J. W. Quincey, for plaintiff in error. M. D. Dickerson, Sol., and W. C. Lankford, for the State.

RUSSELL, J. The defendant in the court below was indicted for the offense of being intoxicated on a public highway. The wording of the act (Acts 1905, p. 114), so far as material in this case, is as follows: "It shall be unlawful for any person * * * to be and appear in an intoxicated condition on any public street or highway." Upon the trial the jury convicted the defendant. He asked for a new trial, which was refused, and he now excepts to the judgment of the trial judge in overruling his motion, and assigns error thereon.

In the amendment to his motion, approved by the court, the defendant complains that the court erred in the following charge: "It is one of the contentions of the defendant in this case that the road or highway upon which the alleged offense was committed is not such a public road or highway as is contemplated by the act. I charge you that if the evidence in this case shows to you to a moral and reasonable certainty, and beyond a reasonable doubt, that this road was used by the public for a number of years, or was used by a community of people for any number of years, as a matter of convenience or necessity, in going to and from market or church, or for the regular use of travel, it would not be incumbent upon the state to show that it was a public road or private highway, established by law or the county authorities, and maintained as such; but if you find that this road upon which the alleged crime was committed was used as before stated, then it would be your duty to find the defendant guilty, if you find in point of fact that he did commit the act charged in the bill of indictment. I charge you that it is immaterial as to whether or not this road was maintained by the public or county authorities as a public highway or private way; but if you find that this road was used as a highway by a community of people for any number of years, as a means of ingress or egress to and from their homes, and that the crime was committed on said road by this defendant, it would be your duty to find him guilty." The plaintiff in error assigns two errors on the foregoing charge: (1) That it authorized the verdict of guilty, when the evidence showed that the offense charged was not committed on a public highway, as contemplated by the act of the Legislature making drunkenness on a public highway a violation of law; (2) that the charge intimated that a crime had actually been committed. The second ground of the exception was abandoned in the argument in this court. There is but one question, therefore, to be settled in this case, as the evidence would authorize the jury to have found that the defendant was intoxicated; and the purpose of our inquiry will be to ascertain what the Legislature intended by the words "public highway" in the act, and what is the true meaning of the words "public road" in the indictment. If the place where the defendant was alleged to be intoxicated, as shown by the evidence, is a public highway, then the verdict of the jury is right. If the evidence adduced and appearing in the record does not show the place where the acts of the defendant were committed to be a public road and public highway, then the charge of the trial judge was erroneous, and the verdict should be set aside.

It is insisted by state's counsel that the lawmakers intended to protect all highways which are used by the public and which are in this sense public; and the question is asked: "If the Legislature intended to make it a criminal offense for a person to be intoxicated on public roads established by law, why did the act not say such public roads as are statutory or established by law?" In the opinion of the members of this court, the peace and quiet of the citizen who lives on any road which is used for travel by the public is entitled to the same protection, by similar means, to that provided in this healthful statute for those who happen to live on public roads, and it is the prerogative of the Legislature to so amend the act of 1905 as to make this the law; but it is not within the jurisdiction of this or any other court to legislate, and the fact that in the very creation of this court it is bound by the decisions of the Supreme Court largely limits our power to construe. So while we think, for ourselves, that all roads are alike entitled to protection, it cannot be presumed that the Legislature did not know the meaning of the terms it chose to employ in its act. It is rather to be inferred, and is clear to our mind, that for some sufficient reason the legislative mind did not see proper to apply the operation of its act to roads which might cease to be used at the will of those who owned and controlled them; i. e., at the will of the owners of the fee. Criminal statutes are to be strictly construed with a view to protecting every right of the citizen, and as against the defendant in a criminal case it cannot be presumed that the Legislature intended to enlarge and extend the previously well-defined meaning of terms employed by them to constitute a crime; more especially as the words "public street and highway" had been defined by the courts of this state and had a fixed and definite meaning. The term "public road" is not only distinguished from "private way," but it must mean a way, not only used by the public, but maintained, repaired, and controlled by the proper authorities having in charge the public roads. Penalties are affixed for various violations of the road law, which would be unjust and inapplicable to roadways subject to be discontinued at the pleasure of other than the public authorities; and the safety of a citizen demands that these penalties provided for the public good shall not be enforced as to passways opened, used, and maintained only during the pleasure of private citizens. Furthermore, the burden of keeping up the public roads has to be borne by the great body of the citizens, so that we are bound to construe the words of the statute as well as the allegations of the indictment strictly.

That a variance between the allegations in an indictment which are material and the proof offered in support thereof is fatal is axiomatic; and "if the criminal character of the act depends upon the locality in which it is committed, the allegation of place becomes material, * * * furnishes an essential feature in the description of the offense, must be accurately laid, and matter of local description must be proved." If, therefore, the proof in this case (as we think) does not show that the place where the defendant appeared intoxicated was the same place or such a place as is alleged in the indictment, the variance will be fatal. In our judgment the place shown by the evidence is a piece of land owned and worked by private individuals, over which the public is permitted, at the will of the owners, to pass and repass as may suit the convenience, necessity, or pleasure of the passer-by, but which has never become either the public highway mentioned in the statute or the public road used to describe it in the indictment. In our opinion the error in this case arose from confusing a road used by the public with a public road. There can be no doubt that the state proved that the locality where the defendant is alleged to have been intoxicated is a road, which simply means a piece of land either used or appropriated for travel. But the indictment alleged "a public road," and the statute penalizes drunkenness on the "public highway." Thus it became essentially material to be shown whether the road in question was a public road and public highway. We think there is a fatal variance between the proof and the allegations made, not because the location was not "a road," but because it was not shown to be "a public road," and because, on the contrary, the evidence established the fact that it was not a public road. So far as the general and continuous use by an entire community is concerned, the proof is sufficient; but mere use is not enough to prove dedication or prescription, if either was relied upon.

The terms "public highway" and "public road" are not synonymous. We sometimes use the term "road" in ordinary conversation in the same sense as "way," but in legal parlance this is improper. "Road" means any piece of land used or appropriated for travel. * * * "Way" * * * means nearly the same thing, as "right of way" or, in other words, the right of one person, * * * or of the community at large, to pass over the land of another." Chollar-Potosi Mining Co. v. Kennedy, 93 Am. Dec. 416, 3 Nev. 361. The word used in the statute is "highway," which is defined by 1 Bouv. Law Dict. 750, to be "a passage, road, or street which every citizen has a right to use." But even this definition is not exhaustive, because the term may be applied more broadly. Abbott's Law Dictionary says: "There is a difference in the shade of meaning conveyed by two uses of the word. Sometimes it signifies right of free passage, in the abstract, not importing anything about the character or construction of the way. Thus a river is called a highway. * * * Again, it has reference to some system of law authorizing the taking of a strip of land, and preparing and devoting it to the use of travelers. In this use it imports a roadway upon the soil, constructed under the authority of these laws." We may say, then, in brief, that the word "road" refers to the land. "Highway" denotes the easement, and that the land taken has been subjected to servitude, "carrying with it the right to use the soil for the purposes of repair and improvement, and in cities for the more general purposes of sewerage, the distribution of light and water, and the furtherance of public morality, health, trade, and convenience." A highway may be a road, but a road is not necessarily a public highway. To be a public highway it must be, as stated in the indictment in this case, a public road.

It being settled, then, that the statute has reference to only such public roads as are public highways, we come to consider the nature of the proof required to show whether a given locality is within the descriptive term "a public road." A public road can be created in four ways: (1) By a legislative enactment; (2) by action of the proper county authorities; (3) by dedication; and (4) by prescription. No effort was made to prove the character of the road in this case, as coming under either of the first two heads. Was it proved to be a road by dedication? The evidence perhaps established fully that Oberry, the owner, had evidenced an intention to donate the land to the public; but the evidence also disclosed the fact that there had been no acceptance on the part of the public. There is no evidence that the public authorities have ever worked the road as a public road. Construing section 3591 of the Civil Code of 1895, which is in these words, "If the owner of lands, either expressly or by his acts, dedicates the same to public use, and the same is so used for such a length of time that the public accommodation or private rights might be materially affected by an interruption of the enjoyment, he cannot afterwards appropriate it to private purposes," Justice Cobb says: "A dedication to public use is * * * not complete until two things appear; that is, an intention on the part of the owner to dedicate his property to the public use, and an acceptance on the part of the public of the property for such use. * * * The intention to dedicate need not be shown by an express declaration to that effect. But the use must be of such a character as to clearly indicate that the public has accepted the dedication of the property to the public use. The acceptance need not be express; but if the way be used by the public, and worked, or treated by the public authorities as a part of a system of public highways in the place where the way is claimed, and this is continued 'for such a length of time that the public accommodation and private rights might be materially affected by the interruption of the enjoyment,' the dedication to the public use is complete as against the owner of the fee." Healey v. Atlanta, 125 Ga. 737, 54 S. E. 749, citing Mayor and Council of Madison v. Booth, 53 Ga. 609; Parsons v. Trustees, 44 Ga. 529; Georgia R. Co. v. Atlanta, 118 Ga. 486, 45 S. E. 256; Kelsoe v. Oglethorpe, 120 Ga. 951, 48 S. E. 366, 102 Am. St. Rep. 138. And in the Healey Case it is further said that unless it appears clearly that the "dedication was accepted by the public authorities, either in express terms or by implication resulting from the maintenance of a way as public in its nature," the use of one's property will not amount to a dedication. In the headnote it is said that "in every case of an implied dedication it must appear that the property has been in the exclusive control of the public for a period long enough to raise the presumption of a gift." We assume this latter statement to be a succinct statement as to the time necessary to create a road by dedication, and it is also based upon sound reason; for, if there is an implied dedication, it must rely upon the presumption of a gift, which arises in seven years.

It being further true that the use by the public of Mr. Oberry's property is not necessarily inconsistent with the retention of dominion by him, we think that the state failed to show dedication as to the road in question. Nor will the evidence authorize the conclusion that the road had become a public road by prescription, because it nowhere appeared that the public had used and maintained it as a highway for a period of 20 years or more. In Southern Railway Co. v. Combs, 124 Ga. 1010, 53 S. E. 508, the court (while declining to determine the exact term of use by the public and working by public authorities necessary to make a road a public road by prescription) says: "It is certain that a road may become a public road when it has been used by the public and worked by the public authorities for 20 years." And we will add that 20 years' use, and work, maintenance, and control by the public road authorities, are required to fix title in the public, as well as in the citizen, where possession adverse to the owner alone is relied upon. In the recent case of Kelsoe v. Oglethorpe, 120 Ga. 951, 48 S. E. 366, 102 Am. St. Rep. 138, the Supreme Court held that 20 years' adverse possession was necessary to work a nonuser of a public road once established. So we think there is no question that evidence of 20 years' possession and use would be required were a prescriptive title relied upon, instead of proof of dedication, or an order passed by the proper county authorities, or a legislative enactment. Many of the cases in which the question has been raised as to what constitutes a public road in Georgia have arisen under Civ. Code 1895, § 2222, which relates to railroad crossings over public roads. We have examined, perhaps, all of these cases, and it appears that up to and including the case of Georgia R. Co. v. Cromer, 106 Ga. 296, 31 S. E. 759, the view was entertained that the words "public road" were qualified by the words "established pursuant to law." And while it was not directly decided, an inference could have been drawn, from the earlier decisions, that the existence of a road as a public road must be shown by a public record, at least in so far as the terms were applicable to section 2222. By later decisions, however, the rules we have laid down above have been recognized, and the classification of the four methods of proof we have adopted is authorized. And the doctrine we have drawn from decisions of other states which hold that the road is the land, and the highway the servitude or use to which the land has been subjected, is sustained in our own state in Kavanagh v. Mobile & Girard R. Co., 78 Ga. 271, 2 S. E. 113, where the court held that the streets of Columbus belonged to the state, but as highways they belonged to the city of Columbus.

In view of what we have stated, the charge we have quoted in this opinion, and which was given by our learned brother of the trial bench in this case, was erroneous; and, after reviewing a multitude of authorities in addition to those we have cited, we return to the words of the first headnote in Hart v. Taylor, 61 Ga. 156: "A neighborhood road used by a settlement of people, great or small, is not a public road in the sense of the Georgia Code, and in the common parlance of our people." Placing this in juxtaposition with the charge that "it is immaterial as to whether or not this road was maintained by the public or county authorities as a public highway or private way, but if you find that this road was used as a highway by a community of people for any number of years, as a means of ingress or egress to and from their homes, and that the crime was committed on said road by this defendant, it would be your duty to find him guilty," we are compelled to reverse the judgment of the court below.

Judgment reversed.

MT. VERNON BANK v. GIBBS et al.
(No. 266.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. April 25, 1907.)

1. BILLS AND NOTES—ACTION ON NOTE—ATTORNEY'S FEE.

The intention of the General Assembly in the passage of the act of 1900 relating to attorney's fees (Acts 1900, p. 53) was evidently dual. It conferred a benefit on the debtor, by relieving him from the burden of attorney's fees, while foreseeing, as a consequence thereof, relief to the public from the expense of the litigation thus prevented. When complied with, the debtor saves the attorney's fees; the public saves the expense of trial.

2. SAME—RETURN DAY.

The "return day" of a term of court is the last day a suit can be filed to be returnable to that term. Keeping in view the manifest intention of the Legislature, and conserving the plainly beneficial effect of the act in question, the term "return day," therein contained, is to be presumed to have been used to convey the same meaning which had generally and legally been applied to it previously to its passage Johnson v. State, 53 S. E. 265, 1 Ga. App. 195.

3. SAME.

Hence, where suit had been brought upon a promissory note containing provision for attorney's fees, and it was admitted that the written notice of intention to sue had been duly given, and it was uncontradicted that payment of the debt and interest thereon was not made until several days after the last return day, it was error to enter a judgment relieving the defendant from the attorney's fees.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Mt. Vernon; Gelger, Judge.

Action by the Mt. Vernon Bank against J. W. Gibbs and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

W. M. Lewis and M. B. Calhoun, for plaintiff in error.

RUSSELL, J. Suit was brought in the city court of Mt. Vernon on a promissory note which provided for the payment of 10 per cent. attorney's fees, if collected by law or through an attorney at law. In the record appears the following: "Notice of Intention to Sue Note. Oct. 24, 1906. To J. W. Gibbs, N. B. Gibbs, El. S. Gibbs: You are hereby notified that I intend to bring suit against you to the December monthly term, 1906, of the city court of Mt. Vernon, of said county, on a promissory note made and executed by you to the Mt. Vernon Bank, on the 23d day of January, 1904, and for the principal sum of sixty-three dollars and eighty-five cents; said note falling due on the 1st day of November, 1904, and bearing interest from maturity at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum, and 10 per cent. attorney's fees. * * * And if you fail to pay said note on or before the return day of the said court, at the term above mentioned, I shall sue for said attorney's fees, in addition to the principal and interest due thereon; said note having been placed in my hands by the holder thereof for collection. M. B. Calhoun, Attorney for Plaintiff." The time for holding the court, as it appears, was the second Monday (10th) of December, 1906. And on December 3d the principal, interest, and costs due on the note were paid. The attorney's fees were not paid. On the 10th of December, 1906, the defendant J. W. Gibbs filed the following sworn answer: "(1) Defendant shows to the court that he has paid off and discharged all the principal, interest, and costs due on said suit, and that said payment was made before the return day of said court. (2) Defendant denies his liability for the attorney's fees, alleged to be due on said note." By agreement of the parties the issues were submitted to the trial judge without a jury, together with another case between the same parties involving the same issue, and as to which latter case it is further agreed in writing that the judgment of this court shall be binding. On the trial in the court below it was agreed in open court that Gibbs, the maker, had paid the principal, interest, and costs accrued in both of said cases; and therefore the only question submitted in that court, or in this, was whether the defendants are liable for the 10 per cent. attorney's fees stipulated to be paid, in the note.

The case was submitted upon the following agreed statement of facts: That the principal, interest, and costs were paid on Monday, December 3, 1906; that the December monthly term, 1906, of said court convened on Monday, December 10, 1906; in other words, that the note was not paid 15 days before the first day of December term, 1906, of the court. And it was admitted that the notice of plaintiff's intention to sue on the note, and to sue for the 10 per cent. attorney's fees, had been duly and legally served on all of the defendants more than 10 days before the filing of the suit. Upon this agreed statement of facts the court entered the following judgment: "It appearing to the court that the above-stated case has been settled, except the attorney's fees alleged to be due, and the same being submitted to the court on an agreed statement of facts, the only question being the liability of defendants for said attorney's fees, it is ordered by the court that said defendants be relieved of the payment of the attorney's fees alleged to be due. This order to be of force and effect in each one of said cases stated as above, filed to the December monthly term of the city court of Mt. Vernon, December 10, 1906."

We think the court erred in not entering up judgment for the attorney's fees. Section 3667 of the Civil Code of 1895, as amended by the act of 1900 (Acts 1900, p. 53), is as follows: "Obligations to pay attorney's fees upon any note or other evidence of indebtedness * * * are void, and no court shall enforce such agreement to pay attorney's fees unless the debtor shall fail to pay such debt on or before the return day of the court to which suit is brought for the collection of the same; provided, the holder of the obligation sued upon, his agent or attorney, notifies the defendant in writing, ten days before suit is brought, of his intention to bring suit, and also the term of the court to which suit will be brought." There can be no doubt as to the written notice in the case. Defendant admitted he was notified in writing 10 days before the suit was brought, which means 10 days before it was filed. Did the defendant, as alleged in his answer, "pay such debt" before "the return day"? The trial court seems to have decided the case upon the idea that the words "return day" meant the first day of the term. But, if the words "return day" be construed to mean the first day of the court (as they must have been construed by the trial judge, to authorize the judgment he rendered upon the evidence), the notice provided for by law would be absolutely useless, because the debtor would already have been informed, by service of the petition and process, not that he would be sued, but that he in fact had been sued.

There can be no question as to the meaning of the phrase "return day," as used in the act of 1900. It has a general ordinary meaning, and it has been defined according to that meaning in the decisions of the Supreme Court of this state. It always had reference to the filing of the suit, and, popularly, is most generally called "the last return day." The Legislature, when changing an existing law, as in creating a new law, is to be presumed to understand the meaning of the words employed, and to use such words to convey the same meaning as is commonly attached to them generally at the time of their use. Furthermore, one of the cardinal rules to be observed, in ascertaining the meaning of any word employed in a statute, is to look to the intention of the lawmakers. In the passage of the act of 1900, the General Assembly evidently intended to accomplish two purposes. It desired to relieve the debtor, as far as possible, from the burden of attorney's fees, where they could be of no benefit to him; and in making it to his interest to relieve himself from the payment of attorney's fees, by speedy payment of the debt, it sought thereby at the same time to relieve the public, as far as possible, from the burdens of useless litigation. The interest of the public and the courts was in view of the legislative mind, as well as the interest of the debtor; and one of the most beneficial results of legislative wisdom is the prevention of useless lawsuits. If the debt was paid, and the law discharged the attorney's fees in consequence of the payment of the debt, before the last return day, the public would be saved the expense of trial, the officers of court their trouble, and the creditor delay. The act confers a benefit on the debtor, foreseeing as a consequence relief to the public from useless litigation. The debtor saves the attorney's fees. The public saves expenses of court. This purpose of the act would be practically defeated, if the words "return day" were held to mean the first day of the court.

Beginning with the passage of the "Twitty bill" (Acts 1890-91, p. 221; Civ. Code 1895, § 3667), our laws have seemed to view attorney's fees askance; and, construing the whole act together, it is the evident intention of the General Assembly to give every debtor who has promised to pay attorney's fees, whether suit be brought or not, at least 10 days in which to remove that liability, by payment, for he is to be notified at least 10 days before the latest day the suit can be brought to that term, and, if he pays the demand before the return day, the obligation to pay attorney's fees becomes void. The manifest purpose of the law was to give to the debtor 10 days, not only to relieve himself from paying attorney's fees, but, in most instances, to avoid suit altogether. The expression "return day," as stated above, as construed by our courts, has a fixed and definite meaning. It means the last day on which suits returnable to the next term may be filed. Baxley v. Bennett, 33 Ga. 146; Hood v. Powers, 57 Ga. 240; Everett v. Ferst's Sons & Co., 126 Ga. 662, 55 S. E. 916. The defendant made his payment seven days before court; and, under the act of 1906 (Acts 1906, p. 294) creating the city court of Mt. Vernon, the last filing day is 15 days before the first day of the term to which the suit is returnable; so that his payment was after, instead of before, the return day. The defendant admitted in open court that the notice was served more than 10 days before the time of filing the suit; and, by failing to pay within the 10 days, and paying 8 days after the suit was filed, he became subject to the attorney's fees, according to the undisputed evidence. It was, therefore, error for the judge of the city court to enter a judgment relieving the defendant from his obligation as to attorney's fees. There should be a judgment for attorney's fees on the amount due (at the time of the payment), according to the terms of the contract.

Judgment reversed.

WOOD v. STATE. (No. 398.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. April 25, 1907.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW—EVIDENCE—WEIGHT—POSITIVE AND NEGATIVE.

The rule that the existence of a fact testified to by one positive witness is to be believed, rather than that such fact did not exist because many witnesses, who had the same opportunity of observation, swear that they did not see or know of its having transpired, does not apply when one of two persons having equal facilities for seeing or hearing a thing swears that it occurred, and the other that it did not. Weeks v. State, 79 Ga. 37, 3 S. E. 323; Atlanta & W. P. Railroad v. Johnson, 66 Ga. 260; Cobb v. State, 27 Ga. 649.

2. SAME—TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—RULES OF EVIDENCE.

While the fact that positive testimony affirmative and positive testimony contradictory thereof has been introduced in a given case would, without more, render a charge upon the subject of positive and negative testimony inapplicable and improper, still, if in the same case negative testimony was also introduced, a proper charge upon that subject would not be erroneous.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 14, Criminal Law, § 1744.]

3. SAME.

Where, under the evidence, the rule embodied in section 985 of the Penal Code of 1895 can properly be given, the judge should also, and in connection therewith, give an instruction that the jury, in weighing the testimony of such witnesses, must consider and pass upon the question of their credibility. Grant v. State, 50 S. E. 946, 122 Ga. 744 (5).

4. SAME.

In any case it is error to give in charge to the jury the rule in regard to positive and negative testimony embodied in Pen. Code 1895, § 985, without stating the qualification that other things must be equal, and the witnesses of equal credibility, and that the rule does not apply as to those witnesses who have each given positive, though conflicting, testimony; some swearing that a certain thing transpired, and others equally positively that it did not.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Monticello; Thurman, Judge.

One Wood was convicted of shooting on a public highway in violation of Pen. Code 1895, § 508, and he brings error. Reversed.

Greene F. Johnson, for plaintiff in error.
Doyle Campbell, Sol., for the State.

RUSSELL, J. Two assignments of error are insisted upon by the plaintiff in error: (1) That the court erred in giving in charge to the jury section 985 of the Penal Code of 1895, without qualification; and (2) that the court erred in failing to charge that the rule applying to the distinction between positive and negative evidence does not apply when, of two parties having equal facilities for knowing a thing, one swears that it occurred and the other that it did not occur, the testimony of both witnesses, in that event, being positive evidence. In the amended motion is another ground, referring to the court's refusal to charge a written request; but, this assignment was abandoned in this court.

The defendant was indicted for a violation of Pen. Code 1895, § 508, forbidding the discharge of firearms on a public highway between dark and daylight. There was positive evidence that he fired a pistol as alleged in the indictment, and equally positive evidence that he did not fire a pistol at the time and place alleged. The defendant, as appears from the evidence, was in a buggy with two other persons. Some witnesses swore that shots were fired by two of the persons in the buggy, and there was testimony from two of the state's witnesses that they did not know whether the shots were fired by one man or by both who were in the buggy. In other words, there was positive testimony that two men in the buggy fired pistols, positive testimony that no one in the buggy fired at all, and negative testimony from witnesses who did not profess to know whether the shots were fired by the defendant or his companion. The judge gave section 985 of the Penal Code of 1895 in charge to the jury, without any qualification or any instruction as to its application. Under the facts above stated, we think that the omission of the trial court to instruct the jury that the rule embodied in section 985 is only applicable when other things are equal and the witnesses are of equal credibility would require a new trial; and when to that failure of the trial judge is added his failure to explain to the jury that the testimony of a witness who testifies that a certain thing did not occur is as much positive testimony as the statement of one who swears that it did occur, our duty to grant a new trial is imperative.

The headnotes sufficiently embody our opinion, and there is, therefore, no necessity to elaborate the principle which controls our decision. It is said in Kimbrough v. State, 101 Ga. 585, 29 S. E. 39, that it would not do to lay down the broad rule that witnesses who testify positively to a fact are to be believed, rather than those whose testimony may be negative; for "the negative testimony of a witness of good character will always outweigh the positive testimony of a witness shown to be unworthy of belief." That the general rule as to the probative value of positive and negative testimony is subject to the qualification that other things are equal and the witnesses are of equal credibility is again decided in Atlanta Ry. Co. v. Bigham, 105 Ga. 498, 30 S. E. 934, and in Skinner v. State, 108 Ga. 747, 32 S. E. 844.

The proposition that where one witness swears that a certain thing occurred, and another with equal opportunity to know swears positively that it did not occur, needs only to be stated, to demonstrate that the evidence of both witnesses is positive testimony, the one not more so than the other. The applicability of section 985 to the testimony is often a doubtful matter. Except in a clear case, that section should not be given in charge to the jury; and, when it is given, the jury should be instructed as to its meaning and application, especially in a case like this, where there was positive testimony affirmative, positive testimony contradictory, and negative testimony, all material to the issue.

Judgment reversed.

(1 Ga. App. 723)

JACKSON v. STATE. (No. 382.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. May 3, 1907.)

1. PARENT AND CHILD—ABANDONMENT.

The evidence in this case authorized the conviction of the defendant. "A father who within this state willfully and voluntarily abandons his child before it is born, and persists in the abandonment afterwards, leaving it in a dependent and destitute condition, is guilty of a misdemeanor."

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 37, Parent and Child, § 176.]

2. CRIMINAL LAW—WITNESSES—CROSS-EXAMINATION—OFFER TO PROVE.

While the right of cross-examination, thorough and sifting, should not be abridged, nevertheless, even upon cross-examination, where an answer to a question propounded to a witness is refused by the court, and such refusal is assigned as error, it must appear that counsel, on the trial, stated to the court, either what he expected to prove, or (if that is impracticable or impossible) what he desired to prove, by the answer to such rejected question. Upon failure of such statement to the trial court, this court cannot review the alleged error.

3. SAME—INSTRUCTIONS—APPLICATION—EVIDENCE.

In the absence of evidence sufficient to rebut the presumption of paternity arising from the marriage relation, it is not error to refuse to charge that the defendant would not be guilty of abandonment if the jury are satisfied that the defendant never acknowledged the paternity of the child and has always denied it.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 14, Criminal Law, §§ 1980-1984.]

4. SAME.

The issue as to whether or not the abandonment is willful is not illustrated by the conduct or sayings of the reputed father, unless it be shown by the evidence that he is not such father.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Sandersville; Hyman, Judge.

Rufus Jackson was convicted of abandonment of his minor child, and brings error. Affirmed.

E. W. Jordan, for plaintiff in error. G. H. Howard, Sol., for the State.

RUSSELL, J. Rufus Jackson was convicted of abandonment of his minor child. The evidence showed that he married Lillie Jackson, and before the birth of the child abandoned her, and never lived with her or contributed to her or the child's support. The mother was shown to be unable to work, and the child suffered cold and hunger by reason of the abandonment. The father made no provision for it, or for the mother, at the time of its birth, but voluntarily and willfully abandoned it; and, though it appeared that the child's grandmother contributed some to its support and to that of the mother, the evidence shows that this was only at times, and that frequently, from the time of the child's birth, it was dependent and destitute, and actually suffered for lack of food, clothing, and fire to keep it warm. It was argued by the movant that no date is shown when this dependency existed, and whether it occurred before the finding of the indictment. A fair and reasonable construction of the evidence of Lillie Jackson is that this condition existed and continued from the child's birth, on March 22, 1906. The indictment was found in September, 1906.

The defendant, in his motion for new trial, which was overruled, in addition to the general grounds, contends that the court erred in refusing to allow the prosecutrix, as a witness, to answer the following question propounded to her by the defendant's counsel: "How much salary per month does your mother earn?" Movant is unable to state what answer would have been made by said witness to said question; she being the prosecutrix and leading witness for the state. The purpose of said question, as insisted, was to elicit from the witness, upon cross-examination, facts from which the jury could infer that the mother of the prosecutrix and the grandmother of the child earned a sufficient salary to support the child; movant contending that, the evidence showing that the child was supported by the grandmother and lived with its mother in the house of the grandmother, the amount of her earnings was a material fact, shedding light upon whether or not the child was in a destitute and dependent condition. It is further insisted that the court, in refusing to allow the witness to answer said question, erred, because it was an abridgment of movant's right to a full and complete cross-examination of the witness called against him, because the matter sought from the witness was relevant and material upon the issue of his guilt or innocence. In another ground of the motion it is contended that the court erred in refusing to give in charge to the jury the following instruction, the same having been requested in writing: "If you believe from the evidence in this case that the defendant, Rufus Jackson, has never acknowledged the paternity of the child, and has at no time regarded himself as the father of the child, or claimed the child as his own, then he would not be guilty of abandonment of child." And, finally, the defendant urges as a ground for new trial that the undisputed evidence in the case shows that the defendant has never recognized, claimed, or acknowledged at any time the fatherhood of the child, and that he has never lived with the mother of the child, nor contributed to her support, and that he instituted legal proceedings for divorce before the birth of the child, and that the offense of abandonment is not made out until it is shown that the defendant at some time claimed the child or acknowledged its paternity.

The verdict was authorized by the evidence, unless the court erred in the ruling as to the admission of evidence, or in the refusal to charge as requested in the sixth ground of the motion, and unless these errors so contributed to the verdict as to be harmful to the defendant. There is no merit in the ground that the verdict is contrary to evidence. While it has been held in a number of cases—those cited by plaintiff in error as well as others—that it must be shown that the child abandoned was left by the father in a dependent and destitute condition, the jury were authorized, from the evidence in this case, to find that fact fully established. And while recognizing the principle laid down in a number of decisions, ending with Williams v. State, 128 Ga. 637, 55 S. E. 490, that, where an essential element of a crime is prescribed by law, it must both be charged and proved by the state, in the strict construction of criminal statutes, still, in a case where a father is heartless enough to add to antenuptial wrongs the desertion of his innocent offspring, this court will not be overzealous in reweighing the testimony passed upon by the jury. It is further insisted by the plaintiff in error that, admitting that destitution and dependence existed, it is not shown when it existed, and whether it occurred before the finding of the indictment. The indictment was found in September, 1906. A fair and reasonable construction of the evidence for the state leaves no other conclusion than that this condition existed and continued from the child's birth in March, 1906. As to this six months before the indictment the evidence makes a clear case; and as evidence as to the condition existing subsequent to the indictment was not objected to, the error, if any, is immaterial. The evidence, in our view of the case, makes a strong, clear case of abandonment, of dependence and destitution. This case is controlled by Bull v. State, 80 Ga. 704, 6 S. E.

178, in which Judge Bleckley, rendering the opinion, declares that "a father who within this state willfully and voluntarily abandons his child before it is born, and persists in the abandonment afterwards, leaving it in a dependent and destitute condition, is guilty of a misdemeanor."

We come, now, to the special grounds of the amended motion. Did the court err in refusing to allow the mother of the child to answer a question as to how much the grandmother earned per month? Conceding that each party is entitled to the right of cross-examination, thorough and sifting, of witnesses called by his opponent, and waiving the fact that it does not appear that the trial court was informed what answer would be made to the proposed question, and that, for that reason, there is nothing that this court can consider upon this assignment of error, and granting that the answer of the witness would have shown an earning capacity on the part of the grandmother sufficient to support the child, there was still no error in the ruling of the court; for while it is competent, in defense of the charge of abandonment, to show that others do provide for the support of the child, still it is not material or proper to allow testimony that others are able to do so. It cannot seriously be contended that there is any legal duty on the grandmother to support this grandchild. However, as matter of law, we cannot consider this assignment of error. Where error is ascribed to a court in refusing to allow a witness to answer a question, it must appear that a statement was made to the court at the time, showing what the answer would be, or what answers were expected. Bowden v. Bowden, 125 Ga. 106, 53 S. E. 606 (1). "Where a question is asked, the answer excluded, and no statement made to the judge as to what the witness would have sworn, there is nothing before the court. It is impossible for the judge on the motion for new trial, or for this court on a bill of exceptions, to say whether the complaining party would have been benefited or injured by the answer. The witness may not have known anything of the subject inquired about; and if a new trial should be granted because the answer was excluded, it might happen that on the second trial the question would be again propounded, allowed, and the witness give hearsay, inadmissible, or irrelevant testimony, or the answer might be harmful, instead of helpful, or the witness might reply, 'I do not know,' with the result that the time and money of the parties and the country had been wasted for so inconsequent a conclusion. That this is not unlikely to occur is shown by the experience of all practicing lawyers, who have often seen a long and heated argument as to the right to ask a question, followed by the laughter of all bystanders when the court held it competent, and the witness replied that he knew nothing about the matter. * * * It would nev-or do to grant a new trial until it appeared, not only that the question was proper, but that the answer was material and would have been of benefit to the complaining party." Griffin v. Henderson, 117 Ga. 383, 43 S. E. 712. It may be considered that the strictness of this rule should be much relaxed in cross-examination; but even then, unless the nature of the question discloses the answer expected, the counsel should state to the court what he expects to prove, or, if he cannot make such statement, what he wants to prove by the witness. The right of cross-examination should in no case be abridged, but this right is granted in order to confer a substantial benefit; and, as there is no duty devolving on a grandmother to support a grandchild, we hold that any answer that witness could have made would have been so immaterial to the issue as to have in no way aided the defendant either in disproving the charge made by the state or in defending himself against it.

There was no error in refusing to charge, as requested by defendant, upon the subject of whether defendant ever acknowledged that he was the father of the child. It could not be material as to whether he claimed or recognized the child, or whether he consistently at all times denied that the child was his. The mother of the child being his wife, he is bound by the legal presumption of paternity, which can only be rebutted by proof.

PHILIP CAREY MFG. CO. v. VIADUCT PLACE et al. (No. 281.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. May 3, 1907.)

1. MECHANICS' LIENS—PROCEEDINGS TO PERFECT—JUDGMENT.

A materialman's lien is not complete as such until there is a judgment fixing the amount.

2. SAME.

In order to foreclose and perfect such lien, so as to bind the owner of real estate for the price of material furnished a contractor, there must be a judgment against the contractor, where no privity exists between the materialman and the owner of the property.

3. SAME—OPERATION AND EFFECT—EXTENT OF LIABILITY OF OWNER.

The filing of a suit to foreclose a materialman's lien, claim of which has been previously filed in accordance with law, does not of itself create such lien; and the existence of such lien may be prevented.

(a) There is a difference between a claim of lien and the lien itself, when established in accordance with section 2804 of the Civil Code of 1895.

(b) The contractor must be sued with the owner of the realty sought to be subjected to the special lien, and the owner's liability as to amount and in all other respects can be no greater than the contractor's.

4. BANKRUPTCY—DISCHARGE OF BANKRUPT.

Consequently, where the contractor is discharged in bankruptcy prior to the judgment creating the lien, and his liability is thereby annulled, the lien cannot thereafter be foreclosed against the property of the owner and a judgment be rendered against him. It would require an equitable action to protect the plaintiff in the rights sought to be asserted under the circumstances. Hudson v. Lamar, 49 S. E. 735, 121 Ga. 835; Bell v. Dawson Grocery Co., 48 S. E. 150, 120 Ga. 628.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Atlanta; Reid, Judge.

Suit to foreclose a materialman's lien by the Philip Carey Manufacturing Company against the Viaduct Place and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

J. E. & L. F. McClelland, for plaintiff in error. Smith, Hammond & Smith, Culbertson & Johnson, and W. E. Talley, for defendants in error.

RUSSELL, J. Philip Carey Manufacturing Company brought suit to foreclose a materialman's lien on the property called the "Viaduct Place," in the city of Atlanta, against Steiner-Emery Company as owners and J. F. Clemmons as contractor. By agreement of the parties his honor, H. M. Reid, judge of the city court of Atlanta, without the intervention of a jury, rendered judgment in the case upon the following agreed statement of facts: The Philip Carey Manufacturing Company is a corporation of Ohio with a place of business in the city of Atlanta, and is a materialman. J. F. Clemmons was a contractor, and had contracted to improve the Viaduct Place. Clemmons purchased of the Philip Carey Manufacturing Company certain material, part of which, amounting to $51.15, was used in improving the building of Viaduct Place. Said material was furnished during the month of August, 1905. Philip Carey Manufacturing Company filed its claim of lien in the office of the clerk of the superior court of Fulton county October 7, 1905, and it was recorded October 10, 1905. The building improved is in Fulton county, Ga. The Philip Carey Manufacturing Company filed their suit on October 13, 1905, against J. F. Clemmons, contractor, and Steiner-Emery Company, now Viaduct Place, owners. Both of said parties were served October 20, 1905. Clemmons was adjudicated a bankrupt on October 5, 1905. On the schedule of said bankrupt it appears that the Philip Carey Manufacturing Company was a creditor of the bankrupt in the sum of $159.76, and it was admitted that said debt was scheduled in said bankruptcy proceedings, and the manufacturing company had notice of the bankruptcy proceedings, but never proved or attempted to prove their claim. The balance due Clemmons by Viaduct Place was set apart to him as a homestead. The order of court confirming the homestead was dated July 18, 1906, and Clemmons was granted his final discharge in bankruptcy July 21, 1906. Upon the above agreed statement of facts and the admissions of the pleadings the following judgment was rendered: "Upon the pleadings in said case and upon the agreed statement of facts submitted the court finds for the defendant J. F. Clemmons on his plea of discharge in bankruptcy. As no judgment can be rendered against Clemmons as contractor, I find in favor of the other defendant; and judgment is rendered against the plaintiff for costs." The plaintiff in error excepts, upon the ground that the judgment is contrary to law and without authority of law; that the effect of said judgment is to hold that the discharge in bankruptcy of a contractor relieves the property improved of a materialman's lien for material furnished to improve the same. The contention of the plaintiff in error is that, while no general judgment can be obtained against the contractor after his discharge in bankruptcy, the bankrupt can be made a party for the purpose of fixing the amount of the debt, and that the debt so fixed thus becomes a lien against the property improved, and the contractor's discharge in bankruptcy does not relieve the property improved of its lien.

We think the finding of the trial judge was manifestly correct, in view of the facts submitted. The contractor was adjudged a bankrupt on October 5, 1905, two days before the plaintiff in error filed its claim of lien on the property of Viaduct Place on account of the material in question. In the contractor's schedule in bankruptcy it was shown that the plaintiff in error was a creditor of the contractor on this claim for material, and that the claim was provable in bankruptcy. According to the agreement of facts, the plaintiff in error paid no attention to the proceedings in bankruptcy. It could have gone into the bankrupt court, and have established the amount of its lien and identified the use to which its material was put. It had notice that the bankrupt court was dealing with this debtor, the contractor, and all of his rights and liabilities. This case came on to be tried November 30, 1906. On July 21, 1906, the contractor, Clemmons, was given his final discharge in bankruptcy, and such discharge was set up by defendant in his plea. The amount due the contractor by Viaduct Place, as shown by the agreed statement of facts, had been set apart to Clemmons as part of his exemption. The discharge of the contractor relieved Viaduct Place, especially in view of the fact that the title of the indebtedness was vested in the defendant as part of his exemption. The plea of the defendant Viaduct Place, which is not denied, says that "demands had been made on this defendant by the trustee in bankruptcy for said J. F. Clemmons for the balance due by this defendant to said Clemmons on account of said work. This defendant shows that the exclusive jurisdiction of the assets of said J. F. Clemmons, part of which indebtedness of this defendant to said Clemmons on account of work done by him on said building, is vested in the United States District Court, sitting in bankruptcy, and, if the plaintiff has any claim to or lien upon said fund or any part of it, the court of bankruptcy has full jurisdiction to adjudicate said claim." The plea proceeded further to state that the defendant withheld the amount due, as shown by the affidavit of Clemmons, made in accordance with the statute, to wit, the sum of $51.15, which is mentioned in the agreed statement of facts. Under the very letter of the bankrupt act the court could not enter judgment against Clemmons, because he had been adjudicated a bankrupt and discharged. Being without power to render judgment against the contractor, the court could not render a general judgment against Viaduct Place; and the plaintiff's only remedy was to enforce against the specific property, into which its material went, a previous or contemporaneous judgment against the contractor, fixing the amount of the balance due the contractor by the property owner for material furnished. It is well settled that a special judgment, fixing a lien on the property of an owner in favor of one as to whom no privity of contract exists, cannot be obtained until there is first a general judgment for the claim against the contractor. Lombard v. Trustees, 73 Ga. 322; Castleberry v. Johnston, 92 Ga. 499, 17 S. E. 772; Clayton v. Farrar, 119 Ga. 37, 45 S. E. 723; Mauck v. Rosser, 126 Ga. 268, 55 S. E. 32. It is held in Klipstein v. Allen-Miles Co., 136 Fed. 385, 69 C. C. A. 229, that even the process to secure an inchoate lien against one who is adjudged a bankrupt during the progress of the proceeding may be interrupted by bankruptcy proceedings. But this case is even stronger than the Klipstein Case; for in the present case Clemmons had been adjudged a bankrupt before any claim of lien was filed by the plaintiff in error. Before the claim of lien was filed, the debt was duly scheduled in bankruptcy, was provable in bankruptcy, and could be discharged in bankruptcy. For the plaintiff's right of lien to be perfected, it was bound to file a suit within 12 months and to procure a judgment against the contractor. As bankruptcy proceedings were already pending, the suit was destined to be of no avail, unless the bankrupt failed to procure a discharge. When the discharge was granted, and was pleaded in the suit, the last chance for the establishment of the special lien was obliterated. In the Klipstein Case, cited above, an effort was made to subject the property of a third person to garnishment proceedings. Before final judgment, affecting the rights of such third person, was rendered, there was no obligation as to such third person. The rendition of the final judgment was interrupted by the discharge in bankruptcy, and the bar thus interposed relieved and discharged the garnishee from all liability, notwithstanding a dissolution bond had been given. In the case at bar the Carey Manufacturing Company sought to subject the property of Viaduct Place, a third person, so far as any contractual relation is concerned, to the payment of Clemmons' debt. Before this could be done, judgment against Clemmons was essential. Before such judgment could be rendered, discharge in bankruptcy intervened and made the rendition of a judgment against Clemmons impossible. And the plaintiff having without objection allowed the amount due by Viaduct Place to the contractor to be set aside as part of his exemption, not only would Viaduct Place, if judgment were rendered against it in this case, be compelled to pay the same amount twice, but the effect of the bar of the judgment of discharge was to relieve Viaduct Place and its property from all liabilities to the plaintiff in error. Under the admitted facts the judgment of the lower court appears to us to be a legal necessity.

Learned counsel for plaintiff in error cite the case of McCall v. Herring, 116 Ga. 235, 42 S. E. 468, as authority for the proposition that in an action in which only the establishment of a special lien on specific property is sought, and no judgment in personam is prayed against the defendant, a plea to the effect that the defendant has been adjudicated a bankrupt presents no defense to the action. In that case a security deed upon his own property was given by the bankrupt more than four months prior to the bankruptcy. It was not in any manner affected by the bankruptcy proceedings, as there was a legal method of enforcing it without the necessity of a judgment against the bankrupt. From the statement of facts in the McCall Case it appears that the United States court passed an order allowing the plaintiff to prosecute her suit for the purpose of obtaining a special judgment and having her lien fixed against the property described in the deed. And in this case, if the plaintiff had proceeded in the United States court to bring to the attention of that court the fact that it claimed a special lien for the material furnished, it is to be presumed, following its prior ruling in the McCall Case, that the United States court would have arrested its proceeding as to the claim in question until the plaintiff, if entitled thereto, could have established its special lien, and thereupon would have directed that the amount admitted by the contractor to be due be applied to the payment of the special lien, instead of making it a part of the bankrupt's exemption. The holding in the McCall Case was to the effect that the fact that defendant had been adjudicated a bankrupt was no bar to the assertion of her lien by one who held a deed to the land as security for her debt. There is considerable difference between this and the assertion of a lien for material furnished to a contractor in building or repairing a building. In the one case, by law, the title vests in the holder of the security deed. In the other case the owner of the property may not even know of the claim against his realty. The dealing in the first case is inter partes. In the latter the rights of third persons are affected. The property conveyed to secure the debt in the McCall Case could not be exempted so as to defeat plaintiff's lien. In the present case the plaintiff had no lien which would withstand or overcome the exemption, unless it had procured its recognition in the bankruptcy proceedings.

The cases of Smith v. Zachry, 115 Ga. 722, 42 S. E. 102, and Evans v. Rounsaville, 115 Ga. 684, 42 S. E. 100, are not in point. In the Zachry Case Smith was adjudicated a bankrupt more than a year after Zachry obtained his judgment. The court held that the lien was not lost because Smith had been adjudicated a bankrupt; and in this case, if the manufacturing company had obtained a lien by a judgment against Clemmons (instead of merely claiming a lien) prior to the adjudication in bankruptcy, our holding would be the same as in the Zachry Case. In the Evans Case there is nothing in conflict with what we now hold. All that is decided is that a valid lien, created on the property of the bankrupt more than four months before the filing of the petition in bankruptcy, is not affected by his discharge, and that after such discharge a creditor holding such a lien may proceed to enforce it against the property of the bankrupt in the state court. Counsel also cites the case of Carter v. People's National Bank, 109 Ga. 573, 35 S. E. 61. As construed by the Supreme Court in the Evans Case, supra, the only ruling made in the Carter Case with reference to the bankruptcy law is that "a plea interposed to a proceeding to foreclose a mortgage on land, in a superior court of this state, that pending the proceedings to foreclose the mortgagor was adjudicated a bankrupt, and praying that such proceedings be stayed for the period of 12 months, or until the question of the discharge in bankruptcy of the mortgagor is determined, is not good, and the court committed no error in sustaining a demurrer to the same." The cases of Philmon v. Marshall, 116 Ga. 811, 43 S. E. 48, McKenney v. Cheney, 118 Ga. 387, 45 S. E. 433, and Camp v. Young, 119 Ga. 981, 47 S. E. 560, have no application to the issue before us. Each of these decisions passes upon liens already established and firmly fastened on the property of the bankrupt more than 4 months prior to adjudication.

If the question is, as distinctly stated by counsel for plaintiff in error, whether or not a valid vested lien of a materialman, under the state law, against the owner of property for improvement of his real estate, is divested by a petition in bankruptcy by or against the contractor, we would unhesitatingly answer, "No." But if the question as applicable to the facts of this case is whether a lien in process of establishment is prevented from ripening by a discharge in bankruptcy, where the rights of innocent third parties are concerned (whose double liability might have been prevented by the plaintiff), we answer, "Yes." As to whether a mere petition in bankruptcy would have the effect of estopping the prosecuting and perfecting of the lien, it is not necessary now to decide, as a final discharge was admitted in this case. All of the cases cited are similar to the pending case. In Kollock v. Jackson, 5 Ga. 153, the factor's lien rested on actual possession of the property of the bankrupt prior to the bankruptcy. In Loudon v. Blandford, 56 Ga. 151, the question raised here was not decided, but the lien was complete prior to the bankruptcy proceedings. In Berry v. Jackson, 115 Ga. 196, 41 S. E. 698, 90 Am. St. Rep. 102, the title to specific property was involved; the plaintiff in the trover proceedings, on the one hand, claiming the actual title, and the bankrupt resisting on the other. A fundamental distinction, however, between all the cases cited and the case at bar, is that in this case the plaintiff in error seeks to establish a lien on the property of a third person, whereas the cases cited treat only of liens already established on the property of the bankrupt himself prior to bankruptcy proceedings.

Judgment affirmed.

McCABE v. STATE. (No. 370.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. May 3, 1907.)

LARCENY — WHAT CONSTITUTES HOUSE — WHARF.

A house or building, within the meaning of Pen. Code 1895, §§ 173, 179, defining larceny from the house, is a structure having a roof and lateral inclosure of some sort, in which persons live or work, animals are confined, or property is stored or contained. A wharf or landing place, where vessels are brought to discharge or take on cargoes, and where freight is placed awaiting removal, covered by a roof, but otherwise wholly uninclosed, is not a house or building, within the above sections.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 32, Larceny, §§ 48, 98.]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Chatham County; Cann, Judge.

One McCabe was convicted of larceny from a house, and brings error. Reversed.

O'Connor, O'Byrne & Hartridge, for plaintiff in error. William W. Osborne, Sol. Gen., for the State.

HILL, O. J. The defendant in the court below was indicted for the offense of larceny from the house; the house described in the indictment as "the storage wharf, same being a building of the Ocean Steamship Company of Savannah." The goods were piled up on the wharf, and sheds were built over the wharf for the protection of the freight from the weather. The evidence does not show that this wharf was inclosed at the sides, and it is fair to presume that the wharf was simply a platform upon which the freight was stored, and was only protected from the top by the shed, and that there was no inclosure or protection on the sides. The main question for our decision is whether this structure constituted a house or building under sections 173 and 179 of the Penal Code of 1895, which define the offense of larceny from the house.

Under the common law there was no such offense as larceny from the house, but such offense was included within the definition of simple larceny. 4 Blackstone's Commentaries, 230. But, beginning with the statute of Henry VIII, the distinct offense of larceny from the house was created, the evolution as to the kind of house in which larceny could be committed being, first, the dwelling house and outhouses within the protection or curtilage of the dwelling house, and then any outhouse, shop, warehouse, or storehouse, and finally any building in which anything of value was contained or stored. The fact that such places were invaded to consummate the larceny made the offense more aggravated, and a severer punishment was inflicted than in cases of simple larceny. Our own statute is very broad in its classification of buildings protected; the language being, "any dwelling house, store, shop, warehouse, or any other building." The words "any other building" must be construed in connection with the character of buildings specifically enumerated. The building or structure protected by the statute must have the distinguishing features of a house. A house is defined to be "a place of abode or shelter; * * * a building used for storing or sheltering something;" and a "building" is defined as "an edifice for any use; that which is built, as dwelling house, barn, etc." Standard Dictionary. The Supreme Court of Georgia, in particular cases, has made several very broad applications of the word "house," as used in the statute defining larceny from the house. In Carter v. State, 106 Ga. 372, 32 S. E. 345, 71 Am. St. Rep. 262, it declared that, "a freight car body, which had been detached from the wheels and placed upon permanent posts near a railway track at a station, and to which a platform had been attached, thus constituting a structure to be used as 'a freight warehouse,' and which is used for this purpose only, is a 'house,' within the meaning of section 136 of the Penal Code of 1895," defining arson. And in Williams v. State, 105 Ga. 814, 32 S. E. 129, 70 Am. St. Rep. 82: "A structure which is stationary, which is eight feet tall, covered with shingles and inclosed with wire, erected for the purpose of the safe-keeping of birds and fowls, is a house, within the meaning of our Code, which defines the offense of larceny from the house." In Bone v. State, 121 Ga. 147, 48 S. E. 986, the court upheld a conviction of larceny from the house, where property was taken from a car in the union passenger depot in Atlanta. The specific question whether the depot was a house, in the meaning of the statute, was not before the court in that case. The contention was that the indictment should have been framed under section 185 of the Penal Code of 1895, which specifically makes it an offense to steal from a railroad car. The record does not disclose the kind of building the union passenger depot was, but the court treated it as "a permanent structure designed for the accommodation of passengers"; and it is fair to presume that it contained rooms for passengers and baggage.

Courts of other states have defined the word "house," or "building," as contained in larceny, burglary, arson, and disorderly house statutes. It is unnecessary to cite the decisions of those courts on the subject. In all of them the structure falling within the definition was not only covered by some sort of a roof, but was also enclosed in some way or by some kind of material. In other words, according to those decisions, a platform covered by a roof is not enough to constitute a house; but, in addition to the platform or roof, or floor, there must be some lateral inclosure—an inclosed structure, where people live or work, or animate property is confined, or inanimate property is stored or contained. The Supreme Court of Texas, in Favro v. State, 39 Tex. Cr. R. 452, 46 S. W. 932, 73 Am. St. Rep. 950, defines the word "building" in the burglary statute as "a fabric built or constructed; a structure; an edifice; * * * a house for residence, business, or public use, or for shelter of animals or storage of goods. * * * In the widest sense, any production or piece of work artificially built up, and composed of parts joined together in some definite manner; any construction." In Willis v. State, 33 Tex. Cr. R. 168, 25 S. W. 1119, it was held that a fruit stand built in the shape of a piano box, large enough for the owner to stand up in while making sales, and in which he slept and kept his clothing, was a house, within the contemplation of the burglary statute. It has also been held that a tent in which persons lived was a house. And even a covered wagon, in which a man and woman traveled and slept, was held to be a house. The law protects the humble tenant in his tent as well as his more fortunate neighbor in his palace, but the building must be protected from intrusion or trespass by some sort of material. It may be stone, wood, wire, or cloth. As was said by the Supreme Court of Indiana in Schilling v. State, 116 Ind. 205, 18 N. E. 685, "the house must be some sort of a building or inclosed structure." "Any structure which has walls on all sides and is covered by a roof, is a house." Maul v. State (Tex. Cr. App.) 26 S. W. 200. In this Texas case the building in question was inclosed by four sides, but had no roof. And the Supreme Court of California, in People v. Stickman, 34 Cal. 245, in construing the burglary statute, held that the word "house" included every kind of building or structure "housed in."

We think a careful reading of the language of our statute contained in Pen. Code 1895, §§ 178, 179, bears out the construction that a house is something more than a mere covering or roof for a platform or wharf. "Larceny from the house is the breaking or entering any house with the intent to steal, or, after breaking or entering said house, stealing therefrom," etc. There must be some sort of house or inclosure to break or enter, and to steal from. We therefore hold that a wharf only covered by a shed, and open on all sides, with nothing to obstruct entrance, and wholly uninclosed, is not a house or building, within the statute defining "larceny from the house." Where there is doubt as to whether the offense is larceny from the house or simple larceny, the safe plan would be to have two counts in the indictment, charging both offenses. The decision of this court on the foregoing question rendering a new trial necessary, we do not decide the points made on the evidence.

Judgment reversed.

BRAWNER v. MADDOX. (No. 27.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. March 1, 1907.)

1. WRIT OF ERROR—RECORD—BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—INCORPORATION OF EVIDENCE—STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

The right given Civ. Code 1895, § 5529, is one the exercise of which is optional with the plaintiff in error. It is cumulative of the right to take the course pointed out in section 5528. The plaintiff in error is not required to prefer its use to the method laid down in section 5528.

2. SAME — BILL OF EXCEPTIONS — SETTING FORTH EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

The brief of so much of the evidence as is "material to a clear understanding of the errors complained of," which is incorporated in the bill of exceptions in this case, is sufficient. Enough evidence admitted to be true is specified in the bill of exceptions and appears in the record to make clear the errors complained of.

3. SAME — DISMISSAL — DEFECTS IN RECORD—STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

Even if this were not the case, this court has no power to dismiss the writ of error on that ground. Civ. Code 1895, §§ 5534, 5569. We therefore refuse to dismiss the writ of error.

4. JUDGMENT — DEFAULT—ENTRY—STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

The entry "Def't" on the judge's docket is a sufficient entry of the fact that no defense has been filed in the case.

(a) The entry of the judge on his docket is in the nature of a memorandum for his use and guidance. No set formality is required for the judgment mentioned in section 5077 (judgment by default), except that "the court shall enter default on the docket, which shall be considered a judgment by default, without a formal entry thereof."

(b) The word "default" may be represented by an intelligible abbreviation.

5. SAME—OPENING—DISCRETION OF COURT.

The opening of a default at a trial term, after the defendant conforms with the conditions imposed by section 5072, is a matter expressly within the discretion of the trial judge.

(a) That power conferred on him is ample and to be used in the exercise of a sound legal discretion.

(b) We are not prepared to say that this discretion was abused in this case, and therefore hold that no error was committed in opening the default.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 30, Judgment, § 285.]

6. PLEADING—PETITION—SUFFICIENCY.

There was no error in sustaining defendant's demurrer to plaintiff's petition.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Atlanta; Reid, Judge.

Action by J. J. Brawner against J. J. Maddox and another. A default judgment against defendants was by order of the court opened, and defendants' demurrers to the petition sustained, and plaintiff brings error. On motion to dismiss writ of error. Motion overruled, and judgment affirmed.

F. E. Radensleben, for plaintiff in error.
C. D. Maddox, for defendants in error.

RUSSELL, J. The defendant in error has filed a motion to dismiss the writ of error; and as this motion, if sustained, will dispose of the case, we will consider it first. The first ground of the motion sets up that the plaintiff in error has failed to incorporate in the bill of exceptions a brief of so much of the evidence as is material to a clear understanding of the errors complained of. By Civ. Code 1895, § 5528, a duty is imposed on the judge, as well as on the plaintiff in error; and hence this ground of the motion calls for a review of the actions of both. Paragraphs 1, 2, and 3 of section 5528 read as follows:

"(1) If the case is not one in which a judgment on a motion for new trial is to be reviewed, the plaintiff in error shall plainly and specifically set forth the errors alleged to have been committed, and shall incorporate in the bill of exceptions a brief of so much of the written and oral evidence as is material to a clear understanding of the errors complained of, and shall specify therein such portions of the record as are material to such understanding.

"(2) If none of the evidence is material to elucidate the errors complained of, this fact shall be stated and the evidence omitted.

"(3) The judge to whom such bill of exceptions is tendered shall, if needful, change the same so as to conform to the truth and make it contain all the evidence, and refer to all of the record, necessary to a clear understanding of the errors complained of."

We think that the plaintiff in error did what he was required to do by paragraphs 1 and 2. We think the trial judge did what he was required to do in paragraph 3. It is true plaintiff in error did not detail in totidem verbis, or set forth in chronological sequence, the statements coming from the mouths of the witnesses as they were introduced on the hearing of the motion. A brief of the evidence is what is required, and the briefer the better, and certainly the more helpful to courts of review in reaching the merits of a case. In the bill of exceptions certified by the judge it is stated that all recitals in the motion (to open the default) are "accepted as true and undisputed by the plaintiff in error," and thereafter he asks to be sent up, as part of the record, the motion, the statements of which, he says, are facts. It amounts to saying: "All the evidence, most of which I complain, is already 'briefed' in material to a clear understanding of the errors the motion, and I ask it to be sent up." A fact admitted is not required to be otherwise proved; and a statement of a fact cannot be better verified than by the admission of its truth by the opposite party. We think that it will hardly be questioned that the able judge in the court below so understood it, or he would have complied with the duty laid upon him in Civ. Code 1895, § 5528, par. 3, and would have "changed it so as to make it contain all the evidence necessary to a clear understanding of the errors complained of." This court approves the manner in which this duty was performed by the trial court. Certainly it would have been impertinent for the defendant to have proved more than he stated in his motion, and plaintiff in error says he admits all the recitals in the motion to be true. No testimony, no matter how many witnesses repeated it, nor how great their respectability and reliability, could have proved the statements in the motion any better, or have made the evidence any more full, than did this admission of their truth. We cannot determine from the record whether this admission was made in the court below or not; but, if it had been as full and sweeping there as it appears in the bill of exceptions, we feel sure that the able trial judge would not have uselessly consumed time in hearing the evidence as to these facts, the law declaring them proved when admitted by the opposite party. It was the duty of the judge to make the bill of exceptions contain all the evidence material to a clear understanding of the errors complained of, and we think that duty was performed, not only as fully as required by law, but in such a way as to be practically helpful to this court. When plaintiff in error accepted all the recitals in the motion now before us as true, he said in effect: "Upon this agreed statement of facts (with regard to which there can be no dispute), I contend that the judge erred in opening the default, and here are the facts which were addressed to his discretion." No doubt the trial judge so understood it, and so do we.

In the brief of the defendant in error further objection is urged to the certificate of the judge in that it reads, "certain recitals of the evidence," while section 5532, as is insisted, requires the wording to be either "contains all the evidence" or "specifies all the evidence." We are not required to consider this objection, because it is not set forth in the motion to dismiss; and we will only say, in passing, that the bill of exceptions shows, in the first place, that it is not true in fact. The words used, instead of being "certain recitals of the evidence," are, "contains recitals of the evidence." And, in the second place, while it is true that section 5532 (Acts 1889, p. 114) prescribes a set form for the judge's certificate, it is also true that a later enactment (Acts 1893, p. 52, codified as section 5534) expressly provides that it shall be the duty of the judge to whom any bill of exceptions is presented to see that the certificate is in legal form before signing the same; and any failure of any judge to discharge his duty in this respect shall not prejudice the rights of the parties by dismissal or otherwise. And the uniform current of authority in this state approves the rule to which the concluding portion of this section gives utterance.

The second ground of the motion to dismiss complains that the plaintiff in error, not having incorporated in the bill of exceptions a brief of the evidence, also failed to have such brief approved and sent up as provided in Civ. Code 1895, § 5529. This section presents a right the exercise of which is optional with the plaintiff in error; and section 5531 specifically declares that "the plaintiff in error, at his election, may incorporate the brief of so much of the evidence as is necessary to a clear understanding of the errors complained of, in the bill of exceptions, rather than have the same sent up in the record." Having already ruled that section 5528 was effectually complied with, and, even if it had not been so complied with in this case, that it is not good ground for dismissal, there is, in our opinion, no merit in this ground of the motion. It is therefore adjudged that the motion to dismiss be overruled and refused.

The facts in this case are as follows: J. J. Brawner brought a suit against J. J. & J. E. Maddox, to the November term, 1905, of the city court of Atlanta. The defendants failed to file either answer, demurrer, plea, or other defense at said term, as required by law, or afterwards during said term. At the regular appearance call of the court for said term the case was called, and, no defense having been filed, defendants were in default and the court so entered upon its docket. The defendants did not, during said first term, when the default was entered against them, make any motion to open the default. At the next term (January, 1906) the defendants presented to the court a written motion or petition praying the court to open the default and to allow them to plead. The motion set up, as reasons why the default should be opened, that J. E. Maddox, one of the members of the firm, had charge of this particular kind of business; that when he was served the copies were laid upon his desk, and he fully intended to file proper pleadings by way of defense; that at that time J. E. Maddox was sick, barely able to be at his office or attend to business, and he forgot the papers lying on his desk; that important matters of business called him to New York, and during his absence the papers became misplaced and there was nothing to remind him of them on his return; that defendant's attorney was also sick at that time, for which reason defendants failed to file proper demurrers, pleas, and answers; that J. J. Maddox, the senior member of the firm, was also in bad health and was unable to attend to any business; and that defendants had a meritorious defense, were ready to plead instantler, and announced ready to proceed with the trial. This petition to open the default was heard at the March term in open court, the defendants introducing an affidavit substantiating its allegations. The plaintiff accepted the recitals therein as true and undisputed, and offered no evidence. The court thereupon passed an order opening the default and allowing defendants to file their plea, answer, or demurrer to plaintiff's petition, upon payment of costs; and this action of the court is one of the exceptions of plaintiff in error. Upon the showing made the court might either have refused to grant the petition or have granted it and allowed the default to be opened. Civ. Code 1895, § 5072, provides that: "At the trial term the judge in his discretion, upon payment of costs, may allow the default to be opened for providential cause preventing the filing of a plea, or for excusable neglect, or where the judge from all the facts shall determine that a proper case has been made for the default to be opened on terms to be fixed by the court. In order to allow the default to be thus opened, the showing shall be made under oath, shall set up a meritorious defense, shall offer to plead instantler, and announce ready to proceed with the trial." There was, for some time after the passage of the act of 1895, doubt as to whether there were any terms upon which a default could be opened after the trial term. We think it now well settled that a default cannot be opened after the trial term has passed. Deering Harvester Co. v. Thompson, 116 Ga. 419, 42 S. E. 772. But at the trial term, both by the terms of the statute as well as by numerous decisions, it is left a matter wholly within the discretion of the trial judge whether he will open the default at the trial term, provided always that the conditions required by section 5072 be complied with. And by special act the provisions applicable to judges of the superior court are made applicable to the city court of Atlanta in the matter of opening defaults. Acts 1902, p. 117.

The defendants further insisted that the entry made by the judge did not put the case in default. The consideration of this contention is of no great moment, inasmuch as we hold that the judge did not err in opening the default. But we think that the entry made by the judge was a perfectly good judgment by default, and, if it had not been opened, would have entitled the plaintiffs to take a verdict at the trial term. It is better practice to make entry on the docket by using the words "in default," as prescribed by section 5069; but as the entries on the bench docket have been held to be mere memoranda for the information and guidance of the judge and for his special use, we are of the opinion that the abbreviation "Def't" was just as intelligible, and equally as effective to inform the court at the trial term that the defendant had not filed any defense at the appearance term, as if the words "in default" had been written out in full. The wording of section 5072 is such that it conveys very ample powers as to opening defaults—not only providential cause, which is broad, and excusable neglect, which is still broader, but finally, as if reaching out to take in every conceivable case where injustice might result if the default were not opened, the section goes on to say, "Where the judge from all the facts shall determine that a proper case has been made," etc. We cannot say that the learned trial judge abused the discretion, as insisted by plaintiff in error. It is true that in Cannon v. Harrold, 61 Ga. 158, it was held that a motion to vacate a judgment by default, on the ground that defendant was sick and could not put in his plea, was properly overruled; no reason being shown why the plea was not filed before the trial term. In Athens L. M. Co. v. Myers, 98 Ga. 397, 25 S. E. 508, it was held that it was not error to refuse to set aside a judgment by default, made at the same term at which the judgment was rendered, where no defense had been made to the act on account of the gross negligence of the defendant or his counsel, though defendant's showing contained allegations which might have constituted a good defense. In W. U. Tel. Co. v. Lark, 95 Ga. 806, 23 S. E. 118, a refusal to allow a default opened, where the motion was made upon the ground that a plea had been sent by mail to the clerk in time to be filed at the first term, was upheld. But all of these cases were decided prior to the passage of the act of 1895, now embodied in Civ. Code 1895, § 5072. We apprehend the true rule for the exercise of the discretion conferred by section 5072 to be laid down in Brucker v. O'Connor, 115 Ga. 95, 41 S. E. 245: "While this section gives to the judge a broad discretion, it does not mean that he can act arbitrarily, but that he may exercise a sound and legal discretion. It does not give him authority to open a default capriciously or for fanciful or insufficient reasons. Excusable neglect does not mean gross negligence. It does not mean a willful disregard of the process of the court, but refers to cases where there is a reasonable excuse for failing to answer. The Code gives a judge no authority to open a default, after the term has passed, for reasons that fall short of a reasonable excuse for the negligent failure to answer." See, also, Kellam v. Todd, 114 Ga. 981, 41 S. E. 39, and Ingalls v. Lamar, 115 Ga. 296, 41 S. E. 573. But while this court might, in the first instance, have refused to open the default on the showing made in this case, the law has such regard for and confidence in the proper exercise of discretionary powers of those of its ministers to whom it commits such authority that every presumption is against the abuse of this trusted discretion. We will not say, therefore, that the judge erred when he determined "that a proper case had been made for the default to be opened."

After the opening of the default the defendants demurred to the plaintiff's petition. In addition to general demurrer, defendants demurred specially upon the ground that plaintiff alleged no demand for the property, the value of which he sought to recover, because his petition shows that he has never paid the debt which he alleged he owed the defendant and to secure which he surrendered the property to defendants, and because, under the allegations of plaintiff's petition, the suit is really a petition for an accounting, of which the city court of Atlanta had no jurisdiction. Upon the consideration of the petition we think the court did not err in sustaining these demurrers; no amendments of the petition being offered.

Judgment affirmed.

(1 Ga. App. 338)

HOLMES & CO. v. POPE & FLEMING.
(No. 55.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. March 1, 1907.)

1. GARNISHMENT—PROCEDURE.

Subject to a few exceptions (as, for instance, as to torts which a garnishee may have committed against a defendant), a judgment creditor may by garnishment acquire a control over the choses in action of the defendant, and thereby in effect bring suit against his debtor's debtor; and, though by garnishment the creditor may stand in the debtor's shoes as to choses in action, he enjoys the privilege cum onere.

2. SAME—PROPERTY SUBJECT.

For the converse is likewise true: "Creditors cannot reach by garnishment any assets which the debtor himself could not recover from the garnishee." Tim v. Franklin, 13 S. E. 259, 87 Ga. 95. "What one cannot recover himself cannot be recovered by garnishment against him." Bates v. Forsyth, 69 Ga. 365.

3. SAME.

Consequently, as to a fund in the hands of a garnishee to be advanced under a contract and in pursuance thereof and held for one special purpose only, as the debtor cannot compel its payment to other purposes foreign to the contract, neither can the garnishing creditor extend his rights beyond those of the defendant.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 24, Garnishment, §§ 94, 102-104.]

4. SAME—SET-OFF BY GARNISHEE.

As to assets in the hands of a garnishee belonging to a nonresident of this state, such garnishee is entitled to set off any indebtedness owed by said nonresident defendant in garnishment, even though such indebtedness be not due. The question as to whether such garnishee is or is not indebted to the nonresident defendant, or has assets of such defendant in his hands, should be ascertained by a comparison of their respective claims, and answer made accordingly. Civ. Code 1895, § 3755.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Richmond County; Eve, Judge.

Action by Holmes & Co. against A. M. Calhoun, with garnishment on Pope & Fleming. Judgment for garnishees, and plaintiffs bring error. Affirmed.

C. P. Pressley, for plaintiffs in error. W. H. Fleming, for defendants in error.

RUSSELL, J. Holmes & Co. sued out an attachment against A. M. Calhoun as a nonresident, and served a summons of garnishment on Pope & Fleming, who filed an answer denying the indebtedness. The plaintiffs in attachment traversed the answer of the garnishees, and at the conclusion of the evidence the court directed a verdict in favor of the answer of the garnishees and against the traverse of the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs made a motion for new trial, which was overruled, and the overruling of this motion is the error assigned here.

A motion to dismiss the writ of error was duly presented here, and will be first considered. The motion is as follows: (1) "Because there is no sufficient assignment of error, the only assignment of error being the following recital in the bill of exceptions, namely: 'To which order of Judge Eve, overruling said motion [for new trial] and denying said new trial, the said John F. Holmes & Co. did then and there except and assign the same as error.' From their recital it does not appear upon which one or more of the grounds of motion for a new trial assignment of error is predicated, nor does it appear that plaintiff in error made any exception to the said ruling at the time of presenting the bill of exceptions." (2) Because the grounds of motion for new trial were certified as true, "subject to correction at the hearing," and it does not appear that said grounds were subsequently approved without qualification. (3) Because the brief of evidence contains only a brief of the oral testimony, and does not embrace in any form any of the written documentary evidence introduced at the trial; the said written documentary evidence being included as part of the transcript of the record, and not in the brief where it legally belonged.

We find no merit in this motion. The assignment of error is sufficient under numerous rulings of the Supreme Court. "A motion for a new trial being based upon several grounds distinctly set forth therein, an assignment of error in a bill of exceptions that the court erred in overruling the motion is sufficiently plain and specific in setting forth the errors complained of, under the act of November 11, 1889." Gray v. Phillips, 88 Ga. 199, 14 S. E. 205. See, also, Hardison v. Burr, 73 Ga. 125; Erskine v. Duffy, 76 Ga. 602; Futch v. State, 90 Ga. 472, 16 S. E. 102. The second ground for motion to dismiss is because the grounds of the motion for new trial were certified as true, subject to correction at the hearing. This ground of motion to dismiss is obliterated by the positive statement in the bill of exceptions that the recitals of fact contained in the motion for new trial are true and correct. There is no merit in the third ground of the motion to dismiss. While the documentary evidence should always be briefed, it appears from the approved brief of evidence that the rule was substantially complied with in this case. And it is "unlawful * * * to dismiss any case for any want of technical conformity to the statutes or rules regulating the practice, * * * where there is enough in the bill of exceptions or transcript of the record presented, or both together, to enable the court to ascertain substantially the real questions in the case," etc. Civ. Code 1895, § 5569. In this case the full copies may be treated as mere surplusage. Rudolph v. Underwood, 88 Ga. 665, 16 S. E. 55 (9). "Where the bill of exceptions and the judge's certificate both conform to the act of 1889 for bringing cases to this court, and the error complained of is the overruling of a motion for new trial, the writ of error will not be dismissed because this court may be of opinion that some parts of the record specified are not material."

For another reason the motion to dismiss is not well taken. "It appears that the brief was agreed upon as correct by counsel for both the movant and the respondent in the motion for a new trial, and the bill of exceptions states affirmatively that this brief was approved by the court and ordered filed. The record also discloses that the motion for a new trial was heard and determined without objection of any kind to the brief of the evidence. In other words, it was, at the hearing, treated by the respondent as coming up to all the legal requirements. In view of these facts, it was too late for him, after the motion for a new trial had been heard upon its merits, to raise any question as to the form of the brief, or to make complaint that it was not duly filed." It is not the policy of our law to favor dismissal, but rather its constant aim to reach substantial justice without undue regard to mere technicalities. A motion to dismiss is not the proper manner or the remedy to compel compliance with Civ. Code 1895, § 5528. See sections 5568, 5569; Rudolph v. Underwood, 88 Ga. 665, 16 S. E. 55; Southern M. Co. v. Brown, 107 Ga. 264, 33 S. E. 73; Pullen v. State, 116 Ga.

555, 42 S. E. 774. As held by this court in Brawner v. Maddox, 1 Ga. App. 332, 58 S. E. 278, a writ of error will not be dismissed if the bill of exceptions and the record disclose what may be material to a clear understanding of the errors complained of. In this case, while it was improper to have sent up full copies of the documentary evidence, the court is fully and clearly apprised by the brief of evidence of everything material therein, and the full copies can well be treated as surplusage, the costs of which, in case of reversal, might be taxed against the plaintiff in error, but which do not require the severe penalty of dismissal. The motion to dismiss the writ of error is therefore refused.

On the trial of this case it appeared that Mrs. Calhoun, against whom a judgment was rendered on an attachment as a nonresident, had procured a loan of money from the garnishees, Pope & Fleming, and that a balance of said loan was still in the hands of Pope & Fleming. This sum Holmes & Co. sought to reach by process of garnishment. It further appeared that the fund in the hands of Pope & Fleming was part of a loan advanced for one specific purpose, to wit, to aid Mrs. Calhoun in her farming operations—assist her to produce a crop of cotton, which, as was contracted, should afterwards be handled and sold upon commission by Pope & Fleming as cotton factors. Not only was the money to be used for only one purpose, but there was a benefit in the contract to Pope & Fleming, who were to receive commission on a fixed number of bales of cotton to be raised by Mrs. Calhoun and to be handled by them. The consideration inducing the loan was less affected by the interest on the money than by the larger commissions on the cotton to be delivered, and the single purpose for which the money was advanced was to aid in raising that crop. In their amended answer the garnishees claim that there was no indebtedness on their part subject to garnishment, for the following reasons: "Mrs. Calhoun is a nonresident of the state of Georgia, as appears from the affidavit on which the attachment was sued. On the date when the summons of garnishment was served, and continuously and up to and beyond the date of filing the answer, to wit, July 3, 1905, Mrs. Calhoun was indebted to Pope & Fleming on the note for $524.89, dated March 24, 1905, due November 1, 1905. The largest amount of money owed by Pope & Fleming to said Mrs. Calhoun at any time from the service of the summons of garnishment on May 10, 1905, was $500, the amount which they agreed to advance for the express purpose of raising crops on the plantation in South Carolina, on which crops Pope & Fleming had a lien for the repayment of said money, and which sum was placed to her credit on March 24, 1905; and on July 3, 1905, the balance due as shown by the books was $72.30, Pope & Fleming having paid out on drafts the following sums: $200, April 17, 1905; $225, May 6, 1905; $270, June 6, 1905. Mrs. Calhoun was also indebted to Pope & Fleming in the sum of $75 under a written contract to send Pope & Fleming, as commission merchants, for sale, all the crop of cotton, not less than 50 bales, which was to be raised by Mrs. Calhoun on said plantation; and, in the event the 50 bales were not sent in whole or in part, a payment of $1 per bale was to be made for the deficiency. At the date of filing the answer to said garnishment on July 3, 1905, the crops on said plantation had not matured, and the expense of making and gathering the same had not been paid, and hence the purpose for which the money was advanced under the terms of the contract above referred to had not been performed, and a diversion of the whole or any part of said money by Mrs. Calhoun, or the seizure thereof by any creditor, would necessarily have been an injury to Pope & Fleming, and would have prevented the fulfillment of said contracts." Holmes & Co. traversed the answer of the garnishees. On that issue trial was had, and the evidence introduced by the plaintiff fully sustained all the material allegations of fact contained in the answer of the garnishees. The judge directed a verdict against the traverse and in favor of the garnishees. Holmes & Co. filed a motion for new trial, which was overruled, and they excepted.

We think there was no error in refusing a new trial, because the verdict was demanded under the evidence by either one of two legal reasons: The money, which Pope & Fleming were still due to Mrs. Calhoun under the contract, was to be advanced only for one special purpose beneficial to them; and, secondly, the defendant being indebted to them on a note, they were entitled to apply any amount they might be due her toward the payment of their note, although it was not due, because she was a nonresident. Generally a judgment creditor may acquire by garnishment a control over the choses in action of the defendant, and thereby in effect bring suit against his debtor's debtor; but there are many exceptions to this rule, for there are cases in which a creditor may enforce claims where the debtor could not, and, conversely, the debtor may proceed where the creditor could not. Secret liens and fraudulent deeds may bind the one and be ineffective against the other. On the other hand, the debtor may sue for torts; but the creditor cannot make such a cause of action available even by a process of garnishment. Williams v. Williams, 122 Ga. 180, 50 S. E. 52, 106 Am. St. Rep. 100. But where by garnishment the creditor is placed in the shoes of the debtor as regards the garnishee, he enjoys that privilege in connection with the burdens of the position; for what the debtor cannot recover he cannot reach. The fund in the hands of Pope & Fleming, if subject to be advanced to Mrs. Calhoun without limitation, could be reached by Holmes & Co. But as the uncontradicted evidence showed that hirer, such person is, on conviction, to be punished as a common cheat and swindler. This is the distinct class of those who get the money on the faith of the contract, but never set to work. The fraudulent intent antedates the contract. The second class is composed of those who, after making a contract, procure money or other thing of value with intent not to perform the service. This includes all those who, being already under contract, then conceive the fraudulent intent. The fraudulent intent must antedate the full performance of the contract, but need not have existed before the contract. The statute makes two distinct offenses, and the defendant is entitled to know whether he is charged with both, or one of them, and, if only one, which one he is required to answer. And he should be so charged in the accusation as to enable him to prepare his defense. It appears, from the accusation, that this defendant was only charged with the second offense in the act—cheating and swindling after the contract was made.

The accusation alleges that "after having contracted with M. A. Klias to perform labor for him as a farm laborer, by entering into a contract with said Mathew Klias to work a crop on halves with him for the year 1906, * * * did, with the intent not to perform said labor, procure from said Mathew Klias the sum of $55.70 in money, did without any excuse fail to perform said labor, thereby damaging and injuring the said M. A. Klias in the sum of $55.70," etc. The prosecutor testified that the defendant contracted with him in December, 1905, to work with him and to run a one-horse farm on halves on his (the prosecutor's) place for the year 1906; that the defendant moved on the prosecutor's place in January, 1906, made his crop, and laid it by; and the prosecutor had no cause of complaint as to the defendant's working the crop, but he would not gather his crop as he should have done. Defendant and his family gathered some of the crop, but would not gather it all, and witness had to employ cotton pickers to gather some of it. On December 22, 1906, defendant moved off prosecutor's place, and left 500 or 600 pounds of seed cotton in the field. Prosecutor furnished defendant, on the faith of the contract of labor, $5 a month in cash from January to August, paid W. J. Kidd $10, and Dr. Griffin $22, for the defendant, and furnished to the defendant merchandise and other things (of which he had an account on his books at home). The total amount furnished to the defendant, including the money advanced, was about $200. Prosecutor further testified that defendant made 4 bales of cotton, the cotton seed therefrom, and 75 bushels of corn, one-half of which, under their contract, belonged to defendant; but witness got all of this, and, after he gave him this credit, defendant still owed him $55.70, and moved of his place owing him. The warrant put in evidence showed that it was sworn out on February 4, 1907. The defendant stated that he and his family gathered all the crop in the fall that they could gather; that out of the four bales of cotton the prosecutor only let him have $3 to buy provisions, and did not let him use any of the corn for bread; and that the prosecutor would not let him have bread out of the field, nor furnish him with money with which to buy food. He stated that he completed his contract and gathered all of the crop before he moved away, about Christmas, 1906.

The objections to the accusation were waived by the joinder of issue, and cannot be considered; and we will not consider the exceptions in regard to the different initials and name by which the prosecutor was designated in the accusation, because (if Mathew Klias and M. A. Klias are not one and the same man) the fact that the accusation sets forth that defendant entered into a contract with Mathew Klias and concludes that M. A. Klias was injured would have afforded good ground for general demurrer, as setting forth no offense, inasmuch as a prosecution under the act of 1903 will not lie for injury to any one except the hirer.

We think the court erred in refusing a new trial upon the eighth ground of the motion. The court allowed the witness Klias to testify, and admitted in evidence, over the defendant's objection, the statement from that witness, that he had furnished merchandise and other advances, which, together with the money furnished, amounted approximately to $200, and, after receiving all of the crop made by defendant and crediting him with it, it still left defendant indebted to him $55.70. The objection insisted on at the time was that this evidence was illegal, irrelevant, and inadmissible. We think that the objection is well taken. It was certainly irrelevant, to the charge made in the accusation (that the defendant had procured $55.70 in money at one certain time with fraudulent intent), to prove anything in regard to "merchandise and other articles" furnished at various other times. The evidence was illegal, because irrelevant and inadmissible, and because it plainly established the fact that the subject-matter of the prosecutor's evidence was the unpaid balance of an indebtedness running through an entire year, for which the prosecution could not be maintained, instead of being an amount of money alleged to have been illegally procured by means of a fraudulent intention formed at a particular time. It is very plain to us that the objection to the evidence should have been sustained; and, if this evidence be rejected, there is none upon which the judgment of guilty can rest. The excuse given by the cropper in this case for even his temporary absence from the farm was good—that he is a father, and his family had to have food, and his employer failed to furnish it, and even refused to let him have corn from the field for bread. And this statement was uncontradicted, even by the prosecutor. But as the court did not believe it, we will, for the purpose of the case, eliminate it from the record. Lamar v. Prosser, 121 Ga. 154, 48 S. E. 977. This statute was not intended to provide a means of an accounting and to secure effectual settlement by laborers and croppers at the end of the year. The dread of a criminal sentence is more effective than a worthless fl. fa. The hirer cannot take advancements which may have been procured by his employé with an honest intention to perform service, and to those add advancements fraudulently procured, and, by striking a balance, assume that the balance is the amount procured in fraud by the defendant. The intent to defraud must exist at some particular time, and with reference to some particular advancement. It can exist as to more than one transaction, but, in that event, is a distinct offense, and must be so charged and proved.

Failure to return the money is one of the circumstances from which, by the terms of the second section of the act, the intention to cheat may be presumed, and failure to perform labor is another; and yet both of these, by the very terms of the statute, may be nullified, if the employé had good and sufficient cause for neither paying nor working. The statute was not intended to enforce contracts, or collect debts uncollectible by ordinary process. If, by reason of sickness or other unavoidable cause, the contract of labor cannot be performed, nor the money repaid, neither the nonpayment of the debt nor the failure to work raises the presumption of a fraudulent intent. The hirer must show loss or damage resulting from the particular fraudulent transaction upon which the prosecution is based—either partial or total loss of the money he advanced, or the labor he lost; but that is merely for the reason that the offender is deemed a common cheat and swindler, and it is elementary that there can be no cheating without proof of loss. The offense cannot be proved, therefore, without proof of loss and damage. But proof of loss and damage will not alone suffice to establish guilt. For instance, in the present case, if the defendant had acted, with regard to the cultivation of his crop, in the manner that the prosecutor testified that he did, and hail or wind, or a cloudburst, had destroyed it, the hirer's loss would have been far greater than (without giving the cropper any credit for his cotton seed) he estimated it to be, and yet no one would seriously insist that the mere procuring of money and advances, the failure to perform service or to repay the money with interest, no matter what was the hirer's loss, would render the defendant guilty of cheating and swindling.

The state alleged that $55.70 was procured with fraudulent intent, as the transaction on which it planted its case. It was obliged to select a certain definite transaction (unless it preferred, either in the same or in different counts, to charge more than one) in which the defendant, with the intent of not performing the service, procured a definite sum or definite articles of value, with the definite fraudulent purpose of causing loss or damage by not repaying, and of thereby cheating the prosecutor. The legal evidence totally failed to show that the defendant ever received the amount of money alleged in the accusation at the time alleged, or at any other time within two years before the date of the accusation. This court is most reluctant in any case to set aside the verdict or the judgment of a court acting as a jury, and will never disturb such finding on the ground that it is contrary to evidence, where there is any evidence to support it; but, where there is no evidence to authorize the verdict, it is contrary to law, and must for that reason be set aside.

Judgment reversed.

EVERETT, RIDLEY & CO. v. HOLCOMB.
(No. 184.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. May 10, 1907.)

1. APPEAL—REVIEW—DISCHARGE IN BAIL-TROVER.

If a judge, after hearing evidence upon a petition for discharge in bail-trover proceedings, shall find that the applicant is, under the provisions of Civ. Code 1896, § 4608, entitled to be discharged upon his own recognizance, and there is some evidence to support that finding, it will not be set aside by this court, unless the discretion of the judge is manifestly abused.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, §§ 4020, 4028.]

2. ARREST—BAIL-TROVER—RELEASE.

While the provisions of the Code in bail-trover proceedings contemplate imprisonment in jail, the defendant may petition to be released from any detention against his will by a sheriff or his deputy by virtue of proper bail process.

3. SAME—SHERIFF'S RETURN—TRAVERSE.

In proceedings based upon such a petition, a traverse to the sheriff's return upon the bail process is too late, if filed after pleading to the merits.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Sandersville; Hyman, Judge.

Action by Everett, Ridley & Co. against J. H. Holcomb. From an order discharging defendant on his own recognizance, plaintiffs bring error. Affirmed.

R. Douglas Feagin, for plaintiffs in error.
A. R. Wright and T. W. Hardwick, for defendant in error.

CANN, J. On August 23, 1905, J. H. Holcomb, in the name of his wife, M. C. Holcomb, transferred in writing to Everett, Ridley & Co. certain open accounts due her. On November 2, 1906, Everett, Ridley & Co. brought trover against J. H. Holcomb therefor, alleging that they had delivered to him the said accounts, to collect, and to turn over the proceeds as fast as collected. Demand was alleged to have been made upon him November 13, 1905, April 7, 1906, and October 26, 1906. The value of the property was stated to be $1,250. On November 3, 1906, the sheriff made his return that he had served the petition and process, and executed the bail process, "by arresting the said J. H. Holcomb, and have him now in custody." On the same day J. H. Holcomb petitioned, in proper form, the judge of the city court of Sandersville for discharge from imprisonment, and thereupon the judge issued a rule for Everett, Ridley & Co. to show cause why the defendant should not be discharged. On December 4, 1906, Everett, Ridley & Co. waived the five-day notice required by the statute, and agreed that the hearing be had on December 7, 1906. The hearing was held in conformity with this agreement, without any traverse of the sheriff's return until after pleading to the merits of the application for discharge. During the hearing the defendant testified that he was not able to give a solvent bond for $2,500, as required; that he had no property or money; that neither Everett, Ridley & Co., nor any one for them, had put in his hands for collection the accounts alleged; that he had not held them for collection for Everett, Ridley & Co.; that he had not been in possession, custody, or control of those accounts; that he was not, at the time of the hearing of the application for discharge, in possession, custody, or control of them, and was not on October 31, 1906, the day the affidavit for bail was made, and has not been since; that he has no money in his possession arising from the collection of those accounts; that he has no money of Everett, Ridley & Co.; that he was in custody at the time he made application for discharge, and has been in the custody of the sheriff ever since; that the deputy sheriff, in whose charge he was, did not permit him to go anywhere he wanted to. R. H. White, a witness for the plaintiffs, testified that he was a member of the firm of Everett, Ridley & Co.; that the affidavit for bail was true in every particular; that the defendant had possession of the property when he went to see him in November; that the defendant had the custody of M. C. Holcomb's stock and books; that he has never known of anybody else having custody of the property; that on April 7, 1906, he went to see the defendant as the agent of his wife, M. C. Holcomb, and asked him to deliver to Everett, Ridley & Co. those accounts, and that the defendant did not at that time deny the title of Everett, Ridley & Co. to them; that he said he did not consider those he had not collected worth anything; that he admitted having the accounts in his possession in April, 1906; that in March, 1906, he wrote Holcomb something regarding them, and had his letters here; that he knew personally, from having talked with the defendant, that he had collected some of those accounts; that he saw defendant November 13, 1906; that Holcomb made a statement at that time as to what accounts he had collected, and showed White a list of the accounts he had collected; that he did not deliver to White the money he had collected for them; that White made a demand upon him for the money, and the response Holcomb made to the demand was that he did not have it and could not deliver it; that as to the other accounts he gave White very little satisfaction, and told him some of them were not worth anything, that the ones he had collected were all that were worth anything, and declined to deliver the accounts; that the mercantile business of M. C. Holcomb was terminated some time prior to the witness' visit in April, 1906, about January, 1906; that J. H. Holcomb said he had possession of those accounts since that time; that up to the time of his demand, April 7, 1906, the witness presumed that M. C. Holcomb had signed the transfer of the accounts from herself to Everett, Ridley & Co. The sheriff, a witness for Everett, Ridley & Co., testified that he took the defendant in charge; that the defendant was partly imprisoned at the jail, but was not locked in a cell, because he had no cell to lock him in; that he was in custody; that he was permitted to go home the day he was arrested, and was put in the charge of a deputy living some distance from the county seat. The deputy was not in Sandersville, the county seat, with the defendant, on the day of the trial. After hearing the evidence the judge discharged the defendant, J. H. Holcomb, upon his own recognizance, to appear at the January, 1907, term of the city court of Sandersville, to answer the plaintiff on the merits of the action of trover brought to that term of the court. To this judgment Everett, Ridley & Co. excepted.

1. Under Civ. Code 1895, § 4604, the property, at the time of the making of the affidavit, must be in the possession, custody, or control of the defendant, unless it affirmatively appears that, since the plaintiff's affidavit was made, the defendant has acquired the power of producing the property. Ragan v. Chicago Packing Co., 93 Ga. 712, 21 S. E. 143. There was little, if any, testimony to show definitely that either of these conditions existed. The hearing upon an application for discharge without security is a summary one to hear evidence upon the facts contained in the petition for discharge before the judge of the court in which the suit is pending, and if he should find "that the petitioner can neither give the security nor produce the property, and that the reasons for the nonproduction are satisfactory, he shall discharge the petitioner upon his own recognizance, conditioned for his appearance to answer the suit brought; otherwise, he shall recommit him to custody." Civ. Code 1895, § 4608. As was stated by Justice Simmons in Ragan v. Chicago Packing Co., supra, this provision of law "means that even if a man does obtain the possession of personal property illegally and wrongfully, and disposes of it, he may, upon being required in a proceeding of this kind to produce the property or give security therefor, be discharged if he gives the judge satisfactory reasons for his inability to do so; and it is not necessary for him to show that the property was lost by misadventure or by blameless conduct on his part. If he is unable, at the time process is sued out, to comply with the requirements of the law in regard to producing the property or giving security, and his inability to do so continues, without any fault or misconduct on his part since that time, this must be deemed a satisfactory reason." The judge is the one to determine all these issues. Unless his determination affirmatively appears to be a manifest abuse of discretion, it will not be disturbed. The bail-trover remedy is a summary and harsh one. It is in derogation of the right to personal liberty. Persons seeking to avail themselves of this remedy should be held to strict proof of the statutory requisites, and the petitioner for discharge should be treated with reasonable liberality in applying the evidence, keeping in mind the purposes intended by this law. Applying the foregoing principles, the evidence was sufficient to authorize the judgment discharging the petitioner upon his own recognition.

2. While section 4606 of the Civil Code of 1895 contemplates that the defendant shall be committed to jail, and section 4608 that he "be held in imprisonment" at the time of the petition for discharge, the sheriff testified in this case that the defendant was partly imprisoned at the jail; that, while he never locked the defendant in a cell more than he had on the day of the hearing the defendant was in jail that day; and he had not been locked in a cell "for the simple reason that he did not have one to lock him up in." The sheriff also testified that he had the defendant in custody. "Custody," in criminal law, is the same thing as "detention" in civil law, and is synonymous with "imprisonment." Rapalje & Lawrence, Law Dictionary. "Imprisonment" is the detention of a person contrary to his will. 10 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law (1st Ed.) 197. The evidence shows such custody or imprisonment as would render the sheriff liable for his discharge. The confinement or detention was against the will of defendant, by virtue of the affidavit for bail, which was sufficient legal authority. See, in this connection, Pen. Code 1895, § 106; Civ. Code 1895, § 3851. The testimony disclosed sufficient holding in imprisonment to authorize the judge to act upon the petition for discharge.

3. The traverse to the return of the sheriff was too late, as it was not submitted until after pleading to the merits. Civ. Code 1895, § 4988. It is not necessary to discuss the other grounds of error alleged, even where properly specified. If there was any error, it was not of such character as to require a reversal.

Judgment affirmed.

HILL, C. J., and RUSSELL, J., being disqualified, Judges CANN, of the Eastern circuit, and GOBER, of the Blue Ridge circuit, were designated to preside in their stead.

CEDARTOWN COTTON & EXPORT CO. v. MILES. (No. 332.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. May 24, 1907.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT—INJURIES TO SERVANT—PLEADING—PETITION.

Every petition should set forth the facts upon which the cause of action is based "plainly, fully, and distinctly," and with such certainty that the same may be understood by the defendant who is to answer them, the jury who are to ascertain the truth thereof, and the court who is to give judgment.

(a) The plaintiff is not required to set forth the evidence, either direct or circumstantial, by which he expects to establish the traversable facts alleged in the petition.

(b) The certainty required as to the allegations in a suit by a servant against his master for personal injuries occasioned by a defective instrumentality is discussed.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 39, Pleading, §§ 31, 105; vol. 84, Master and Servant, § 809.]

2. SAME.

The court erred in overruling the demurrers to the petition.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 34, Master and Servant, § 818.]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Polk County; F. A. Irwin, Judge.

Action by W. L. Miles against the Cedar-town Cotton & Export Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Bunn & Trawick, for plaintiff in error. Seaborn & Barry Wright and J. A. Wright, for defendant in error.

POWELL, J. The exception in this case is to the overruling of a demurrer to the plaintiff's petition. The petition, omitting formal parts, alleges: Paragraph 1: That defendant operates a cotton factory. Paragraph 2: That on the 15th day of July, 1905, petitioner was in the service of defendant as a card stripper. Petitioner was cleaning his card, and while cleaning the feed shaft the pulley, upon which the belts from the cylinder and from the comb run, flew off the axle, and the belt from the cylinder pulley caught petitioner's arm between the shoulder and elbow, and jerked petitioner against the card, pulled and wound his arm around and between the feed shaft and the card, and broke it in two places between the shoulder and elbow. Paragraph 3: The flying off of said pulley was due to the negligence of defendant, in that the nut and screw which held said pulley on the axle were not in their places, and the end of the axle was also broken. Said fact should have been known to the defendant, and was unknown to the plaintiff, and his injury is due to the negligence aforesaid. Paragraph 4 specifically describes the injury received. Paragraph 5: All of said injuries were due to the negligence of defendant, and could not have been averted by plaintiff by the exercise of ordinary care. Paragraphs 6 and 7 allege plaintiff's age (45 years), his earning capacity, pain, and suffering, and contain the ad damnum and usual prayers. By amendment there is added, after the word "plaintiff," in the third paragraph, the words "and could not, by the exercise of ordinary care, have been known to him."

In addition to the general demurrer, the defendant, by special demurrer, insists "that the allegations of fact set out in said petition show that the defect complained of was a patent one, and that, if plaintiff did not know the existence of the same, he could, by the exercise of ordinary care, have discovered it"; also that they do not sufficiently describe the defect complained of in said machine and the manner in which the injury was received; also, as to the third paragraph of the petition, that "the allegations in said paragraph do not show how or why said nut or screw happened to be off, who took it off, or when it was removed; said paragraph charges that the end of the axle was also broken, but there are no allegations which show that said alleged broken axle in any way caused or contributed to the injury; said paragraph does not show that plaintiff did not know about said nut and screw being out of place; the last sentence in said paragraph sets out a conclusion, and contains no averments which show how or wherein defendant was negligent"; also, as to paragraph 2, that "the allegations therein are confused, vague, indefinite, and do not put defendant on notice as to how plaintiff was injured"; also, as to paragraph 5, "that the same is too general; said paragraph contains no allegations showing negligence on part of defendant; the last clause of said paragraph is merely a conclusion of the pleader." The trial court overruled all the demurrers.

1. As to pleadings at common law it has been said on eminent and unquestioned authority (Chitty on Pl. 256): "The principle rule as to the mode of stating the facts is that they must be set forth with certainty, by which term is signified a clear and distinct statement of the facts which constitute the cause of action or ground of defense, so that they may be understood by the party who is to answer them, by the jury who are to ascertain the truth of the allegations, and by the court who are to give judgment." Our Civil Code (section 4960) requires that the plaintiff, in his petition, shall plainly, fully, and distinctly set forth his charge, ground of complaint, and demand. As construed by the courts of this state, this statutory provision requires a higher degree of certainty in pleading than was necessary at common law; but the object to be obtained is the same under both systems, to wit, that the pleadings be understood by the party, the jury, and the court. They certainly ought to be so certain and full that the court may look to the allegations of fact and know whether a cause of action is set forth or not. The plaintiff is not required to set forth the evidence, either direct or circumstantial, by which he expects to establish the traversable facts alleged in the declaration, and a demurrer cannot properly be used to compel him to do so; but all the facts necessary to be stated should be set forth plainly, and special demurrer will compel this. In negligence suits, in order that the court may determine from an inspection of the pleading whether a cause of action is set forth, each fact necessary to raise the duty and to show the specific breach thereof, or the specific wrong inflicted, should be plainly and unequivocally stated; and enough of the details of each element of the case should be set out to clearly distinguish the transaction as an actionable one, and not to leave it doubtful whether it is so or not. Many facts, especially those resting peculiarly within the knowledge of the opposite party, may be alleged in general terms; but they should be alleged as facts, not merely as legal conclusions.

In a suit by a servant against the master for an injury occasioned by a defective instrumentality, the servant should allege the facts of his employment. This usually may be done in general terms, provided the language used is sufficient to clearly distinguish his relation to the master from that of a volunteer. He should allege, also, the character of the services he was hired to perform. The allegations as to this may be general, except that they should increase in definiteness as they relate to the particular instrumentality in question, and as to this they should be sufficiently specific to show the relationship of the service to the instrumentality. It is not ordinarily necessary to allege the master's duty to furnish reasonably safe instrumentalities; for this is a matter of which the court will take judicial notice, and, if this duty be alleged at all, it may be stated, without objection, in the form of a legal conclusion. Things of which the courts take ex officio notice need not be specially pleaded. Chitty, Pl. 236. He should also set out a definite description of the instrumentality in question; and more details are required when the instrumentality is not a simple and well-known contrivance than when it consists of something that people generally, from their common knowledge, understand in detail without elaboration of description. However, it is not necessary to go into details of description, except so far as may be necessary to show the relation of the instrumentality to the duties of the servant, to the specific mode of the injury, to the exact nature of the defect, to the negligence of the master, to the lack of contributory negligence of the servant, or to some other essential element of the case. The defect in the instrumentality should also be set forth with similar certainty, and it should appear whether the defect was latent or patent. This should be shown by facts stated, and not by mere conclusions of the pleader. The facts should disclose the proximate cause of the defect as a cause of the injury. The master's actual or constructive knowledge must appear. If the allegation be that the master knew of the defect, this may be simply and directly stated, and it is not necessary to state how or why he knew it. If constructive knowledge be charged to the master, and the facts stated in the petition make a case where by law the duty of knowing is imposed upon the master, the legal conclusion "that he ought to have known" is not subject to objection; but if the duty of knowing does not arise as a matter of law from the facts already stated, then the specific circumstances creating the duty of knowing must be detailed. See Babcock v. Johnson, 120 Ga. 1034, 48 S. E. 438. Also the servant's lack of knowledge must appear. As to this, the allegation that the servant "did not know" of a defect is a statement of fact and is sufficient as alleging actual lack of knowledge. Freedom from implied knowledge can be alleged in the form of a legal conclusion only when the facts set forth show such a state of circumstances as to relieve the plaintiff from such an imputation; otherwise the court will disregard the legal conclusion and give judgment on the facts actually stated. If the plaintiff relies upon his tender years, his inexperience, a false sense of security occasioned by misrepresentations of the master, the latent character of the defect, or other reason regarded by the law as sufficient to relieve the servant from implication of knowledge, the facts should be definitely stated. The details of how the injury occurred should, of course, be specifically set forth. So far as they illustrate the character of the defect in the instrumentality, the master's negligence, or the servant's freedom from fault, they should be more specific than wherein they are merely collateral to the salient legal elements of the case. The sum of the whole matter is that the petition should set out plainly and distinctly, by allegations of facts, an unequivocal cause of action. If the facts as alleged also reasonably tend to establish some defense which would defeat the action, enough additional facts must be set out to negative this defense. But the petition need not anticipate a defense which the facts alleged do not disclose. Of course, these suggestions are not intended to be considered as exhaustive. There are many other matters to be regarded. We are merely trying to stress the point that the pleader should make his necessary allegations plain, definite, and unequivocal, and that he may be compelled by demurrer to do so, but that, when he has done this, he cannot be compelled by special demurrer to go further and allege details which might be valuable to the opposite party in the preparation of his defense, and that it is not required that the pleader set forth the evidence by which he expects to prove the allegations so made.

2. Applying these rules to the petition in the present case, we think that it is deficient in certainty. The description of the machine at which the plaintiff was working is very indefinite. The court cannot say, from what is set out, whether the defect was latent or patent, or whether the fact that the end of the axle was broken had any relation to the injury. The plaintiff relies upon constructive notice on the master's part as to the absence of a nut and screw, without alleging that the nut and screw, which were not in their places, were left off by the master, or that they had been off such a length of time to charge him with notice. He alleges the conclusion that by ordinary care he himself could not have known of their absence, without showing any facts on which to base this conclusion. So far as the petition discloses, the defect was patent. We recognize the rule that if the defect was latent the master would be ordinarily held bound to discover the fact sooner than the servant, since the duty of inspection rests on the master and not on the servant; but the allegations are not sufficient to justify an application of this rule. Every fact alleged in this petition might be true, and the master not be liable. Unless the plaintiff amends his petition and cures these defects, it should be dismissed.

Judgment reversed.

FERRY & CO. v. MATTOX & TURNER.

(No. 82.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. May 28, 1907.)

1. PARTNERSHIP—JUDGMENT—INDIVIDUAL LIABILITY.

Judgment against a partnership binds, not only the firm property, but, when that is exhausted, it binds the individual assets of the partners served. A judgment need not be rendered against the individual members of a partnership in order to bind individual assets. "A judgment against a copartnership binds not only the partnership property, but also the individ-al property of each member of the same who has been served with the process; but it does not bind, and execution issuing thereon cannot be levied on, the individual property of one not served." Ellis v. Bone, 71 Ga. 469.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 38, Partnership, § 438.]

2. SAME—PARTNERSHIP DEBTS.

A partner's separate property is bound alike by all judgments against him, whether they be judgments against him as an individual or judgments against him as a partner. As to the proceeds of partnership property, an equity among the partners themselves requires that this property be applied first to the payment of partnership debts, and it works in such a way as to give debts against the partnership a preference over debts against a partner, in respect to that partner's interest in the partnership effects. Hoskins v. Johnson, 24 Ga. 630.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 38, Partnership, § 438.]

3. SAME—SERVICE ON PARTNER.

Service on a partner is service on the firm. Notice to a partner is notice to the firm.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Elbert County; H. M. Holden, Judge.

Action by D. M. Ferry & Co. against Mattox & Turner. Judgment for plaintiffs. From an order overruling a certiorari and rendering final judgment, plaintiffs bring error. Reversed.

Z. B. Rogers, for plaintiffs in error. I. C. Van Duzer, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. Suit was brought in a justice's court by D. M. Ferry & Co. against the firm of Mattox & Turner. The summons was directed to the firm of Mattox & Turner. There was an acknowledgment of service in these words: "I acknowledge service on the within summons, and waive all other service of any kind. [Signed] Mattox & Turner, per J. R. Mattox." This was the only service of the summons that was ever had. When the case came on for trial before the justice of the peace, that magistrate entered up judgment against the firm of Mattox & Turner, and against John R. Mattox and M. W. Turner as individuals. Mattox & Turner certiorated to the superior court, and the judge of the superior court overruled the certiorari and denied a new trial, but, in doing so, rendered a judgment finally disposing of the case, to which D. M. Ferry & Co. excepted. The judgment of the judge of the superior court overruled the certiorari, but corrected the judgment entered by the justice of the peace upon the verdict of the jury, so as to make it bind nothing but the partnership assets (if any) of Mattox & Turner. His judgment was as follows: "After hearing the within certiorari and argument thereon, and after considering the same, it is ordered that the same be refused and a new trial of the case be denied. It is ordered, further, that the plaintiffs recover of the defendants, Mattox & Turner, the sum of _____ dollars, costs of this proceeding. It is ordered that the judgment rendered in the justice's court have the effect of binding the partnership assets of the firm of Mattox & Turner, and that said verdict and judgment operate only against said assets, and that portion of the judgment against J. R. Mattox and M. W. Turner as individuals is stricken from said judgment." The plaintiffs in error except only to that portion of the judgment which orders that the justice's court judgment operate only against assets of the firm of Mattox & Turner, and strikes J. R. Mattox and M. W. Turner as individuals from the judgment. The defendants in error, who were the petitioners in the petition for certiorari, have not filed any cross-bill of exceptions, and hence we have only two questions to decide: (1) Did the court err in adjudging that the judgment against a partnership should bind only partnership assets? (2) Did the court err in striking that portion of the judgment rendered against J. R. Mattox and M. W. Turner as individuals?

We think that the court erred in declaring in his final judgment that the judgment rendered previously in the justice's court should only bind partnership assets. It is well settled that, when partnership assets are exhausted, the individual property of the partners served become liable for partnership debts. This is true, even if there be no service on all of the partners. As to the second question, we think that the court erred in part, and that his judgment was partly right. There was no error in ordering that M. W. Turner be stricken from the judgment, because he was not served with copy summons, nor did he acknowledge service; but we think that the judgment should bind the property of J. R. Mattox, and that it was error to strike the portion of the judgment binding him as an individual. Service of a partner is always good service of the firm, and notice to a partner is always notice to the firm. The acknowledgment of service, which we have quoted above, was in reality a personal acknowledgment of service by Mattox, though signed "Mattox & Turner, per J. R. Mattox." He had notice of the suit. He appeared and pleaded to it. He is bound by the judgment. The plea is in the following words: "And now comes J. R. Mattox, a member of the firm of Mattox & Turner, and for plea and answer to the above suit says (1) that the said firm of Mattox & Turner is not indebted to the plaintiff in the manner and form alleged or in any manner whatever; that said Mattox & Turner is not indebted to the plaintiff in any sum whatever." And the affidavit to the plea was made by J. R. Mattox. The words "a member of the firm of Mattox & Turner" may be treated as surplusage, and that leaves it merely a plea made by Mattox. But even if he acknowledged service as a member of the firm, and only pleaded in behalf of the firm, he had notice of the suit, was in court, and not only took no steps to protect himself against the judgment, but did not even except thereto by certiorari. The question of amending the judgment was not before the superior court. It was not one of the complaints made by the petitioner, and no errors except those brought to the attention of the court can be corrected on certiorari. We think it extremely doubtful, for this reason, whether even Turner's name could have been stricken from the judgment; but, as there is no insistence as to him, we will assume that it was proper to relieve him from the binding force of the judgment. But as to Mattox the case is different. In the entire litigation he was not only personally participating in the proceedings, but he was in reality the partnership's only representative. Neither as a partner nor as an individual can he be heard to complain of the judgment in the justice's court; and, not having complained, the judge of the superior court unnecessarily afforded him a relief he had not asked.

Judgment reversed.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Greene County; H. G. Lewis, Judge.

Action by the Continental Furniture Company against Rhodes, Dolvin & Co. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Samuel H. Sibley, for plaintiff in error.
J. P. Brown, for defendant in error.

POWELL, J. This action commenced by attachment issued by the justice of the peace of the 123d district, G. M., Greene county. The affidavit recited the residence of the defendant as being in the 141st district of that county. The bond in describing the case recited that the attachment was returnable to the justice's court of the 143d district, and the attachment itself was, by the justice, made so returnable. Thereafter the plaintiff by leave of that court amended the attachment and bond by striking the words "143d district" and inserting the words "141st district." It does not appear that the security to the bond consented to this amendment. After ordering the amendment, the justice of the 143d district directed that the case be withdrawn from that court and transferred to the justice's court of the 141st district, "to which it is returnable." The statutory notice of the pendency of the attachment in the justice's court of the 141st district was given to the defendant for the purpose of recovering a personal judgment. Without objection, the parties went to trial in that court, the defendant obtained judgment, and the plaintiff appealed to the superior court. In that court the defendant assailed the pleadings by moving to dismiss the case, "upon the ground that the papers showed upon their face that the case was one regularly sued out and returned to the justice's court of the 143d district, G. M., and that the attempted amendment and transfer thereof from said named court to that of the 141st district was without authority of law and void, and said court of the 141st district was without jurisdiction to enter a confession of judgment by the plaintiff therein, and the superior court was without jurisdiction to entertain an appeal from such a confession, and further moved that the case be remanded to said court of the 143d district, as a case pending therein and undisposed of therein." The court overruled the motion and the trial resulted in favor of the plaintiff. The defendant renewed his attack by motion in arrest of judgment, on the following grounds: "Because it appears on the face of the record that said case was an attachment regularly sued out to the justice's court of the 143d district, G. M., and that the bond given was for an attachment returnable to said court, and the attachment was actually returned to said court, and the papers made a case lawfully pending therein. It appears further that said court, without consent of the defendants or of the security in the attachment bond, undertook to transfer said case to the justice's court of the 141st district, and that confession of judgment was there entered by the plaintiffs without a trial. Movants show, therefore, that said court of the 143d district was without lawful authority to enter the orders it did and to transfer said case to said court of the 141st district, and that said latter court acquired no jurisdiction thereof, and that an appeal from a judgment in said latter court invests this court with no greater jurisdiction than said justice's court had, and that there is no regular or lawful basis in the record for a judgment in this court." The court overruled the motion in arrest of judgment and also a motion for a new trial. The defendant brings error.

1. We think that neither the motion to dismiss the action nor the motion in arrest of judgment was well taken. The law fixed the jurisdiction to hear the case in the district of the defendant's residence. While an attachment should give directions for its return, still "it is not this written direction to the sheriff or constable which gives the court jurisdiction, but the law." Blake v. Camp, 45 Ga. 298. Lack of jurisdiction in the justice's court of the 143d district appeared on the face of the record, since the affidavit recited that the defendant resided in the 141st district. The justice's court of the 143d district, therefore, properly declined to assume jurisdiction of the same. Every court has jurisdiction to entertain cognizance of a matter presented to it to the extent of determining whether it has jurisdiction, and, if it finds that it has no jurisdiction, of giving directions to the matter, consistent with its lack of jurisdiction. When the justice of the peace discovered that he had violated the provisions of the statute, in returning the case to his own court, he properly refused to take jurisdiction, and his direction that it be transferred to the proper court, while probably not necessary, was an order consistent with his lack of jurisdiction. See Carreker v. Thornton, 1 Ga. App. 508, 57 S. E. 988, and citations.

At all events, the case was finally in fact filed in the proper court. In that court every amendable defect became cured by the trial and the judgment; for it is shown by the record that the defendant appeared at the trial and testified, though that trial resulted in a confession of judgment by the plaintiff. See Covington v. Cothrans, 35 Ga. 156; Blake v. Camp, 45 Ga. 298; Townsend v. Stoddard, 26 Ga. 430; Williams v. Buchanan, 75 Ga. 789; R. & D. R. Co. v. Benson, 86 Ga. 205, 12 S. E. 357, 22 Am. St. Rep. 446. It is true that the bond recited that it was given in a case returnable to the 143d district; and it may be that consent of the surety was necessary to an amendment of the bond, and even that the attempted amendment of the bond rendered it void as to him, so that it was no longer a good bond; but as to these things we give no opinion, for no attack was made upon the bond in accordance with the statutory method provided in the act of November 11, 1899. Ga. Laws 1899, p. 37. If the bond were found deficient, there would result, not a dismissal of the case, but a dismissal of the levy, and the plaintiff might have judgment notwithstanding the levy was dismissed. Lockett v. De Neufville, 55 Ga. 453; Perry v. Mulligan, 58 Ga. 479; Hodnett v. Stone, 93 Ga. 645 (2), 20 S. E. 43.

2. We think that upon the merits of the case the evidence demanded a verdict for the plaintiff. The defendant ordered a shipment of furniture from the plaintiff to be sent to him at Siloam, Ga., from High Point, N. C. It appears beyond controversy that the furniture was delivered in good order to the railroad company at High Point, and that it was damaged in transit by water leaking on it through a defect in the roof of the car. Indeed, one of the defendants, testifying as a witness, conceded: "I ordered all the furniture to be shipped in one car, and to come by railroad in the customary way. It was so shipped in the way I expected it to be." Counsel for the plaintiff in error concedes that ordinarily in such sales delivery to the carrier is delivery to the purchaser, but contends that the rule is not applicable in this case, because the shipper took from the carrier a bill of lading which contained many material exceptions from its common-law liability, though the same was not signed by the shipper. It appears that the consignors took from the railway company its "standard bill of lading." It may be true that under the law of North Carolina it is not required, as in Georgia, that the shipper sign the contract of carriage in order to make its special terms effective; but we know of no common-law rule nor of any North Carolina statute which requires a carrier to issue any other than its standard bill of lading. However, an examination of the law in North Carolina as declared by its courts will show that in that state a carrier cannot contract against its negligence. The rule there on that subject is as it is in this state. Nor is the stipulation in the bill of lading requiring the claim for damage to be filed within thirty days valid, under the laws of that state. Capehart v. Seaboard R. Co., 81 N. C. 438, 31 Am. Rep. 505. We think that delivery to the carrier may be held as delivery to the purchaser, where the carrier's standard bill of lading is accepted, in the absence of express direction from the purchaser requiring some other method of shipment, especially in the absence of any showing that the shipper had the power to compel the carrier, by whom it was mutually anticipated that the transportation was to be effected, to make any other form of contract of carriage, or that the carrier customarily issued any other form of bill of lading.

Judgment affirmed.

TERRELL v. TOMMEY. (No. 274.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. July 4, 1907.)

CERTIORARI—ERROR, WRIT OF—REVIEW—OVERRULING CERTIORARI.

Where a certiorari involves no legal principle, but on the sole ground that the judgment was not supported by the evidence challenges a judgment of the recorder or police judge of the city of Atlanta declaring the existence of a private alley, and finding that a fence or gate built across the alley interfered with the right to its use, and directing that the obstruction be abated as a nuisance, the judgment of the superior court overruling the certiorari and affirming the judgment will not be disturbed unless manifestly erroneous.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; J. T. Pendleton, Judge.

Action by G. A. Tommey against W. H. Terrell. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Mrs. Tommey filed a petition in the recorder's court of Atlanta, alleging that she was the owner and in possession of a certain lot in that city; that along the east side of the lot was an alley, which was an appurtenance to it, and which had been open and used continuously and uninterruptedly by her and her predecessors in title and possession for more than 20 years, and that the right to use the alley as a means of ingress and egress had been fully recognized and undisputed for more than 20 years, that the defendant, Terrell, had deprived her of the use of nearly half of the alley, and had prevented her from using the alley as a way of ingress and egress by constructing a gate and fence across it; and that the fence and gate so constructed across the alley were a private nuisance; and she prayed for an order requiring the defendant to abate the same. The evidence was conflicting, but there was much testimony, both documentary and oral, in support of the plaintiff's contentions. The recorder entered a judgment finding that the alley in question "is appurtenant to the property of the plaintiff," and "that she had the right to use the same for the entire length of her lot on the east side," and "that the fence and gate erected across said alley by the defendant, W. H. Terrell, is a nuisance, and that said Terrell is hereby required to abate the same within 10 days after this date by removing said fence and gate and leaving said alley open and unobstructed." To this judgment, the defendant, by his petition for certiorari, excepted on the ground that it was without evidence to support it. The judgment of the superior court, overruling the certiorari, is assigned as error.

W. H. Terrell and Edgar Latham, for plaintiff in error. Walter T. Colquitt, for defendant in error.

GAINER v. STATE (No. 480.)

1. VAGRANCY—EVIDENCE.

The fact that a party is black and ragged, and asleep at night, and has not worked for four days, although he may have no money, will not of itself authorize a conviction for vagrancy. RUCKER v. STATE. (No. 204.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. June 19, 1907.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW—NEW TRIAL.

2. SAME—INSTRUCTIONS—CONFESSIONS.

While, in the absence of a request to charge upon that subject, a trial court is not generally required to instruct the jury upon the subject of confessions, or as to their force and effect, still, where the case of the state is entirely dependent upon a confession in order to authorize a conviction, the jury should be given appropriate instructions with reference to the care with which such confessions should be considered, and they should be informed that a conviction is not authorized unless such confession be corroborated.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Hart County; H. M. Holden, Judge.

Wylie Rucker was convicted of a misdemeanor, and brings error. Reversed.

A. G. & Julian McCurry, for plaintiff in error. David W. Meadow, Sol. Gen., for the State.

RUSSELL, J. The defendant, Wylie Rucker, was convicted of the offense of a misdemeanor under Pen. Code 1895, § 122. It is alleged in the indictment that the defendant enticed, persuaded, and decoyed one George Smith, who was under a verbal contract as a farm laborer, to leave his employer, after he had actually entered the service of such employer, by offering to pay said Smith higher wages. The evidence on behalf of the state showed that George Smith was under a verbal contract, made about the 10th of May, 1904, by which he was to work for the prosecutor until Christmas, for $7 a month and his board. He worked a little over two months with his employer, and then went to work with the defendant. The prosecutor further testified that the defendant confessed to him that he had employed said George Smith, and was to give him $8.50 or $9 a month, and that he knew that the servant had actually entered the prosecutor's service and had worked over two months. It further appeared, from the evidence, that George Smith, the employé, wanted to "knock around a while," and that the prosecutor agreed to let him rest from the time they got done laying by. Under this agreement he worked with the defendant, or with his father, from the latter part of July until some time in August, and "after the vacation he came back and worked for [the prosecutor] about two weeks." The evidence for the defendant, which was uncontradicted, showed that George Smith was a minor, whose mother was living. It also appeared that the defendant made a contract with his mother for the hire of the boy, and that nothing was done to induce the boy to work with the defendant, and that he did not work with him after the defendant was informed that the boy was under contract with the prosecutor. The defendant insisted that he only boarded the boy, George Smith, for the month during laying-by time, during which his employer had given him leave of absence, and that the agreement was that he was to work for the defendant for his board.

We think the court erred in not granting the defendant a new trial. The motion for new trial was based upon the general grounds; and, in addition, it is averred that the court erred in failing to charge the jury, although not requested so to do, that "all admissions should be scanned with care and confessions of guilt should be received with great caution. A confession alone, uncorroborated by other evidence, will not justify a conviction." The movant also insisted that the court erred in failing to charge the jury the rule of law with reference to circumstantial evidence, to wit, that to warrant conviction on such evidence the proved fact must exclude every other reasonable hypothesis save that of guilt of the accused. The conviction in this case must depend entirely upon the evidence of the prosecutor that the defendant admitted to him that he persuaded the servant, George Smith, to work with him and leave his employer by offering the boy higher wages. Without this evidence the state would have no case whatever, and the essential fact contained in this statement is the very gist of the whole criminal action. Generally the court is not required to charge the jury upon the subject of confessions at all, in the absence of a written request for instructions upon that subject; but there is a distinction between a case in which the conviction may depend upon a confession or upon other evidence, and a case in which conviction, if had, must depend upon the confession alone, as in this case. In cases of the former class the confession is always more or less corroborated by the other evidence in the case. In this case there was no corroboration; and, for that reason, although the testimony as to the confession be true, it cannot support a conviction. If the state had proved that George Smith and the prosecutor made the contract alleged in the indictment, and that Smith entered into such service and left before its completion, the state would have had no case whatever against this defendant; for it would have failed absolutely to show that he enticed, persuaded, or decoyed George Smith away from such employment. As before remarked, the knowingly enticing, persuading, and decoying of the farm laborer or other servant of another constitutes the whole offense, and therefore the statement made by the defendant to the prosecutor was not a mere inculpatory admission, but a confession, and we think, therefore, that the jury should have been charged that confessions of guilt should be received with great caution and that a confession uncorroborated will not justify a conviction. "The case, at best, is close and doubtful, and it is by no means clear that the evidence warranted a conviction. It was therefore essential to the fairness of the trial that the jury should have distinctly understood that they could not lawfully convict upon a confession alone, and that it was incumbent upon them to pass on and determine the all-important question whether or not the confession, if proved to their satisfaction, was corroborated by other evidence, which in connection with the confession itself was sufficiently strong and convincing to satisfy their minds beyond a reasonable doubt of the guilt of the accused." The confession is not corroborated in this case by the corpus delicti, for the entire criminal act depends upon the confession.

We are further of the opinion that a new trial should have been granted for the reason that the evidence is insufficient to authorize conviction. Taking the confession, as proved, to be sufficiently corroborated, it nowhere appears that the defendant knew, at the time that George Smith came to his house, or at the time that he employed him, that he was under contract with the prosecutor. The most that was proved by the prosecutor upon that subject was that the defendant knew that the laborer had actually entered his service and had worked over two months. This, the prosecutor says, the defendant told him he knew; and the only evidence that the boy, George Smith, was ever at the defendant's house after the conversation between the prosecutor and the defendant, comes from the prosecutor, as being a statement made to him by a person other than the defendant. This was, of course, inadmissible against the defendant, unless the evidence had shown that the defendant was present and by his silence acquiesced in the statement made. Nothing is more vexatious, abominable, or injurious than the interference of outsiders with the servants or laborers with whom another has contracted and upon the faith of whose contract he relies to honestly fulfill his own obligations, and the laws against these violators of the public peace and comfort should be enforced. But it must be borne in mind that in this class of cases, as in every other criminal charge, the state is required to prove the guilt of the accused. And to sustain a conviction in this case this court would have to shut its eyes to the fact that it was proved, and not contradicted, that the boy, George Smith, had a mother living, and that the state produced no evidence to show how he was able to make a legal contract, and further failed to show that the defendant knew that a legal contract had been made.

It is indispensable to show, in accusations brought under section 122 of the Penal Code, that there was a legal contract and that the defendant knew it. Both of these essentials the state failed to establish. The evidence in this case is very similar to that in McAllister v. State, 122 Ga. 744, 50 S. E. 921. It is not enough to show that a defendant employed a servant who had already quit the service of his employer or had been temporarily released from such service, even though it be shown that the defendant employed such a servant by a promise of higher wages. If the servant has already left his employer, or if there was no legal contract with the former employer, he who employs such servant does not violate section 122 of the Penal Code. In the McAllister Case, above cited, the defendant sent his wagons and helped the servant, Jackson, to move his household goods, over the protest and threats of the employer. And yet the Supreme Court in that case says: "The words used in the statute, 'entice, persuade, or decoy,' indicate that there must be some word or act of incitement or inducement on the part of the defendant, whereby he influences the will of the servant so that the latter becomes dissatisfied with his employment and is allured away. That Jackson of his own volition quit the service of his employer, and was then hired by the accused and by him assisted in moving his household effects, is not enough to authorize a conviction under the statute, unless it be shown that the servant was prompted to leave his employer by the accused. But it was argued, if this is not sufficient, it will be impossible to convict any one under this statute. That may be true, but the courts cannot bend the construction of a statute in order to assist the state in making out a case if the statute does not authorize such a construction. * * * Penal statutes are to be construed strictly, and a sufficient answer to the argument ab inconvenienti is 'Ita lex scripta est.'"

Judgment reversed.

DENNARD & CO. v. BUTLER. (No. 308.)

1. POSSESSORY WARRANT—WHEN LIES.

Possessory warrant is the proper remedy to recover possession of personal property where such possession has been obtained by fraud, violence, seduction, or other like means.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 40, Possessory Warrant, § 2.]

2. SAME—EVIDENCE.

The undisputed evidence in this case clearly showing that the personal property was obtained by none of the means inhibited by the statute, but by consent, the judgment of the Error from Superior Court, Bibb County; W. H. Felton, Jr., Judge.

Action by S. E. Dennard & Co. against R. L. Butler. Judgment for plaintiff was reversed on certiorari, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

R. Douglas Feagin, for plaintiff in error.
Hardeman & Jones and E. P. Johnston, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. This was a possessory warrant sued out to recover possession of a horse. The justice decided the case in favor of the plaintiff, and the defendant filed a petition for the writ of certiorari. This was granted, and on the hearing of the certiorari the superior court entered judgment sustaining the certiorari, "upon the ground that S. E. Dennard & Co. never had possession that would entitle them to maintain a possessory warrant." Error is assigned to this judgment.

The following is a substantial statement of the facts: Dennard & Co. were livery stable keepers. They boarded a horse in the daytime for one Will Stewart, who used the horse at night to a public hack. Stewart did not pay for the board of the horse, and Dennard & Co. thereupon told him that he could not get the horse. Stewart stated that it would be impossible for him to pay the board due for the horse unless he could get him at night to use to pull his hack. He told Dennard & Co. that he could, by using the horse, keep up the current board and pay 50 cents a day on the back board. Dennard & Co. consented to let him take the horse out, with the understanding that the horse was to remain under their control and be brought back to their stable as soon as the work was done for the night. The horse had been in the stable for 8 or 10 weeks before Dennard & Co. found out that he did not belong to Stewart, but to the defendant, R. L. Butler. Butler was informed by Dennard & Co. that Stewart was not paying the board of the horse. One afternoon a negro by the name of Banks, who was driving for Stewart, came to the stable, and, with the permission of Dennard & Co., took the horse out. R. L. Butler, the owner of the horse having previously told Stewart that he wanted him back, saw him in the possession of the negro, Banks, and demanded him from the negro, who voluntarily turned him over to Butler. Possessory warrant is the remedy when any personal chattel has been taken, enticed, or carried away, either by fraud, violence, seduction, or other means, from the party complaining, or when such personal chattel having recently been in the just, peaceable, and legally acquired possession of such complaining party, has disappeared without his consent, and has been secured or taken possession of by the party complained against, under some pretended claim, or without lawful warrant or authority. Civ. Code 1895, § 4799. "Unless it clearly appears that the defendant acquired possession in one of the modes inhibited by the [statute], there is nothing for the proceeding to rest on. Under a possessory warrant there is no question as to the title or as to the right of possession, but the sole question is as to the manner in which the possession has been obtained by the defendant." Trotti v. Wyly, 77 Ga. 684; Brown v. Todd, 124 Ga. 939, 53 S. E. 678. The plaintiff could have kept possession of the horse for the enforcement of his lien as a livery stable man, but he chose not to do so, and surrendered possession of the horse to Banks, who was not his agent, but the agent of Stewart. Banks surrendered possession peaceably and voluntarily to Butler, the owner. Butler's possession was obtained by consent and without fraud, violence, seduction, or other like means. These facts being undisputed, the superior court did right in sustaining the certiorari and making a final disposition of the case.

MOSELY v. STATE. (No. 483.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. June 20, 1907.)

MASTER AND SERVANT—LABOR CONTRACT—VIOLATION—EVIDENCE.

No error of law was committed, and the evidence fully warranted the verdict.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Americus; C. R. Crisp, Judge.

Dodson Mosely was convicted of violating the labor contract act, and brings error. Affirmed.

W. M. Harper, for plaintiff in error. Zach Childers, Sol., for the State.

HILL, C. J. The defendant was convicted of a violation of what is known as the "labor contract act" of 1903. By consent, he was tried by the court without the intervention of a jury. He filed a motion for a new trial, which being refused he brought the case to this court.

The following is a substantial statement of the evidence: The accused worked for the prosecutor during the year 1906. In the fall of 1906 he asked the prosecutor for $15, who replied that he already owed him so much money which he had advanced to him during the year 1906, and that he would not be able to work it out under his contract for that year. The prosecutor told the accused that he would advance him the $15, if he would agree to work for him for such time during the year 1907, commencing January 1, 1907, as it would require to work out the sum of $62 at $11 per month, said sum of $62 including the sum of $15 then advanced, and the balance of the $62 was money the accused then owed the prosecutor, and which had been advanced to the accused by the prosecutor during the year 1906 under the contract of 1906. The accused agreed to these terms, and the prosecutor then and there advanced to the accused the $15 on the faith of such contract. The accused worked for the prosecutor on his farm the 1st day of January, 1907, and on that day drew his rations for a week, but left after that day and did not do any more work for the prosecutor, and did not return the $15 so advanced. The prosecutor advanced the $15 to the accused by giving him a check for $15 on the Planters' Bank of Americus. The failure to work for the prosecutor according to the agreement damaged him to the amount of $15 so advanced on the faith of the agreement, and the prosecutor knew of no good or sufficient cause for the failure to perform the service so contracted for. The accused in his statement admitted every fact testified to by the prosecutor, except the contract for 1907. He denied that he made such contract.

It is insisted by the plaintiff in error that the contract proved by the prosecutor is too indefinite and uncertain as to duration to support the accusation; and McCoy v. State, 124 Ga. 218, 52 S. E. 434; Presley v. State, 124 Ga. 446, 52 S. E. 750; and Watson v. State, 124 Ga. 454, 52 S. E. 751, are cited and relied upon. In these cases and in Glenn v. State, 123 Ga. 585, 51 S. E. 605, it was held that before a lawful conviction could be had for a violation of the act of 1903 there must be proof of a distinct and definite contract for service. In the McCoy Case the proof was that the accused got the money before he made the contract to perform the service. Ten dollars was advanced on the statement of the accused that he would return some time after Christmas and work for the prosecutor. At what time after Christmas he was to come back and work for the prosecutor was not stated. How long he was to work, how he was to work, whether by the day, week, month, or year, or whether he was to be paid according to the amount of work he should do, or what compensation he was to receive, was all left to conjecture. In the Presley Case the headnote is that an accusation for a violation of this act, "which fails to set forth in substance a contract definite and certain as to its terms and duration, is subject to demurrer." In the Watson Case the same ruling was made. Applying the law as declared in these cases to the case now under consideration, it will be seen they do not support the contention of the plaintiff in error, but, on the contrary, the facts here measure fully up to the requirements of the law as laid down by the Supreme Court. Here there was a definite and distinct contract. The time when service under the contract was to begin was definitely stated as January 1, 1907. The duration of the contract was definitely fixed by the words, "beginning to work January 1, 1907, and to continue work thereafter until the $62 has been worked out at $11 per month"; and the amount of compensation was to be $11 per month during the period of the contract. It did not make any difference that a part of this compensation was the payment of a debt which the accused owed the prosecutor for advances made during the year, 1906. In addition to the payment of this debt by his labor, the accused procured $15 in money from the prosecutor on his contemporaneous contract of service. If there had been nothing but the agreement to pay an existing debt due his employer, by rendering to him future services, and a failure to perform such services or to pay the debt, the offense as defined in the act of 1903 would not have been committed; but money was procured on a contract to perform services therefor. These facts constitute a violation of this act. Bridges v. State, 126 Ga. 91, 54 S. E. 916.

It is insisted in the next place that there was no proof that the accused in failing to perform the services or return the money did so "without good and sufficient cause." Unquestionably this fact is one of the material elements of the offense which the state must prove. Johnson v. State, 125 Ga. 243, 54 S. E. 184. This fact must usually be shown by the circumstances of the case. It is difficult to prove the negative by direct testimony. The prosecutor testified that he knew of no good and sufficient cause for the failure of the accused to perform his contract. The evidence showed that the accused quit work for the prosecutor after the first day, and went to work for another employer, to whom he had previously hired. If he could perform labor for another, it is fairly inferable that he could have performed his contract with the prosecutor.

This conviction is doubtful on the essential point as to the existence of the criminal intent at the time the money was obtained by the defendant. The money was obtained some time in the fall of 1906, under contract to work for 1907. This seems rather long for the incubation of the criminal intent, and it might be that such intent was formed subsequently to the time of procuring the money. However, since this point is not made in the brief or argument, we must assume that this question of criminal intent was fairly and fully considered by the court acting as the jury; and we will not disturb the finding.

Judgment affirmed.

DURDEN et al. v. SOUTHERN RY. CO.
(No. 307.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. May 24, 1907.)

1. RAILROADS—DUTY TO FURNISH SHIPPING FACILITIES.

In the absence of charter limitations, contractual obligations, rule of the railroad commission, or statutory enactment to the contrary, a railway company may exercise its discretion in removing a side track or spur at which it has been accustomed to receive and deliver freights as a common carrier.

2. SAME—NOTICE OF REMOVAL OF SIDE TRACK.

As a common carrier a railway company owes to the public the duty of giving reasonable notice of the intention to abandon such a side track, if the result of such removal is to leave no facilities for the receipt or delivery of such goods as it has been accustomed to receive and deliver there. From a breach of this duty a cause of action will arise in favor of one who, in response to the implicit invitation of the carrier to bring goods to that place for shipment, has so located his goods, intended for shipment, that, by the removal of the track and the discontinuance of shipping facilities without notice, he has been specially damaged.

3. SAME—QUESTION FOR JURY.

What is reasonable notice in such cases is a question of fact for the jury; and, in determining it, the exigencies, both of the public, so far as its members are likely to be interested as shippers, and of the carrier, in the light of its private rights and public obligations, should be considered.

4. SAME—MEASURE OF DAMAGES.

The damage recoverable by a particular prospective shipper, who, having arranged his property for shipment, is disappointed by the unexpected removal of the facilities, is so much of his loss sustained by reason of such removal as he would not have sustained if reasonable notice of the intention to remove had been given by the carrier.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Macon; Robt. Hodges, Judge.

Action by Charity Durden and others against the Southern Railway Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs bring error. Reversed, with direction.

Jos. H. Hall and Warren Roberts, for plaintiffs in error. N. E. & W. A. Harris, for defendant in error.

POWELL, J. The error assigned in this case is the sustaining of a demurrer to the plaintiff's petition. According to the allegations of the petition, the defendant is a foreign corporation, operating a line of railway in this state. The plaintiff, about two years prior to the bringing of the suit, bought a tract of land lying immediately on the line of the railroad. This land lies between the Ocmulgee river and the railroad, was bought for the wood and timber on it, and has little value for any other purpose. At the time the plaintiff purchased this land there was located adjacent thereto, on the defendant's line of railway, a side or spur track, at which the defendant was receiving and had been for 15 years accustomed to receive and deliver cars of freight as a common carrier. For about two years defendant had been accustomed to receive from the plaintiff for transportation cars of wood at this side track. In February, 1906, without any previous notice being given, defendant removed this side track, and left plaintiff no means of delivering his wood for transportation. At the time the side track was taken up, plaintiff actually had on the railway right of way, awaiting cars, a quantity of wood. He also had 45 additional cords of wood cut and ready for transportation. All of said wood had been sold to customers in the city of Macon. There is no other available means of transportation, and a total loss of the value of the wood has been occasioned to the plaintiff by the removal of transportation facilities. Further, there are 500 cords of uncut wood on said land, for which plaintiff had a ready market, which will be totally lost by reason of the destruction of plaintiff's transportation facilities. By amendment to the petition, it is alleged that the side track was not a private side track, but was established and maintained for the benefit of the public, in the reception and delivery of freights by the carrier; also, that a portion of the cut wood previously referred to had been delivered actually into the custody of the carrier for shipment before the removal of the side track. The defendant demurred generally and specially. The effect of the demurrer is to assert that the defendant had the right to move the side track at its pleasure or discretion; that no contract to maintain the same is set forth; that no right of the plaintiff has been violated; that the defendant has failed in no duty due the plaintiff; also, that the damages alleged are too remote and speculative. The trial court sustained the demurrers, and the plaintiff brings error.

1. The point involved in this case is somewhat novel; for, while there are several reported cases apparently cognate, each of them, so far as our research has disclosed, contains some feature which distinguishes it from the case at bar by the reason of the peculiar facts or of the statute law of the jurisdiction where rendered. There are cases involving the right of railway companies to abandon stations once established, but special reference is usually had, in the determination of them, to the terms of charters, local statutes, or orders of railroad commissions. Some cases have involved breaches of contracts to maintain side tracks for the benefit of particular shippers. In this case no charter is involved, for the defendant is a foreign corporation, and no duty by charter is asserted, no special contract is alleged, no violation of state statute law is claimed. There is no rule or order of the railroad commission upon the subject. Looking to the common law, we find that, in the absence of charter requirements, statutory regulation, or special contract to the contrary, there is no inhibition against a carrier using its discretion in abandoning the stations at which it has been accustomed to receive freight. The safety of public travel frequently demands the abolition of side tracks or spurs, and the discretion of the railway company in removing them will rarely be interfered with by the court. Jones v. Newport News & M. V. Co., 65 Fed. 736, 13 C. C. A. 95; Mercantile Trust Co. v. Columbus R. Co. (C. C.) 90 Fed.

148; Oman v. Bedford Co., 134 Fed. 64, 67 C. C. A. 190. The United States Supreme Court, in Northern Pacific R. Co. v. Washington Territory, 142 U. S. 492, 12 Sup. Ct. 283, 35 L. Ed. 1092, held that a station at a county seat might be abolished; but this decision was by a divided court, and we really think that the dissenting opinion presents the sounder view.

2. However, from a recognition of a railway company's rights to remove the side track and to discontinue the receipt and delivery of freight at the place where it was located, it does not necessarily follow that the manner in which this right is exercised may not create a cause of action in favor of one who has been damaged thereby. We do not think that a common carrier can, without liability, hold out to the public either an actual or implied representation that it will receive goods for shipment at a certain place, and then, without reasonable notice, withdraw its facilities for complying with its implicit invitation, to the injury of one who, upon faith of the carrier's representation, has, with the view of accepting the carrier's offer to receive goods at the place named, caused his goods to be placed in such position that the withdrawal of the facilities for shipment specially damages him. When the carrier erects a public station or side track, at which it receives and delivers goods for transportation, it in a sense makes to the public an open promise to receive goods there, a representation that it is ready and willing to perform there the right, due to the public, of receiving goods for transportation. Individual members of the public have a right to act upon this open promise, this public representation, until due notice is given that the same is to be withdrawn. This in line with the reasoning of the court of Queen's Bench in Denton v. Great Northern Ry. Co., 34 Eng. L. & Eq. Rep. 154. In that case the court says that such a course of dealing with the public amounts to a contract broken and a deceit perpetrated. Says Crompton, J.: "It is very much like the case of an advertisement offering a reward; * * * but I prefer resting judgment on the duty and obligation of the defendants as common carriers. * * * It is not necessary for me to say whether the defendants are liable as for the breach of a particular contract made with the plaintiff, at the same time they are liable." Carriers have the right to change the schedules of their passenger trains, but, if the schedule be changed, or if a regular train be discontinued, without reasonable notice, a prospective passenger, who has arranged his affairs in contemplation of a maintenance of the schedule, may recover the damages actually sustained by him as a result thereof. Savannah, etc., R. Co. v. Bonaud, 58 Ga. 180. The duty of common carriers to anticipate that members of the public will arrange their affairs with reference to located shipping points, and will be specially damaged by a discontinuance of facilities at such points, without notice, is analogous to their duty to anticipate and to provide cars for handling the ordinary and varying volume of traffic likely to be offered for transportation along its lines. See the cases cited in footnote to the case of Houston Ry. Co. v. Campbell, 91 Tex. 551, 45 S. W. 2, 43 L. R. A. 225. The illustration given by Lord Campbell, C. J., in the case of Denton v. Great Northern Ry. Co., supra, is also in point: "Now, suppose a ship advertised as lying in St. Katharine docks, and bound for Calcutta, and that she would carry goods at a certain rate, if sent within a certain time; and suppose that, relying on these representations, goods are sent, and the answer then is that the adventurers have changed their arrangements, that they got better freights, and that, instead of going to Calcutta, the ship is going to Jamaica; I think, under such circumstances, an action could be maintained by a party prejudiced against the parties making such representations to the public."

3. As to what is reasonable notice is a question of fact, a jury question. In determining what is reasonable, the exigencies, both of the public, so far as its members are likely to be interested as shippers, and of the carrier, in the light of its private rights and public obligations, should be considered.

4. Such damages as would have accrued to the plaintiff by the removal of the side track if the reasonable notice had been given is damnum absque injuria. In this case no damage can be allowed to the plaintiff because his standing timber is rendered less valuable. The failure to give the reasonable notice has not affected that. It is doubtless true that the plaintiff paid an enhanced price for it because he expected the shipping facilities to remain; but as to this his loss is similar, in legal contemplation, to what it would be if he had bought a mercantile business near a factory, at an increased price, because of the anticipated trade of the employees, and the factory had suspended operations. But as to the wood cut in bona fide anticipation of shipment at this sidetrack he may recover actual damages, if the allegations of the petition be sustained by proof. The measure of this damage is not necessarily the market value of the wood. In assessing this actual damage the jury may consider the expense incurred in getting the wood ready for shipment; and, if the allegation that there is no other feasible way of removing this wood be sustained, the actual deterioration, or even total loss of the wood, if the proof goes to that extent, based on its market value, may be recovered. The damages recoverable is so much of the loss sustained by reason of the removal of the side track as the plaintiff would not have sustained if reasonable notice of the intention to remove had been given. The trial court having sustained the demurrers, both general and special, the judgment is reversed, with direction that further proceedings be had in accordance with this opinion. The trial court may require the petition to be amended to correspond with the views herein expressed.

Judgment reversed, with direction.

CRAWFORD v. STATE. (No. 476.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. June 20, 1907.)

FALSE PRETENSES—ACCUSATION—SUFFICIENCY.

The accusation in this case does not allege facts constituting a criminal offense, and the demurrer thereto should have been sustained.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 23, False Pretenses, § 13.]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; J. T. Pendleton, Judge.

F. B. Crawford was convicted of obtaining money under false pretenses, and brings error. Reversed.

C. B. Rosser, Jr., for plaintiff in error. C. D. Hill, Sol. Gen., R. B. Blackburn, and Lowry Arnold, Sol., for the State.

HILL, C. J. Crawford was charged, by an accusation in the criminal court of Atlanta, with a violation of section 670 of the Penal Code. This section is in the following language: "Any person using any deceitful means or artful practice, other than those which are mentioned in this code, by which an individual, or the public, is defrauded and cheated, shall be punished as for a misdemeanor." The accusation, describing specifically the deceitful means and artful practice used by the defendant, is in these words: "State of Georgia, Fulton County. I, C. S. King, in the name and behalf of the citizens of Georgia, charge and accuse F. B. Crawford, of the county and state aforesaid, with the offense of misdemeanor, for that the said F. B. Crawford, in the county aforesaid, on the 19th day of October, 1905, did, by deceitful means and artful practice, cheat and defraud the Stephen A. Ryan Co., a corporation duly incorporated under and by virtue of the laws of the county of Fulton and state of Georgia, out of the sum of $10.00, in lawful currency of the United States, in that on the 19th day of October, 1905, the said F. B. Crawford did represent unto C. S. King, who was agent for the said Stephen A. Ryan Co., the corporation aforesaid, that he was in the employ of the Western & Atlantic Railroad Company, and that the said Western & Atlantic Railroad Company was due him for wages earned for the month of October, 1905, more than the amount of $11.00, and that there were no judgments, attachments, or orders against his salary; that said representations were made for the purpose of inducing

C. S. King, agent for the said Stephen A. Ryan Co., to purchase from the said F. B. Crawford his salary account while in the employ of the said Western & Atlantic Railroad Company earned for the month of October, 1905, to the extent of $11.00, and that the said C. S. King, agent for the Stephen A. Ryan Co., believing that said representations were true, and acting upon the faith of the same, purchased from F. B. Crawford his salary account while in the employ of the Western & Atlantic Railroad Company, earned for the month of October, 1905, to the extent of $11.00 and paid to him on said date, October 19, 1905, the sum of $10.00, and took from the said F. B. Crawford an assignment of his salary account of his wages earned while in the employ of the Western & Atlantic Railroad Company for the month of October, 1905, in words and language as follows: 'Atlanta, Ga., Oct. 19th, 1905. For value received, I this day assign to Stephen A. Ryan Co. $11.00 of my salary earned for the month of October, which pay him. In order to obtain the above amount of money, and make this salary sale, I state that I am employed regularly by the firm, corporation, or party, to whom this is directed, and that they are indebted to me more than the above amount for salary, for month named, and there are no garnishments, attachments, or orders against my salary. I state that this is an original transaction, and is not a renewal or an extension of any kind, and that I received the money for this paper the day I signed it, less the legal fee. I appoint S. A. Ryan my attorney in fact, to indorse my check and receipt for same. To Western & Atlantic Railroad Company. F. B. Crawford, 29 Hill's Ave.'—that after making said representation in order to obtain the said sum of money from the said Stephen A. Ryan Company, and after obtaining the money on said assignment, as herein set out and described, the said F. B. Crawford, by artful practice and with the purpose to defraud and cheat and swindle the said Stephen A. Ryan Co., did himself cash the time so sold and transferred to said Stephen A. Ryan Co., and appropriated the same to his own use, with the intention to defraud the said Stephen A. Ryan Co. out of the sum of $10.00 as herein set up, and did defraud the said Stephen A. Ryan Co. out of the sum of $10.00; that at the time the said F. B. Crawford collected the money due him for wages, earned while in the employ of the said Western & Atlantic Railroad Company, for the month of October, 1905, he, the said F. B. Crawford, knew that he did not have title to the wages assigned by him to the said Stephen A. Ryan Company to the extent of the assignment, as herein set up, and that, in collecting the wages due him, for the month of October, 1905, he intended to defraud, and did defraud, the said Stephen A. Ryan Company out of the sum of $10.00; of the value of $10.00, all of which said acts on the part of F. B.

Crawford were contrary to the laws of said state, the peace, good order, and dignity thereof. C. S. King, prosecutor. Lowry Arnold. Sol. December term, 1906. Criminal court of Atlanta." The defendant demurred to this accusation, on the ground "that it sets forth no distinct crime; that it is vague, uncertain, and indefinite and general in its allegations, and does not properly put the defendant on notice of what he is expected to defend; and that it is fatally defective because it is nowhere alleged that the defendant made any false representations relating to any past or existing fact." This demurrer was overruled, and the defendant was tried and convicted. He thereupon petitioned the superior court for a writ of certiorari, alleging in his petition that the court erred in overruling the demurrer, and that the verdict was without evidence, and was contrary to law. The court sanctioned the petition and granted the writ of certiorari, and, upon hearing the certiorari, entered a judgment overruling the same, and the case comes to this court on exceptions to the judgment of the superior court overruling the certiorari.

The section of the Code upon which this accusation is framed is very broad in its terms. It very greatly enlarges the common-law and statutory offense of cheating and swindling by false pretenses or representations. In other words, many acts would be criminal under this statute which would not be criminal under the common law, or under statutes specifically defining the offense of cheating and swindling. Some of the essential elements necessary to constitute cheating and swindling by false pretenses or representations need not exist to make a violation of this section. For instance, the deceitful means or artful practice need not be false, or relate only to existing facts or past events. It might exist if the representations made were absolutely truthful, but were deceitfully and artfully used with the intent to defraud, and actually did defraud. A future promise or agreement might constitute "deceitful means or artful practice" by which an individual was defrauded and cheated. "Any deceitful means or artful practice" by which an individual is defrauded and cheated is within the terms of this statute. It is a question of fact for the jury to determine whether the means or practice used in defrauding and cheating were deceitful or artful, under the ordinary signification of these words. To illustrate: If all the allegations in this accusation as to the representations of the defendant, which were made to induce the prosecutor to buy his salary, were absolutely true, as represented, yet, if at the time of making such representations he had the intent to cheat and defraud the prosecutor by subsequently himself collecting from the railroad company the amount of the salary which he had actually sold and for which he had been paid, this offense would be shown, under section 670 of the Penal Code 1895. These representations, made to induce the buying of the salary, was the artful practice used by him which put him in position and made it possible for him to carry out and execute his fraudulent intent. If, however, at the time of making these representations and selling his salary, he did not have any fraudulent purpose, or any intention of himself collecting his salary he would not be guilty of violating this statute. We think these general statements are sound and are fully supported by the decision of the Supreme Court in Garner v. State, 100 Ga. 257, 28 S. E. 24. But the accusation in this case does not measure up to the requirements above announced, so as to set forth any offense, even under this omnibus section of the Code. The accusation nowhere alleges in terms that the representations were false and made with intent to defraud; nor does it allege that the representations were true, yet were used artfully and deceitfully by the defendant with the specific intent to defraud the prosecutor, or that the defendant when he made these representations then and there had the intent, notwithstanding the sale of his salary, to himself collect the same and fraudulently convert it to his own use. The fraudulent intent is applied only to the act of subsequently collecting the salary and converting it, and it is not alleged that such fraudulent intent was in the mind of the defendant when he made the representations that induced the purchase of his salary account. The accusation being defective in the particulars pointed out, it should have been quashed on demurrer.

Judgment reversed.

SMITH v. SHEPPARD. (No. 343.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. June 19, 1907.)

1. HUSBAND AND WIFE—GIFTS—VALIDITY.

"The husband can make a gift to his own wife, although she lives in the same house with him, * * * as easily as he can make a present to his neighbor's wife," and when such gift is made in good faith, and consummated by delivery and acceptance, it cannot thereafter be defeated by a sale made by the husband.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 26, Husband and Wife, § 252.]

2. SAME—BURDEN OF PROOF.

In a contest between the wife, as donee, and a subsequent purchaser from the husband, the burden is on the former to show the gift and its validity.

3. SAME—ACTION BY WIFE—TRIAL—DIRECTING VERDICT.

Action by Sallie Smith against G. W.

Sheppard. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

Wm. I. Geer, Arnold & Arnold, and J. B. Ridley, for plaintiff in error. J. R. Pottle, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. 1. In McNaught v. Anderson, 78 Ga. 503, 3 S. E. 668, 6 Am. St. Rep. 278, Chief Justice Bleckley declares, speaking for the court, that "the legal unity of husband and wife has, in Georgia, for most purposes been dissolved, and a legal duality established. A wife is a wife, and not a husband, as she was formerly. Legislative chemistry has analyzed the conjugal unit, and it is no longer treated as an element, but as a compound. A husband can make a gift to his own wife, although she lives in the house with him and attends to her household duties, as easily as he can make a present to his neighbor's wife. This puts her on an equality with other ladies, and looks like progress." Therefore a husband can make a valid gift of a personal chattel, such as a horse, to his wife, although she may be living with him; and such a gift, when consummated by delivery to the wife and acceptance by her, will be upheld by the court, unless made with fraudulent intent. Civ. Code 1895, § 3554.

2, 3. When the husband makes a gift to the wife of a personal chattel, bona fide and without any fraudulent intent, and the gift is consummated by delivery and acceptance, he cannot subsequently deprive the wife of such gift by a conveyance of the personal chattel to a third party. In a contest between the wife and a subsequent purchaser from the husband of such personal chattel, the presumption would be that the gift to the wife by the husband was made with intent to defraud the purchaser, and the burden would be upon the wife to show the bona fides of the gift. The provision of the statute of Elizabeth, as codified in Civ. Code 1895, § 3530, that a voluntary conveyance is void as against subsequent bona fide purchasers for a valuable consideration without notice, is not a general rule of law without an exception. The exception to this general rule is where the evidence rebuts the presumption of fraud against the gift and clearly establishes its bona fides. We think this exception is clearly pointed out in the case of Howard v. Snelling, 32 Ga. 195, and in the case of Cathcart v. Robinson, 5 Pet. 279, 8 L. Ed. 120. This must be the law, else there would be presented an irreconcilable conflict between section 3504 of the Civil Code of 1895, which defines a valid gift, and section 3530 of the Civil Code of 1895, as to the rights of bona fide purchasers against voluntary conveyances. The law's purpose is to prevent a fraud by the donor upon the donee in the subsequent sale, as well as to prevent a fraud upon the purchaser by the previous gift. There was conflict in the evidence in this case as to the making of the gift by the husband to the wife and its consummation. There was no evidence that, if the gift was made and consummated, there was any fraudulent intent on the part of the husband as against the subsequent purchaser. The gift, if made, was consummated, according to the evidence of the plaintiff, two years prior to the sale of the horse by the husband to the purchaser. In the language of Mr. Justice Jenkins, in Howard v. Snelling, supra, this was "a very long incubation of a fraudulent intent." Whether the gift was made, and its consummation and bona fides, under the evidence in this case, should have been submitted to the jury to be determined by them. The direction of the verdict for the defendant was error.

Judgment reversed.

Error from City Court of Quitman; W. B. Bennet, Judge.

Action by G. W. Bell against Foss Bros. and another. Verdict for plaintiff. From an order granting a new trial on motion of defendant C. C. Foss, plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

The suit was by G. W. Bell against Foss Bros., a firm composed of C. C. Foss, R. J. Foss, and against J. L. Massey, on a promissory note made by the defendants and payable to the plaintiff. The only defense filed was by C. C. Foss. He denied that he signed or delivered the note, or authorized any one to do so for him, and alleged that at the time it was made he was in the ginnery business with his brother, R. J. Foss, but that it was not made in the transaction of their partnership business or in any way connected therewith, and that R. J. Foss was not authorized to sign the partnership name to it. There was conflict in the evidence as to the consideration of the note; the evidence for the plaintiff being that the note was given to him for borrowed money to pay the debts of Foss Bros., and the evidence of C. C. Foss being that the money was borrowed by R. J. Foss for the individual use of R. J. Foss in the purchase of a mule. A verdict was rendered against all the defendants, and C. C. Foss filed a motion for a new trial on the statutory grounds, which was granted by the trial judge.

GODDARD v. STATE. (No. 472.)
(Court of Appeals of Georgia. June 19, 1907.)

1. FALSE PRETENSES—ELEMENTS OF OFFENSES.

The essential requisites in the offense of cheating and swindling by false representations are: (a) That the representations were made; (b) that they were knowingly and designedly false; (c) that they were made with intent to deceive and defraud; (d) that they did deceive and defraud; (e) that they related to an existing fact or past event; (f) that the party to whom the false statements were made, relying on their truth, was thereby induced to part with his property. It is incumbent upon the state to prove all of these elements of the offense, and if any one is lacking in the proof the offense is not made out.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 23, False Pretenses, §§ 1-26.]

2. SAME—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

Applying the facts proved to the above legal requirements, the verdict in this case was without evidence to support it, the conviction of the accused was contrary to law, and the trial court should have granted him a new trial.

Error from City Court of Cartersville; A. M. Foute, Judge.

E. Goddard was convicted of cheating and swindling by false representations, and he brings error. Reversed.

Joe M. Moon, for plaintiff in error. T. Q. Milner, Sol., for the State.

HILL, C. J. The defendant was convicted of cheating and swindling, in the city court of Cartersville, on evidence substantially as follows: The accused was the owner of a light bay medium-sized horse, which he sold to the prosecutor for $35. At the time of the sale he represented to the prosecutor that the horse "was not over 10 or 12 years old, and was a good corn and fodder eater, and was sound in every respect." The prosecutor saw the horse before he bought him, and drove him to his buggy. He was apparently very old, and was very poor. The accused told the prosecutor that his condition was due to the fact that a negro had made a crop with him and had fed him on Johnson grass; that all he needed was "feed," was a good horse, and "had all the gait and a pair of drawbars thrown in," and that he was worth $45, and if he kept on fattening as he had done in the one month in which he had had him he would be worth $75. The prosecutor told the accused, after examining the horse, that "he seemed to be older than 10 or 12 years, and looked like he might be 16 years old"; but the accused insisted that he was only 10 or 12 years old. The prosecutor asked the accused if the horse could eat corn and fodder, and he replied that he could eat anything. The prosecutor and the accused hitched the horse to a buggy, and, after driving him awhile, told the accused that "he moved very well," and that he would give him $35 for the horse. The accused wanted $45. A friend of the accused, standing near, listening to the barter, advised the accused to take the $35, and the accused, after hesitating awhile, consented to do so, and delivered the horse to the prosecutor. The prosecutor paid for the horse and took him home. This was on Saturday. On the next Monday the horse was returned to the defendant by the prosecutor, who stated that the representations that the horse was a good corn and fodder eater, and was only 10 or 12 years old, were untrue, and demanded the return of his money, which was refused. On Saturday night and Sunday morning the prosecutor and his son gave the horse corn and fodder to eat, but he did not eat any of it. The prosecutor stated that he relied solely upon the representations made to him by the defendant as to the age of the horse and as to his ability to eat, but that he afterwards learned that the horse was 15 or 16 years old and could not eat corn and fodder. The prosecutor stated that, if he had known these facts, he would not have paid anything for the horse and would not have had him as a gift. One witness, besides the prosecutor, stated that the horse ate corn with difficulty and "stemmed" his fodder. This was substantially the case as made by the state. Several witnesses for the defendant testified that the defendant was approached by the prosecutor and asked to sell him the horse; that the defendant was reluctant to sell the horse, stating to the prosecutor that he was in a bad condition because of bad treatment, and was not fit to sell, but that he thought he was worth $45; that he told the prosecutor that the horse had been fattening rapidly while in his possession, and that he had fed him on meal from the mill; that the horse was sound, and that he did not know his age, but that he was apparently an old horse; that he was told by the party from whom he got him that he was about 12 years old; that, while the accused told the prosecutor that he fed the horse on meal from the mill, he also told him that the horse could eat corn and fodder, as he had fed him on some. Several of these witnesses also testified that they fed the horse on corn and fodder after the prosecutor had turned him loose, and that he ate both. All the witnesses stated that the horse was old and very poor. One witness stated that after the prosecutor returned the horse, and the accused refused to take him, and he was turned loose without an owner, he took possession of the horse, and for two months fed him on corn and fodder and other feed; that the horse fattened about two pounds a day, and got in good condition, and he "swapped him" for another horse, worth $35; and that he got in cash $10 besides. The foregoing is a substantial statement of all the material evidence in the case.

In repeated rulings of this court it has been announced that the verdict of the jury will not be disturbed if there was any evidence to authorize it, but that, if the verdict was entirely without evidence to support it, it will be set aside as contrary to law. Several exceptions are made to the charge of the court and to the refusal to charge as requested, and these exceptions are urged very forcibly by the able attorney for the plaintiff in error; but the view that we entertain of this case on the merits makes it unnecessary for us to consider any of these specific exceptions. We think the verdict against the defendant, even under the evidence for the state, is wholly unwarranted. To support a conviction for cheating and swindling, as charged in this case, there are certain essential facts which it is incumbent upon the state to prove. Were the alleged representations made? Were they knowingly false? Were they made with intent to deceive and defraud? Did they deceive and defraud? And was the prosecutor induced by such representations, believing in their truth, to part with his property? All these elements must exist before the offense is complete. There was evidence that the representations were made by the defendant to the prosecutor, to wit, that the horse was a good corn and fodder eater, that he was not more than 10 or 12 years old, and that he was sound in every respect. Were these representations false, and known to be so by the defendant when he made them? That the horse was sound in every respect was affirmed by all the witnesses, and was undisputed. The statement that he could eat corn and fodder was abundantly shown by actual experiments. The only testimony to the contrary was that of the prosecutor and his son that he did not eat the corn and fodder given to him by them on two occasions. There was no proof that the corn and fodder which they gave to the horse was in good condition; and, in view of the evidence that the horse always had eaten corn and fodder, it is fair to presume that its condition on the two occasions when he failed to eat them was the reason for such failure, and not the horse's inability to eat such feed. The statement as to the age of the horse was apparently only the opinion of the defendant, for he said he had only owned the horse a short time; but it is fair to presume that the statement as to the age was not made with intent to deceive the prosecutor, for the defendant gave him every opportunity to determine that question for himself. He turned the horse over to the prosecutor to drive, and assisted the prosecutor in making an examination of the horse. The age of the horse was a patent defect, discoverable by ordinary inspection. All the witnesses testified that the horse, in the language of Dr. Johnson, describing an old maid, was "old, ugly, and miserably poor." Besides, the statement of the prosecutor shows that he was not deceived as to the age of the horse. After making an examination he stated that he believed the horse was more than 12 years old, and looked like he might be 16 years old. "The evidence showing that the defects in the mare traded by the accused to the prosecutor were patent, and that they were actually discovered by the latter before the trade was concluded, the conviction of the accused of being a common cheat and swindler was not warranted, although he represented the mare to be 'all right.'" Rainey v. State, 94 Ga. 590, 19 S. E. 892.

We have preferred to go fully into the merits of this case, because we are convinced from a careful consideration of the evidence that the conviction of the defendant was wrong. All the facts and circumstances clearly indicate that the defendant did not use any "deceitful means or artful practice" to induce the prosecutor to purchase the horse. By general consent, much latitude should be allowed in trading horses; but the evidence in this case failed to show that the defendant availed himself of any such latitude, but showed, on the contrary, that he was a fair and honest trader, and the reason, apparently, for dissatisfaction with his purchase by the prosecutor, was because his family did not like the horse, or, in the language of his son, "would not have such an old, poor horse." We think the verdict of the jury was unsupported by the evidence, and that the defendant should have been granted a new trial.

Judgment reversed.

SOUTHERN RY. CO. v. PURYEAR.
(No. 326.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. May 24, 1907.)

1. RAILROADS—INJURIES TO ANIMALS—NEGLIGENCE—BLOWING WHISTLE.

The act of an engineer in blowing a whistle in compliance with the mandate of the statute in approaching a public crossing is not negligence, unless the whistle was blown in such manner as to produce an unnecessary and unusual noise. Neither is the blowing of the whistle by the engineer for the purpose of preventing stock from getting on the track in front of a running train, where there is apparent danger that the stock would get on the track unless so frightened away, negligence, unless the blowing was done in an unusual and unnecessary manner. There was no evidence in this case to support the verdict against the railway company, and the presumption of negligence was clearly rebutted by the positive and uncontroverted testimony.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 41, Railroads, §§ 1403, 1476.]

2. SAME—PROXIMATE CAUSE.

To render a railroad company responsible in damages for killing a horse, the evidence, or some reasonable inference deducible therefrom, must show that the death of the horse resulted from the injuries received. The evidence and circumstances in this case failed to show that the death of the horse in April was the result of the injuries received in December before, but did clearly show that such death was caused by some disease disconnected with those injuries. (Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Whitfield County; A. W. Fite, Judge.

Action by D. Puryear against the Southern Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

See 56 S. E. 73.

Shumate, Maddox & McCamy and J. M. Rudolph, for plaintiff in error. Geo. G. Glenn, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. Puryear sued the Southern Railway Company in a justice's court for damages for the alleged killing of his colt in December, 1904, by the running of the train of the defendant company; the suit being for $75. The verdict and judgment in the case were against the defendant, for $75. Thereupon it brought its petition for certiorari to the superior court. The judge of the superior court, on the hearing of the certiorari, overruled the same, and refused to grant a new trial. This judgment is brought here for review. The evidence makes the following case: In the latter part of December, 1904, the colt in question and a mule were in the dirt road, at a point about 400 or 500 yards south of where the dirt road crosses the track of the Southern Railway. The colts were a short distance south of the blow post of said crossing. The dirt road at this place runs parallel to and within a very short distance of the railroad track. At the time of the injuries complained of the train of the defendant company was running north. The uncontradicted evidence of the engineer is that, as he approached the blow post for said crossing, he observed the colts in the dirt road, and that they commenced running along the dirt road together; that when he reached the blow post he blew the crossing signal; that the colts continued to run up the road ahead of the engine, and that, being afraid that they would run on down to the crossing and take up the track, which was the habit of animals under similar circumstances, in the effort to prevent this and to frighten the colts away from the track and make them turn back, he commenced blowing the stock alarm at them; that the mule colt did turn back, but that the horse colt continued running down the road, outrunning the train, and passed over the crossing, and that was the last he saw of him. The engineer further testified that there was no unusual or unnecessary noise made by the running of the train, or by the blowing of the whistle at the time and place of the blowing, and that the blowing of the whistle was the proper thing to do under the circumstances; that he ceased blowing the whistle before the colt reached the crossing, and did not blow it any more. This evidence of the engineer was corroborated by the fireman, and was not contradicted by any of the witnesses for the plaintiff. The testimony shows that the colt, after running across the railroad crossing, ran into the fence, knocked down two panels and one of the posts, and cut its shoulder and its flank, and sprained its right ankle. The cut in its shoulder was from four to six inches long and about an inch deep in the deepest place; but the wounds were flesh wounds, and did not strike the bone. The sprain in the ankle caused it to become slightly enlarged, and when the colt would walk it had a slight limp. There were no bones broken at all. The flesh wounds healed, but the colt never seemed to get right. On April 15th thereafter the plaintiff drove the colt through the country, 18 miles, to his father's. Some time afterwards the colt was turned loose in the pasture with other stock, and it got sick. It was doctored, and got better; but it again got sick, and died. Several of the witnesses testified that they could not tell what was the matter with the colt, but that it just "got down and seemed to be weak." One of the witnesses, who seemed to be somewhat of a horse doctor, thought the colt had the colic, and drenched it with buttermilk. This is substantially all the evidence in the case, and the question presented is: Does this evidence, considered most favorably for the plaintiff, make a case of liability against the railroad?

1. The proximate cause of the fright of the colt, as shown by the uncontradicted evidence, was the noise of the approaching train; for there had been no blowing of the whistle at the time the colt was seen running up the dirt road parallel with the railroad track. There was no unusual noise caused by the running of the train, only the noise incident usually to the running of a heavy freight train. The evidence showed that it was absolutely necessary for the whistle to be blown at the blow post, in order to comply with the imperative mandate of the statute; but the testimony is uncontradicted that in the performance of his duty the engineer did not blow the whistle so as to cause an unnecessary or unusual noise. If the noise of the running train and the blowing of the whistle at the blow post caused the fright of the colt, the railroad would not have been liable; for these things were not negligence, unless unusual and unnecessary, or done in an unusual or unnecessary manner. This is too clear for doubt. The blowing of the whistle by the engineer subsequently was done by him (according to his uncontradicted evidence) for the purpose of preventing the colts from running on the track or across the crossing, and was done for the purpose of preventing injury to the colts by frightening them away from the track. We do not think that the engineer can reasonably be adjudged guilty of negligence for blowing the whistle for the purpose indicated, if done in a proper way. On the contrary, we think it was the prudent thing for the engineer to have done. We think, therefore, that if the noise of the running train and the blowing of the whistle, under the circumstances, caused the fright of the colt, and caused it to injure itself as described in the evidence, the company is not responsible for such fright or the consequences thereof; for the evidence clearly shows that its agent exercised all ordinary and reasonable care and diligence in connection with the matter and to prevent any injury to the colt, the specific acts of alleged negligence in blowing the whistle being neither unusual nor unnecessary at the time when and the place where it was done.

2. The evidence showed that the colt was injured the last of December, 1904, by running into the fence and inflicting upon itself two flesh wounds and spraining one ankle. These wounds were not serious, and the two flesh wounds were entirely healed, and as a result of the sprained ankle there was a slight limp. The colt died five months thereafter from some unknown disease, which was thought by the person who treated it to have been colic. Even if the company was liable for the injuries which the colt received in running against the fence, unless it died as a result of such injuries, the company would not be liable for its death. The facts of this case, instead of showing, or even raising an inference, that the death was the result of the injuries, indicated very clearly that death was caused by some disease wholly unconnected with the injuries. We therefore conclude that there was no evidence of negligence on the part of the defendant railway, but that, on the contrary, any presumption of negligence arising from the injuries was fully rebutted by the positive and uncontradicted testimony of unimpeached witnesses, and that the death of the colt resulted, not from the injuries received in December, but from some disease wholly disconnected therefrom in April following.

The judgment of the superior court in overruling the certiorari and refusing a new trial is reversed.

WILLIAMS v. FAIN & STAMPS. (No. 85.)
(Court of Appeals of Georgia. June 19, 1907.)

JUSTICES OF THE PEACE — PROCEDURE — CONTINUANCE.

In a justice's court a suit upon an unconditional contract in writing may be tried at the first term, although a plea be filed, if the plaintiff be present and willing to proceed to trial. Even at the first term the defendant cannot continue the case as a matter of right.

Russell, J., dissenting.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Wilkes County;
H. M. Holden, Judge.

Action by Fain & Stamps against George Williams. Judgment for plaintiff was affirmed on certiorari, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

I. T. Irvin, Jr., for plaintiff in error. Jas. M. Pitner, for defendants in error.

POWELL, J. This decision is conversant merely about the meaning of one word—the word “consenting.” The plaintiff sued in a justice’s court upon an unconditional contract in writing. The defendant’s counsel appeared at the first term and filed what amounted to a plea of the general issue. The plaintiff insisted upon an immediate trial of the case, and the court, over objection of defendant’s counsel, allowed him to proceed. He obtained a judgment, and the defendant sought by certiorari to set the same aside, on the ground that under the law the case was not triable, over his objection, at the first term. The judge of the superior court overruled the certiorari, and error is assigned to that ruling.

Civ. Code 1895, §§ 4133–4135, governing the practice in such cases, are as follows:

“Sec. 4133. All cases before a justice of the peace stand for trial at the time and place designated in the summons, and shall be then and there tried, unless continued according to law.

“Sec. 4134. Whenever the defendant in the justice’s court on an unconditional contract in writing makes defense, he shall make such defense at the first term.

“Sec. 4135. When such defense is thus made, the cause shall stand for trial at the next term (subject, however, to continuance as provided by law): Provided, that said cause may be tried at the term when said plea is filed, if the plaintiff or his attorney is present consenting thereto.”

The original plaintiff says that he was present and consenting to a trial at the first term, and that the case is within the proviso of section 4135. The defendant says the word “consenting,” ex vi termini, connotes the concurrence of another volition with that of the plaintiff; that the plaintiff’s willingness to try at the first term is not sufficient, but that there must be also, on the defendant’s part, a willingness to try before consent can exist; that one person cannot consent until there is another willing person to consent with. It is insisted that the individual action of a single mind may be called “assent,” but not “consent.” To this proposition the majority of this court cannot assent, whether we view it from a philological or from a judicial standpoint. The sly discrimination between the words “assent” and “consent” is not based on the distinction between single and joint volition; but, according to the authority of the Standard Dictionary, Webster’s International Dictionary, and Crabb’s English Synonyms, “assent respects the judgment, consent respects the will.” The word “consent,” as is true with most of our English words, has many shades of meaning; and it is frequently used to express the notion of “a voluntary accordance with or concurrence in what is done or proposed by another.” From an etymological standpoint the prefix “con” does imply joint action; but in the interpretation of statutes we look to the ordinary, not the etymological, signification of words. Loosely, the word “consent” is used interchangeably with the words “assent,” “acquiescence,” “concurrence,” “agreement,” “approval,” and “permission.” However, best usage always distinguishes it from “assent” and kindred words, according to the shade of meaning just pointed out; “consent” connoting individual volition, and “assent” individual judgment. As an act of judgment we may assent to the necessity of a surgical operation, but from lack of fortitude may not have the will power to consent to it. Thus, Shakespeare makes the poor apothecary, whom Romeo tempts with money in order to induce him to furnish the poison for the contemplated suicide, reply, “Poverty, but not my will, consents.” This same writer also, in the opening verses of Henry VI, in lamenting the death of the former Henry, uses the word “consent” to express the idea of individual volition, when he calls upon the comets to scourge “the bad revolting stars, that have consented into Henry’s death.” The power of the colonial legislature to permit or to refuse—its unilateral volition—is implied by the use of this word as it appears in the excerpt from the Declaration of Independence: “He has kept among us, in times of peace, standing armies, without the consent of our Legislature.” In the biblical usage of the word the same idea of the action of the individual will, as distinguished from judgment, is preserved. The murderers of Stephen laid down their clothes at the feet of a young man named Saul (Paul); and, though he took no part with them, his wish and will in the matter is expressed by the words, “And Saul was consenting unto his death.” Acts, viii, 1. Certainly there is no intention to intimate that there was an agreement among the guests who were invited to the marriage feast, and yet it is said of them, “All, with one consent, began to make excuse.” Luke, xiv, 18. Note the use of the word “one” to complete the sense in this quotation. The last phrase of Rom. i, 3, which, according to the translation of 1611, reads, “Who knowing the judgment of God, that they which practice such things are worthy of death, not only do the same, but have pleasure in them that do them,” is rendered in the revised version of 1881, “But also consent with them that practice them,” and thus “have pleasure in” and “consent with” are recognized as interchangeable terms. Compare with this last extract Pa. i, 18, “When thou sawest a thief, thou consentedst with him.” To express the individual action of his spiritual volition Paul says (Rom. vii, 16): “If, then, I do that which I would, I consent unto the law that is good.” The king of England is always said to assent, not to consent, to an act of Parliament; for theoretically he has no personal will or choice, and merely expresses his judgment as to whether the law is for the people's good.

When we come to the law we find this shade of meaning still preserved, though not always so closely as in literature, where linguistic precision receives more care. For example, the expression "age of consent" stands in close legal relation to the phrase "against her will." In that topic of criminal law in which these expressions are most familiar, the volition, not the judgment, of the female, is considered. Her judgment may oppose the act; and yet if, as in the case of the fair young woman of Byron's poem who, "swearing she would ne'er consent, consented," her will does not oppose, the crime is not complete. When we desire to express the meeting of the minds of the parties to a contract, it is not customary to use the word "consent" alone; but, to insure greater precision, we say "mutuality of consent," or "mutuality of assent"—the former being the more accurate expression. If it had been intended by section 4135 of the Civil Code of 1895 to make such cases triable at the first term only when both parties are willing, some such expression as "mutual consent," or "consent of the parties," would have been used. Compare sections 5126 and 4848. The manifest legislative intent is to give to the plaintiff the right to exercise his own volition as to whether the trial shall be had at the first term or the second, subject, of course, to the right of the defendant to continue for cause. This gives to the plaintiff no undue advantage. It merely protects him against the legal surprise which may arise from the filing of the plea, and affords him the time, if he needs it, to make preparation to meet the matters set up in defense. The defendant has already had 10 days' notice of the plaintiff's demand, and is, therefore, ordinarily expected to be ready for trial at the first term. If the plaintiff is also ready, there is no need for further delay. The law may justly extend to the plaintiff, if he wishes it, further time to meet a plea just filed, without affording the defendant further delay when he is or should be ready for trial. Of course, if the defendant is not ready, and can make a proper showing for a continuance, the magistrate may grant it.

Judgment Affirmed.

Error from Superior Court, Gwinnett County; C. H. Brand, Judge.

Action by William Hewatt against J. M. Gresham and others. From the judgment, defendants bring error. Affirmed.

Gresham, having been arrested on a bastardy warrant, made the following contract: "The State v. Joseph Gresham. Warrant for Bastardy. Miss L. D. Hewatt, Pros. It is agreed by the parties to the above-stated matter that William Hewatt, father of Miss L. D. Hewatt, take said child born of the said Miss L. D. Hewatt, and care for and maintain said child and support same; that said Joseph Gresham agrees, for and in consideration of the support of said child and the dismissing of said warrant against him, to pay to said William Hewatt the sum of three dollars per month, to be paid as follows: [The payments to be made are set out.] This shall be in full liberality [of the liability] on the part of said Joseph Gresham for the support, maintenance, or education of said child or its mother, and, if he complies with the payments when they become due, shall be a bar to any further prosecution as to said matter. But, should said Joseph Gresham fail to pay any of said payments when they become due, then said prosecution is at liberty to have another warrant issued for said Joseph Gresham for said charges. Then the same is to be a bar and release of any further liberality [liability?] of said Joseph Gresham to said William Hewatt on this contract, or any liberality [liability] of his securities on same for any further sum, or any part of same. Should said child die at any time, then said payments on same shall cease, except what is then due on same, or the proportion of the amount due on same, except the $18 due December 25, 1901, which is to be paid in any event. This contract is to be nonnegotiable and nontransferable. The said Monro Gresham and Sam Ewing and [?] bind ourselves to said William Hewatt for the amounts of each of the payments of $3 per month for said ten years, and agree to see the same paid when due. And each of us hereby waive all exemptions of the homestead against the payment of any part of said sums which will become due on this contract. It is understood and agreed that there shall be no further prosecution of said Joseph Gresham for said offense, or any other offense arising out of same, provided said Joseph Gresham complies with his part of this contract. Witness our hands and seals this the 20th day of September, 1901. J. J. Gresham. [L. S.] J. M. Gresham. [L. S.] S. J. Ewing [L. S.] Executed in the presence of E. T. Nix." The sureties having been sued on default of payment of certain of the installments, and a judgment having been rendered against them, they sought to avoid it on the following grounds: That the contract is illegal, because the consideration is the suppression of a criminal prosecution; that the contract is also illegal for the reason that, under Pen. Code 1895, §§ 1248-1250, the only mode of requiring a putative father to support and maintain a bastard child is that set forth therein; that the contract is merely an optional one on the part of the defendants; that under the contract a suit thereon and a criminal prosecution might be maintained at the same time. One of the sureties also set up that he signed the contract under duress, to prevent his son, the putative father of the bastard, from going to jail; that the son was under arrest, and incarceration was immediately threatened.

Error from Superior Court, Bibb County; W. H. Felton, Jr., Judge.

Action by A. D. Ware against J. D. Turner. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

R. Douglas Feagin, for plaintiff in error. L. D. Moore, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. Ware sued Turner in a justice's court on a note for $65 for rent of a store on First street, in the city of Macon. Turner pleaded that he was induced to sign the note by fraudulent misrepresentations made to him by Ware, and pleaded set-off and recoupment against Ware of $85. The facts of the transaction between Ware and Turner were substantially as follows: In March, 1906, Turner was renting a store on Second street, in Macon, and was paying $60 per month, and his rent notes were outstanding until October 1, 1906. Ware was renting a store on First street, under a lease to October 1, 1907. Turner did not know what rent Ware was paying. Ware wanted to exchange stores with Turner, and they agreed to make an exchange of stores, and, as both parties had rent notes outstanding, it was agreed that, in order to avoid the trouble of making new notes, each would continue to pay his outstanding notes for the rent of the store each had been occupying, and they would adjust between themselves the difference in the rent; and each took the other's word as to what rent he was paying. Turner told Ware that he was paying $60 per month for his store, which was the truth. Ware told Turner that he was paying $65 per month for his store, which Turner relied upon as being the truth; but in fact Ware was only paying $50 per month for his store, and his notes for this amount were outstanding. Under these representations, which each accepted as true, and which each acted upon, the exchange of stores was made. Under this contract Turner gave his notes to Ware for $65 for the monthly rent which Ware said his store had been costing him; and it was agreed that Turner should pay these notes each month by taking up his own notes for $60 for the rent monthly of the store he had occupied on Second street, and pay Ware the $5 difference in the rent of the two stores in money. Turner, relying upon the truthfulness of Ware's statement and having no cause for suspecting any deception or fraud, paid and took up his $50 notes each month for six months after the exchange of stores was made. This payment covered the rent of the store which Ware had moved into, and which had been occupied by Turner from April 1, 1906, to October 1, 1906, and, in addition, Turner paid to Ware the $5 per month for five months, thereby taking up, in pursuance of the agreement, five of his $65 notes which he had given to Ware. Turner having thus paid his six $60 notes, and in addition the $5 difference in the rent of the stores to Ware, he was only due, at the time the suit was brought on the $65, the sum of $5, assuming that there had been no misrepresentation or fraud, and that Ware's contention, as claimed, was correct. Ware's suit was for the full amount of $65 and interest, and Turner claimed that he had paid rent, when Ware sued, $85 more than the aggregate rent of the First street store according to what Ware was actually paying therefor when the exchange of stores was made; this $85 being composed of the $5 difference in the rent of the two stores for the five months, which Turner had paid to Ware, and the $10 per month, which Turner had paid as the difference in rent, relying upon the statement of Ware that his monthly rent was $65, instead of $50. The evidence for the defense clearly established the truth of Turner's contention; it being shown that Ware as a matter of fact was only paying $50 per month for his store, and not $65, as was represented. The court, however, ruled out all the testimony for the defense, and directed the jury to return a verdict for the plaintiff Ware on the note of $65 for the full amount, with interest. The defendant made a motion for a new trial, based on the usual statutory grounds and the judgment of the court excluding the testimony in support of his defense and in directing a verdict for the plaintiff.

We think, under the evidence submitted by the defendant, the court erred in excluding this testimony and in directing a verdict for the plaintiff, and erred in not granting a new trial. Civ. Code 1895, § 4026, defines legal fraud as "misrepresentation of a material fact, made willfully to deceive, * * * and acted on by the opposite party." The evidence submitted by the defendant shows that Ware did make a misrepresentation to Turner as to the amount of rent paid monthly for his store. It cannot be assumed otherwise than that this misrepresentation was made willfully to deceive. Of course, Ware knew what amount of rent he was paying for his store, and such misrepresentation was acted on by Turner under the belief that it was the truth. This leaves for consideration only the question as to whether such misrepresentation was of "a material fact." Under the contract made between the parties, the exact amount of rent each was paying for his store was a material fact, as determining the amount each was thereafter to pay on the exchange of stores. It was understood that the man whose rent was the less of the two was to pay to the other the difference. If, therefore, Ware had not made the misrepresentation to Turner, to wit, that his store cost him $65 rent per month, but had told him the truth, to wit, that his store was only $50 rent per month, instead of Turner paying Ware $5 per month as the difference in rent, Ware under the terms of the agreement would have paid Turner $10 per month as the difference in rent. This misrepresentation, therefore, took out of Turner's pocket $5 per month that he paid to Ware as the difference in the rent as represented by Ware, and kept out of Turner's pocket $10 per month which Ware should have paid him as the difference in the actual rent of the two stores. If these facts were true, and the evidence submitted by the defendant gave him the right to have that fact determined by a jury, then the plaintiff was not only guilty of legal, but actual, fraud. If either party to a transaction conceals some fact which is material, which is within his own knowledge, and which it is his duty to disclose, he is guilty of actual fraud. Civ. Code 1895, §§ 4025, 4026, 4027; In re Tappan, 22 Pac. 257, 5 L. R. A. 428, 13 Am. St. Rep. 174. In Epps v. Waring, 93 Ga. 765, 20 S. E. 645, Mr. Justice Lumpkin says: "It is a universally recognized doctrine, supported by all respectable text-writers, and upheld in every well-considered case, bearing upon this subject, that where a party has been induced to enter into a contract by wilful fraud on the part of the other party, calculated to deceive and which does deceive, the defrauded party may set up the fraud in his defense to an action upon the contract." Under these decisions, the defense set up in this case was good, and the evidence submitted by the defendant entitled him to a verdict, unless such evidence was controverted; and we think that our learned brother of the trial court erred in excluding the testimony of the defendant, and in directing a verdict for the plaintiff, and in refusing to grant the defendant a new trial.

ERROR, WRIT OF—NONAPPEARANCE OF PLAINTIFF IN ERROR—AFFIRMANCE—DAMAGES.

This case was brought to this court by writ of error, and when called in its order there was no appearance for the plaintiff in error. The defendant in error moved the court to open the record, and asked for an affirmance of the judgment and damages for delay, under Civ. Code 1895, § 5594. In compliance with this motion, the record was opened and the case considered. There is no merit whatever in the exceptions of the plaintiff in error, and this fact, taken in connection with his failure to appear and prosecute, shows that he must have brought the case here for delay only. It is ordered that the judgment be affirmed, and that 10 per cent. on the amount of the judgment in the court below be awarded against the plaintiff in error in favor of the defendant in error as damages for bringing the case here for delay only. *Craton v. REED v. STATE. (No. 459.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. June 19, 1907.)

HOMICIDE—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY—MANSLAUGHTER.

There was no evidence in this case to authorize a charge upon the subject of manslaughter or a conviction for that offense.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Hall County; J. J. Kinsey, Judge.

James Reed was convicted of manslaughter, and he brings error. Reversed.

Thompson & Bell and H. H. Dean, for plaintiff in error. W. A. Charters, Sol. Gen. and F. M. Johnson, for the State.

POWELL, J. The deceased was found mortally wounded. The defendant was accused of murdering him. The evidence was entirely circumstantial. Whoever killed the deceased, if, indeed, his death was not accidental, struck him on the head with some blunt instrument, probably a piece of wood. The record discloses none of the circumstances under which the mortal blow was given. The evidence connecting the defendant with the crime was very slight; but it is manifest that he was guilty of murder, if he was the person who committed the unexplained homicide. While manslaughter may be shown by circumstantial evidence, yet in all such cases enough of the actual details of the killing must appear to relieve the transaction from the presumption that it was unprovoked and malicious.

The wisdom of the rule that manslaughter should not be submitted to juries in cases of homicide, where the defendant is guilty of either murder or nothing, is exemplified in the present instance. It appears from the record that the trial judge at first instructed the jury that there was no manslaughter in the case; that the jury should find the defendant guilty of murder, or else they should acquit him. After three days' deliberation the jury reported that they stood six for acquittal and six for conviction. The judge then, upon a change of mind, gave them instructions upon manslaughter; and in a few minutes the jury returned a verdict finding the defendant guilty of that offense. This verdict was manifestly a compromise, wherein twelve men, widely apart, six believing the defendant a murderer, six believing him innocent, gave up their honest convictions and found him guilty of an offense of which, under the law and the evidence, he could not have been guilty at all, in order to relieve themselves of further consideration of the case. Under the well-established rule in this state, a new trial results.

Judgment reversed.

ROUSCH v. GREEN. (No. 338.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. May 28, 1907.)

1. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE—APPEAL—DISMISSAL.

An appeal is a de novo investigation, and should not be dismissed because of the absence of either party to the cause. The action may be dismissed for such absence and failure to prosecute the case on the part of the plaintiff, but the appeal cannot be dismissed for that reason.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 31, Justices of the Peace, § 640.]

2. SAME.

Consequently, where judgment in favor of the defendant had been rendered by a justice of the peace, and the case had been appealed to the superior court, it was error, for nonappearance of the plaintiff, to dismiss the appeal, order an affirmance of the judgment in favor of the defendant, and enter judgment for costs against the plaintiff.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Jones County; H. G. Lewis, Judge.

Action by J. A. Rousch against Thomas Green. Judgment for defendant before a justice. An appeal therefrom to the superior court was dismissed, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

R. Douglas Feagin, for plaintiff in error. Johnson & Johnson, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. Rousch brought a complaint on a note against Thomas Green. Green filed a plea of non est factum, and other pleas in addition thereto. On the trial of the case before the justice, a judgment was rendered in favor of the defendant. The plaintiff appealed the case to the superior court. When the case was called in its order in the superior court, neither the appellant nor his counsel was present. The defendant announced ready and made a motion to dismiss the appeal, and thereupon the court granted the following order and judgment: "Jones Superior Court, October Term, 1906. The within case having been called in its regular order, and there being no appearance for the appellant, it is ordered, upon motion of the defendant, that the appeal be dismissed, the judgment of the lower court be sustained, and that defendant recover of plaintiff all costs of this suit, to be taxed by the clerk." The plaintiff (now plaintiff in error) excepts to this judgment, and alleges that the court erred in entering up the judgment and order above set forth, and in dismissing the appeal, and in ordering the judgment of the justice's court affirmed at plaintiff's cost.

There is but one question presented for adjudication, and that is whether the defendant in a case pending on appeal has the right to dismiss the appeal, or is restricted to a motion to dismiss the case. The objection of the plaintiff in error is limited to this one question, for the reason that there cannot be any error in the judgment of the superior court in affirming the judgment of the justice's court, if the defendant had the right to dismiss the appeal; for, if so, the law itself would affirm the judgment of the justice's court. This has been held in Fagan v. McTier, 81 Ga. 75, 6 S. E. 177; and the same principle is embodied in the concluding portion of section 4470 of the Civil Code of 1895. We think the judge of the superior court erred in dismissing the appeal on the motion of defendant's counsel. Although it is true that the appeal merely suspends judgment, it is nevertheless true that the appeal is a proceeding de novo. So far as concerns the opposite party (the respondent), the present case, when appealed, was an original suit on the promissory note, brought in the superior court. As such original suit, and thus considered, when the plaintiff failed to appear the defendant could do nothing except move to dismiss the action; and, the appeal making the case in the justice's court stand in the same relation to the respondent as if the case had been brought in the superior court and had never been tried, the defendant's rights were no greater than if that had been originally done.

Counsel for defendant in error urges that, if the defendant's only remedy is to dismiss the case on appeal, such a rule would be harsh and unjust, because the plaintiff, in that event, could renew his action, and the judgment of the justice would become a nullity. The learned counsel for defendant in error asks: "How can a defendant in a case like this ever get any benefits from the judgment in the lower court, if he is forced to dismiss the case on appeal?" And he then proceeds to argue: "All the plaintiff would have to do would be to remain away, and thus either force the defendant to dismiss the case on appeal or await his pleasure for trial. The plaintiff can keep on litigating, and worry the defendant until the statute bars him." Even if this be true (though it is not usual for plaintiffs to prosecute fruitless suits), we can only follow the law. By Civ. Code 1895, § 4469: "An appeal to the superior court is a de novo investigation. It brings up the whole record from the court below, and all competent evidence is admissible on the trial thereof, whether adduced on a former trial or not. Either party is entitled to be heard on the whole merits of the case." The judgment appealed from is in no legal sense final. Until the appeal was disposed of, the case was undetermined, and there could be no final judgment on the merits. "The appeal opened the case to a full hearing on all the issues made. Its effect was to suspend the first judgment." Had the judgment been for the plaintiff, it would have "bound the property of the defendant to no greater extent than to prevent its alienation between that time and the signing of the judgment on the appeal." Williams v. McDaniel, 77 Ga. 6. By the provisions of Civ. Code 1895, § 4471, "no person shall be allowed to withdraw an appeal after it shall be entered, but by the consent of the adverse party," and, except for defects in the appeal proceedings, this is the only provision for dismissing an appeal. If the appeal is properly in court, and all the requirements of law with relation to appeals have been complied with, and there is no defect as to time, bond, sureties, etc., the appeal cannot be dismissed by the opposite party, except upon the same terms as any other action originating in the court. And we fail to see any peculiar hardship in this. The defendant on the appeal, if he is the respondent, can move to dismiss the case, and it is true it can be brought again. If the cause was an original action, all the defendant could do would be to dismiss the case, and it, too, could be brought again. It is true that, so far as our investigation extends, in all the cases in which the Supreme Court has held it to be error to dismiss the appeal, the defendant was the appellant. But this does not alter the rule. The reason why in any case it is error to dismiss such an appeal is that both parties have the same right (if the case is properly in court) to be heard upon the merits as if it had never been tried.

The only reason the defendant in error gives why it should be otherwise is that if he had moved to dismiss the case, and it had been dismissed, plaintiff could sue again, whereas, if the appeal can be dismissed, he would hold the judgment rendered by the justice in his favor. This would violate the express provision of section 4469, which makes an appeal a new investigation. Without referring to numerous authorities which amply sustain our view of this subject, we think the question is fully settled in the case of Bateman v. Smith Gin Company, 98 Ga. 219, 25 S. E. 422: "Where a plaintiff fails to appear and prosecute his case, it is, of course, the right of the defendant to move to have the same dismissed for want of prosecution; and this is the only proper course to be pursued, unless there has been filed a plea of set-off, or some other defense in the nature of a cross-action against the plaintiff. In that event, it might be the right of the defendant to proceed to prove his counterclaim and take judgment thereon; but, even then, the merits of the plaintiff's cause of action would not be affected by the rendition of a judgment in the defendant's favor upon his counterclaim." See, also, Griffin Marble Works v. Padgett, 77 Ga. 497, 498; Central Ry. Co. v. Howard, 112 Ga. 917, 38 S. E. 338; Montgomery v. Fouche, 125 Ga. 43, 53 S. E. 767; Furniture Co. v. Edwards, 105 Ga. 240-242, 31 S. E. 161. In Singer Mfg. Co. v. Walker, 77 Ga. 649, the exact question was decided, except that the defendant, instead of the plaintiff, appealed from the judgment of the justice of the peace; but the reason of the decision is stated, and is the same as that upon which we base our judgment.

Error from City Court of Americus; C. R. Crisp, Judge.

Action by the Henry Vogt Machine Company against W. D. Bailey. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

G. R. Ellis, for plaintiff in error. W. A. Dodson, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. The Henry Vogt Machine Company filed a materialman's lien against E. D. Ansley on October 6, 1903; said lien being on the real estate in the city of Americus on which the ice plant of E. D. Ansley was situated, and also the buildings, machinery, etc., embracing the whole plant, including the property claimed by W. D. Bailey. The said machine company foreclosed its materialman's lien and obtained a judgment establishing the lien, and also obtained in the same suit a general judgment against E. D. Ansley. The judgment in rem and the judgment in personam were both obtained on January 20, 1905. The fi. fa. issued thereon was levied on the property of E. D. Ansley, including a certain "Laidlaw, Dunn & Gordon air compressor, with attachments." This specific property was claimed by W. D. Bailey. On the trial of the claim case the jury found the property not subject, and thereupon a motion for a new trial was made by the plaintiff, which was overruled, and the plaintiff excepted.

The undisputed evidence showed that this property claimed by Bailey was bought by Ansley in July, 1903, from the Latta-Martin Pump Company, of Hickory, N. C. The property was not paid for at the time it was purchased, and Ansley gave four notes for the purchase money, which were indorsed by W. D. Bailey, who subsequently paid these notes. When Bailey paid the notes, Ansley told him that he could retain title to the property until he was repaid. Possession of the property, however, was not delivered to Bailey, but remained in Ansley. Neither did Ansley execute any writing or bill of sale to Bailey for the property. It was simply a verbal agreement between Ansley and Bailey. Before the record of its materialman's lien by the machine company, and when a line of credit was extended by it to Ansley, Ansley informed the secretary and treasurer of the machine company that the property in question belonged to Bailey, that Bailey had paid for the property, and that it was his property, and that the title thereto was to remain in him until he was repaid. The trial judge, in his judgment overruling the motion for a new trial, makes the following statement:

"After consideration, the court is of the opinion that the evidence makes out a verbal conditional sale between Ansley and Bailey, claimant, before the filing of materialman's lien by the Henry Vogt Machine Company. In the opinion of the court, the law requires the recording of conditional sales to protect innocent purchasers. The uncontradicted evidence in this case is that, before the lien was ever filed or sued out, Adam Vogt, the secretary and treasurer and general manager of the plaintiff, was given actual notice by Ansley that the property involved in this claim was the property of Bailey, claimant."

The court tried the case on the theory that the facts showed a conditional sale. We do not think that under the facts a conditional sale was shown. It was at most a sale to secure the payment of a debt. To constitute a valid sale of personal property to secure the payment of a debt, so as to be good as against subsequent creditors, a bill of sale to the property must be executed by the vendor to the vendee, and recorded. If such bill of sale is, however, not recorded, but has been actually executed, and the creditor has actual notice of it, then the title conveyed by it shall be good as against the claim of such creditor, whether he be a purchaser or a junior lien holder. Civ. Code 1895, § 2772. It will thus be seen that there must be constructive notice by the record, or actual notice, before the vendee's title would be protected. There might also be a verbal sale, good against subsequent purchasers or creditors, provided the personal property sold was actually delivered into the possession of the vendee, in which event it would be a pledge or pawn to secure the debt. Civ. Code 1895, § 2956. The facts in this case show that there was neither a written bill of sale nor a verbal sale with delivery of possession of the property as a pledge or pawn. There seems to have been simply a verbal understanding or agreement between Ansley and Bailey, by which the title to the property was to remain in Bailey until he was repaid the money which he advanced for the payment of the property. The question of notice, therefore, to the machine company, which the learned judge seemed to rely upon as protecting Bailey, the claimant, we think was wholly immaterial, for the sale of the property in question to Ansley by the Latta-Martin Pump Company and the delivery of the property to him were absolute so far as the rights of third parties were concerned, and the mere verbal agreement between Ansley and Bailey was inoperative as to all parties dealing with Ansley. It follows, therefore, that the property in question was subject both to the materialman's lien of the machine company and to the special judgment thereon, and was also subject to the general judgment of the machine company against Ansley. We therefore think that the trial court erred in not granting a new trial.

1. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT—DECLARATIONS OF AGENT—PROOF OF AGENCY.

Primarily the declarations of an alleged agent are not admissible to prove the agency. If the agency be otherwise prima facie proved, such declarations then become admissible in corroboration. Jones v. Harrell, 35 S. E. 690, 110 Ga. 380, and citations.

3. SAME—EVIDENCE OF OTHER TRANSACTIONS.

Where it is sought to show that the defendant's husband was her agent in transactions with the plaintiff, evidence of transactions with other persons, in which he, with her subsequent ratification, acted as her agent, is not admissible to establish the agency in the transactions with the plaintiff. *Conyers v. Error from City Court of Atlanta; H. M. Reid, Judge.

Action by E. H. Duncan against C. R. and L. M. Morris, administrators. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Affirmed.

The principal points made by the plaintiffs in error and decided adversely are these: By reason of a default, the law implied, as against the defendants (now plaintiffs in error), a conclusive admission of all the facts alleged in the petition, and he was allowed to contest before the jury only the amount of the damages. The plaintiff testified that the value of the goods taken by the plaintiff was so much, and described the damage done to the goods. The defendant having died, and his personal representatives being parties, the point was made that the plaintiff was not a competent witness to prove these facts. The suit being for the malicious abuse of legal process, the judge charged the jury that compensatory damages for the plaintiff's wounded feelings (but not punitive damages, the defendant being dead) might be allowed. The point is made that the plaintiff did not testify that her feelings had been wounded; also that under the circumstances damages for wounded feelings were not recoverable. The suit was originally against several defendants, all of whom, the petition alleged, resided in Fulton county. Subsequently all the defendants, except the administrators of Morris, were stricken from the suit. Several terms after this had occurred (the case in the meantime having gone to the Supreme Court and having been remanded to the court below for new trial) the defendants, on the last trial of the case, attempted to prove that neither Morris nor his administrators had ever lived in Fulton county, but had ever been residents of Dekalb county. The trial court refused to permit this to be proved. There was no plea to the jurisdiction. The court charged the jury that they might, in their discretion, add interest to the amount of actual damage they should find in the plaintiff's favor. The point is made that interest during the pendency of the suit should have been excluded, as the delay in getting the case to final trial had been occasioned by the plaintiff's laches.

W. H. Terrell, for plaintiffs in error. Ben. J. Conyers, for defendant in error.

POWELL, J. The defendants, through their able and untiring counsel, have made a gallant fight, especially so in the light of the handicap of the default encountered at the beginning of the case. See the reports of the same case, sub nom. Mullins v. Matthews, 122 Ga. 286, 50 S. E. 101, and Morris v. Duncan, 126 Ga. 467, 54 S. E. 1045. But the end has come at last; for, after a close and careful examination of the record, we find no error, and therefore affirm the judgment recovered by the plaintiff.

Judgment affirmed.

ATLANTIC COAST LINE R. CO. v. HART LUMBER CO. (No. 354.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. May 24, 1907.)

1. PARTIES—SUBSTITUTION.

A plaintiff, where it becomes necessary for the purpose of enforcing his rights, may amend his petition by substituting the name of another person, suing for his use.

(a) The right, for the protection of which such amendment is allowable, need not be such a right as is capable of direct enforcement by the original plaintiff, either in law or in equity, provided it be substantial.

(b) Upon such an amendment being made, a cause of action must be shown to exist in favor of the nominal party.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 37, Parties, § 88.]

2. PLEADING—RULING ON DEMURRER—WAIVER BY AMENDMENT.

A party who submits to a ruling on pleadings, by filing an amendment to meet the objection, waives his right to except on the ground that the amendment was not necessary. Brantley v. Southerland, 57 S. E. 960, 1 Ga. App. 804; Glover v. Railway Co., 32 S. E. 876, 107 Ga. 34.

3. SAME—PLEA—CERTAINTY.

An affirmative plea, lacking in certainty and showing no reason why the defendant cannot make it more certain, should, when the defects are specifically pointed out by demurrer, be stricken, unless amended.

4. WRIT OF ERROR—REVIEW—SCOPE.

Where the judgment is reversed on account of decisive errors in the initial pleadings, alleged errors occurring on the trial will not be considered.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, § 3831.]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Nashville; H. B. Peeples, Judge.

Action by the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company against the Hart Lumber Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

Hendricks, Smith & Christian, for plaintiff in error. Bule & Knight, for defendant in error.

POWELL, J. The plaintiff, the railroad company, claimed that the defendant, the lumber company, had obtained some railroad iron under a contract to rent and return it, or, if any portion was not redelivered on demand, to pay the value thereof. These contracts were not made with the plaintiff that brought the suit, but with the Brunswick & Western Railroad Company and with the Savannah, Florida & Western Railroad Company. At the trial the plaintiff offered to amend by striking its name as plaintiff, and by inserting the names of the other two railroad companies as plaintiffs, suing for its use. The court refused to allow this amendment. The plaintiff then tendered amendment striking its name as plaintiff and inserting the name of the Brunswick & Western Railroad Company as plaintiff, suing for its use; and the court also refused this. Among other things, the defendant pleaded that it had rented some iron, but that the same had been checked up and returned. To this plea the plaintiff demurred, on the ground that "it is in the nature of a plea of payment, and the party to whom, the place where, and the date, and the amount of the rail returned on same, is not set forth as required by law," and that "it is so vague and indefinite until it amounts to no plea or defense whatever." The court overruled this demurrer. Upon demurrer to the petition for lack of certainty, the court required an amendment of the plaintiff. The plaintiff amended to meet the ruling, and now excepts on the ground that the court erred in requiring the amendment. The trial proceeded, resulted in a nonsuit, and several errors are assigned.

1. Ordinarily new and distinct parties cannot be added by amendment; but there are exceptions to this rule. One exception is that provided by Civ. Code 1895, § 5105, which allows a plaintiff, when it becomes necessary for the purpose of enforcing his rights, to substitute the name of another person in his stead, suing for his use. Since such an amendment is allowable for the designated purpose "of enforcing the rights of such plaintiff," some showing should be made to the court that some right of the original plaintiff is connected with the cause of action he desires to assert in the name of the nominal party to be substituted; but this right need not be so perfect as to be capable of direct enforcement, either in law or in equity. It is analogous to the practice in ejectment, where the real plaintiff is allowed to lay demises in the name of any living person, and recover upon any of such demises, though he be unable to connect his title by legal evidence with the title of the person in whose name he recovers, provided that the court is satisfied that he bona fide claims under such person, or has some connection with his title. See Couch v. Turner, 17 Ga. 489; Shanks v. White, 36 Ga. 432; Harper v. Wilkes, 76 Ga. 106; Kinsey v. Sensbough, 17 Ga. 540. If the court is satisfied, by the showing made, that the original plaintiff has directly or indirectly bought or otherwise acquired the substituted plaintiff's cause of action, or a substantial interest therein, he should not refuse such an amendment, though, from failure to comply with legal prerequisites, or through absence of formal proof, the plaintiff cannot establish a full legal connection therewith. Usually the statement of counsel, or the oath of the party that he does claim such an interest, in the absence of a counter showing, is sufficient. After the amendment is made, the pleadings must show a cause of action in the nominal plaintiff, and, to authorize recovery, the proof must establish it. Therefore an amendment which would have the effect of substituting as plaintiff a person who, under the pleadings, would not have even an apparent right to sue, should be refused. This is the holding of the Supreme Court in Mitchell v. Railway Co., 111 Ga. 771, 36 S. E. 971, 51 L. R. A. 622 (2), and in Norwich Union Insurance Co. v. Wellhouse, 113 Ga. 970, 39 S. E. 397. The contention of the defendant in error that these decisions negative the privilege of an original plaintiff, who has not the strictly legal right to sue, to amend by substituting in his stead and for his use a plaintiff who has the apparent legal right, is not well founded. In this view, the court did not err in refusing the amendment wherein the plaintiff sought to substitute two separate and distinct plaintiffs, suing for his use, but did err in refusing the amendment offering to substitute the Brunswick & Western Railroad Company alone.

2. The proposition announced in the second headnote, being well settled, needs no discussion.

3. The court ought to have sustained the plaintiff's demurrer to that paragraph of the plea which set up redelivery; and, in the absence of an amendment, that much of the defense should have been stricken. In such a plea the defendant should allege with such reasonable certainty as he may be able to do the time and place of redelivery, the person to whom made, and the amounts delivered in each installment, if the delivery was by installments. If for any reason these facts cannot be set up in detail, the plea should show the court some excuse for failure of strict compliance.

4. Where the reviewing court finds reversible error in the rulings of the trial court as to the initial pleadings, it is not usual to look further into the record for the consideration of errors assigned to rulings upon the trial, since a new trial necessarily results. See Cagle v. Shepard, 1 Ga. App. 192, 57 S. E. 946, and cases cited. Counsel for defendant in error in their brief have argued as to what they consider errors made against them by the court in ruling on the demurrer to the plaintiff's petition; but, in the absence of a cross-bill, these matters are not properly before this court.

Judgment reversed.

AUSTIN v. M. FERST'S SONS & CO.
(No. 856.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. May 24, 1907.)

1. PLEADING—PETITION—DEFECTS—WAIVER.

All exceptions to petitions and pleas shall be taken at the first term. If a plaintiff's petition is insufficient in law, or for any reason is not sufficiently full to enable the defendant to plead thereto, the defendant must make his objections at the first term, or he will be held to have waived any objection which can be cured by amendment.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 39, Pleading, § 1360.]

2. SAME—AMENDMENT.

There was no error in allowing the plaintiff's petition to be amended by adding the name of his counsel. Currie v. Deaver, 57 S. E. 897, 1 Ga. App. 11; Gillis v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. (Ga.) 56 S. E. 1003.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 39, Pleading, § 676.]

3. MOTIONS—ORDER ALLOWING AMENDMENT—FAILURE TO PASS—EFFECT.

The failure to pass an order allowing an amendment was immaterial, when the trial judge, in his order overruling a demurrer, used the language: "The demurrer is overruled after amendment allowed"—the amendment proposed being clearly stated in writing, fully entitled in the cause, and signed by counsel, and the only omission being the signature of the judge. When the paper containing such an amendment has been entered upon the minutes, and such minutes have been approved and signed by the judge, the writing is fully identified, and the amendment authorized.

4. PLEADING—AMENDMENT—PETITION.

There was no error in allowing the petition to be amended by adding thereto the name of the plaintiff's attorney, nor by alleging that the account was due and unpaid, and that the defendants were a partnership composed of named individuals. Perkins Co. v. Shewmake, 48 S. E. 832, 119 Ga. 617. The words "M. Ferst's Sons & Co." do not import a corporation.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 12, Corporations, § 2063.]

5. EVIDENCE—STATEMENTS IN PLEADINGS.

Evidence that the defendant admitted that the account sued upon was correct is not rebutted by the defendant's plea, although sworn to. The pleadings only form the issue. Admissions therein contained may be used against the party making them, but affirmative statements made by him in his own behalf have no probative value, when in conflict with sworn testimony delivered on the trial. The proof submitted was sufficient to prove the correctness of the plaintiff's account.

6. TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—SUFFICIENCY.

The charge of the court was not, for the reasons assigned, erroneous.

DENNEY v. STATE. (No. 437.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. July 19, 1907.)

CHATTEL MORTGAGES—SALE OF MORTGAGED PROPERTY—EVIDENCE.

The gist of the offense under Pen. Code 1895, § 671, is the fraudulent sale or disposition of mortgaged personal property, and loss thereby sustained by the mortgagee. The statute requires proof of both elements of the offense. Loss, in its legal sense, was not shown, where the only evidence on the subject was the general statement by the prosecutor that he had lost "a good deal of valuable time, and had to employ a lawyer to foreclose the mortgage," without stating the value of such time, or the amount paid or promised the lawyer for his services.

R. J. Denney was convicted of a sale of mortgaged personalty, and brings error. Reversed.

W. S. Paris, for plaintiff in error. W. A. Charters, Sol. Gen., for the State.

HILL, C. J. The plaintiff in error was convicted in the superior court of Rabun county of the wrongful sale of mortgaged property, in violation of Pen. Code 1895, § 671. There was no conflict in the evidence on the trial, and the following facts were shown: The prosecutor indorsed a note for the plaintiff in error for $150 to enable him to borrow this sum from one Hilliard York. To indemnify the prosecutor as surety on the note the plaintiff in error executed a mortgage to him on two mules. The prosecutor testified: "I took the mortgage to indemnify me and save me harmless from loss in the event I had to pay the note we gave to York." The plaintiff in error failed to pay the note at maturity, and York brought suit thereon, recovered a judgment against both principal and surety, and had an execution issued and levied on the property of the plaintiff in error, who was the maker of the note, and sold it; but the amount realized failed to satisfy the execution in full. Thereupon the prosecutor foreclosed his mortgage, and, the sheriff failing to find the mortgaged property, the prosecutor indicted the plaintiff in error. After the indictment had been returned by the grand jury, the plaintiff in error paid off the balance of the debt for which the prosecutor was liable as surety. The only evidence as to the prosecutor's loss was the following statement made by him: "I suffered loss by the sale of the mortgaged property. I lost a good deal of valuable time, and I had to employ a lawyer to foreclose the mortgage." The proof failed to show the value of the prosecutor's time in dollars and cents, or that he paid a lawyer anything to foreclose the mortgage.

It may be remarked, as illustrating the question of intent, that the defendant told the prosecutor that he had sold the mules. We think that under this evidence the conviction of the defendant was wholly unsupported, and therefore contrary to law. The gist of the offense, under this section of the Code, is the fraudulent sale or disposition of mortgaged personal property, and loss thereby sustained by the holder of the mortgage. In other words, there must be a fraudulent sale, and consequent loss, before this offense exists. The first element of the offense might have been inferred in this case from the fact that the sheriff failed to find the property which had been mortgaged to indemnify the surety against loss; but the evidence utterly fails to show that the sale of the mortgaged property resulted in any loss to the surety. If the evidence shows that the prosecutor, as such surety, incurred any pecuniary loss in prosecuting his remedy against the mortgagor, or in protecting himself as such surety, this would be such loss as would be covered by the statute; but the general statement that the only loss incurred by him was that of his valuable time, and the employment of a lawyer to foreclose the mortgage, where the proof fails to show definitely the pecuniary loss in some amount to the prosecutor, such general statement of loss is entirely too indefinite, vague, and uncertain to constitute proof of loss as intended by this penal statute. Under the undisputed evidence, the mortgage in this case was given to the surety to indemnify and save him harmless from loss in the event he had to pay the note upon which he was surety; and the evidence showed that this contingency never happened, for the entire debt was fully paid by the maker of the note, and the surety incurred no loss whatever in connection with his suretyship.

For the reasons above stated, we conclude that the court erred in not granting the defendant a new trial.

Judgment reversed.

CABLE CO. v. HANCOCK. (No. 317.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. May 24, 1907.)

1. SALE—OFFER TO PURCHASE—APPROVAL.

If a traveling salesman, who has no authority to close a sale, takes from a prospective purchaser a written contract agreeing to buy an article on named terms and conditions, but by stipulations in the writing the contract is subject to the approval of the agent's principal, the writing amounts to a mere offer, and is unilateral, until the approval contemplated has been duly made.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 43, Sales, § 46.]

2. FRAUDS. STATUTE OF—CONTRACT—APPROVAL IN WRITING.

In such a case, if the contract relates to "goods, wares or merchandise to the amount of $50 or more," and is therefore within the purview of the statute of frauds, the approval contemplated must be in writing before the contract becomes mutual.

3. SALES—OFFER TO PURCHASE—WITHDRAWAL.

In such a case the offer may be withdrawn at any time before the contract becomes mutual.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Athens; Howell Cobb, Judge.

Action by the Cable Company against A. O. Hancock. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

The plaintiff's traveling salesman induced the defendant to buy a piano, but the salesman did not have the authority to make a binding contract of sale. He took, however, a written instrument, signed by the defendant, reciting that the plaintiff had agreed to sell him a described piano for a given sum, to be paid at a named date in the future; the condition being annexed that the title should remain in the seller until paid for. It was expressly recited, however, that the contract was subject to the approval of the plaintiff. The piano was already in the defendant's custody, having been previously left with him on trial. The salesman carried the contract at once to the plaintiff's office, and turned it over to the manager in charge, who stated that it was satisfactory; that the company would accept it. The contract was then delivered to the bookkeeper, who entered it on the books. Afterwards, on the same day, the defendant by telephone told the plaintiff's manager, at its office, that he had decided to cancel the order. The manager replied that he had already placed the contract on the books, and that he could not accept a cancellation. No written approval or acceptance of the contract was shown. The defendant tendered back the piano, refusing to recognize the contract. The plaintiff sued on the contract. The piano was worth more than $50. The trial judge directed a verdict for the defendant, and the plaintiff excepted.

Jno. J. Strickland and Thos. F. Green, for plaintiff in error. Erwin & Erwin, for defendant in error.

POWELL, J. (after stating the foregoing facts). The usual and implicit power of a traveling salesman is merely to take orders, offers to buy, and not to make completed contracts of sale. Such was the fact in this case. Even in the absence of a condition in the written instrument itself requiring approval or acceptance by the principal, the law would have implied such a condition in the transaction. The writing (although in form, save only for the clause requiring approval, a binding contract) needed something to make it complete, viz., the acceptance of its terms by the opposite party; for, until the opposite party agreed to sell on the terms in the writing mentioned, the promisor's agreement to buy and to pay was without consideration. Until the owners of the piano made a valid promise to sell, the consideration contemplated for the promise to buy and to pay was unilateral, and amounted only to a mere offer. This principle is now so well established by a large volume of authority as not to require specific citations.

2. The price of the piano was more than $50, and therefore the transaction was within the purview of the statute of frauds, and no oral approval or acceptance of the contract by the seller would render it binding on him. Until the seller became bound to the contract by a writing, or by some act which would take the transaction out of the statute of frauds, the buyer could not have held him to its terms; and it therefore was lacking in the essential element of mutuality. Sivell v. Hogan, 119 Ga. 171, 46 S. E. 67. Delivery of the piano under the contract, and acceptance thereof by the buyer, would have been sufficient to make the contract complete. The buyer's custody of the piano under the circumstances stated, however, did not have this effect. Compare Loyd v. Wight, 20 Ga. 574, 65 Am. Dec. 636; Id., 25 Ga. 215; Brunswick Gro. Co. v. Lamar, 116 Ga. 1, 42 S. E. 368.

3. Until the contract became mutual, the buyer had the right to withdraw his assent. Therefore he had the right to withdraw it at any time before the seller entered his written approval. He exercised this right, and the verdict directed in his favor was therefore demanded. See Sivell v. Hogan, 119 Ga. 173, 46 S. E. 67; Atlanta Buggy Co. v. Hess Spring Co., 124 Ga. 338, 52 S. E. 613, 4 L. R. A. (N. S.) 431.

Judgment affirmed.

BEDINGFIELD & CO. v. BATES ADVERTISING CO. (No. 303.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. May 28, 1907.)

1. PLEADING—ANSWER—STRIKING.

While it is error to strike an entire plea when any portion thereof is good, still an answer of the defendant may properly be stricken when the denials contained in the answer to a petition filed in orderly and distinct paragraphs are entirely inconsistent with the admissions made by him in the same connection.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 39, Pleading, §§ 1093-1094.]

2. SAME—CONSTRUCTION.

Where a defendant denies the allegation of indebtedness on an account sued on, but at the same time admits all of the averments of the plaintiff's petition necessary to constitute such indebtedness, the admission, and not the denial, must prevail, as pleadings are to be taken most strongly against the pleader.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 39, Pleading, § 66.]

3. SAME.

Where a petition sets forth a cause of action in orderly paragraphs, and the plea and answer thereto set up no ground of defense, the court may, at any stage of the trial, give the case such direction as will disregard the plea.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Macon; Robt. Hodges, Judge.

Action by the Bates Advertising Company against Bedingfield & Co. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Affirmed.

Nottingham & Cabaniss, for plaintiffs in error. Steed & Ryals, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. The Bates Advertising Company sued Bedingfield & Co. for a balance of an account arising upon a written contract. The defendants except to the striking of their answer on demurrer; and the only question for our consideration is whether the judge of the city court erred in sustaining the demurrer.

The Bates Advertising Company, in its petition, averred that Bedingfield & Co. were indebted $135 and interest, upon an account and contract. Attached to the petition were a bill of particulars and the contract relied upon. The bill of particulars specified that Bedingfield & Co. was indebted for "services rendered on mail service work (cancellation clause at the rate of $15 for each piece), $180," and were entitled to credit for payments of $15 December 30th, January 30th, and February 27th, respectively, making $45 in all, and leaving a balance due of $135. The plaintiff also attached, as part of its petition, three letters received from the defendants, inclosing the above payments, in one of which the inclosure is referred to as "being this month's payment for services rendered," in another as "being second payment of our account," and in the third and last letter the inclosure is described as "third payment on our contract." The cause of action was predicated upon the contract, which was especially pleaded and attached to the petition, together with a letter from the defendants, availing themselves of a conditional release provided for in the contract. The order or contract relied upon by the plaintiff (and admitted by the defendants in their answer) is as follows:

"Macon, Ga., Oct. 24, 1904.

"The Bates Advertising Company, Spruce and Williams Sts., New York City—Gentlemen: You may enter our order for a special advertising service to be sent out 12 times during a period of 12 months to a list of 3,000 names. This service is to consist of a special business-getting plan covering 12 mailings; all these mailings to be fac-simile type-written letters, large illustrated cards, or special illustrated folders, at your discretion. The price of service to be $80 per month for a period of 12 months. It is understood that the order of mailing and the character of matter is to be whatever in your own judgment will produce the best results. It is understood that all reading matter, sketches, designs, and dummies are to be submitted at one time for our approval or criticism. Should we for any reason decide at this time not to proceed further with the work, we are to be released from this order, on condition that we return all matter and designs to you within 10 days and pay for the work at the rate of $15 for each form of letter, card, or folder. It is understood that the above price includes the formulating of the business-getting plan, the preparation of reading matter, making designs, making necessary electrotypes, printing all matter, folding (in the case of letters, inclosing in envelopes and sealing), addressing and fixing of stamps (but does not include postage), and mailing. If matter is to be mailed from our office, these prices are f. o. b. cars, New York. This price does not include letterheads and envelopes, which will be furnished from our regular stock, but does include inserting individuals' names at the heads of the letters.

"Yours truly,

"[Signed] Bedingfield & Co."

Under the clause allowing a conditional release, the defendants, on December 6, 1904, wrote the plaintiffs: "We fear that the expenditure involved in getting out the circulars as contemplated by you in the sketch submitted to us would be larger, after figuring the postage, etc., than we feel warranted in expending. We will therefore pay you for the sketches submitted at the price stipulated in the contract."

The defendants denied indebtedness in any sum, but admitted that they entered into the contract above set forth. They specially pleaded that the plaintiff did not furnish them with letters and advertising matter specially designed for them, or specially designed by Mr. Charles Austin Bates. The answer insisted that the matter furnished the defendants was of like character and kind with that furnished to other parties with whom the plaintiff had contracted. The defendants further admitted that they decided and elected not to proceed further under the contract, and averred that the forms submitted to them were of such nature and character that they did not feel warranted in expending the large sum necessary to mail them to their customers. They averred that on December 6th at the time they declined to proceed further with the advertising scheme, they had not had opportunity to thoroughly investigate the character of the matter submitted to them by the plaintiff, other than to see that the same was of poor quality and not the work the plaintiff had contracted to furnish. The defendants admitted the contract, the submission of specimen, and the payments, and admitted writing all the letters attached to the plaintiff's petition, but insisted that the letters were not special letters prepared for their exclusive use, and especially that they were not prepared by Charles Austin Bates, and asked to recoup the $45 paid by them. The only ground of defense set up by the defendants, then, was that the plaintiff failed to comply with the terms of the contract, in that the form submitted had not been specially prepared for defendants by Charles Austin Bates.

The plaintiff demurred to this defense, as variously repeated in the fourth, fifth, sixth, seventh, ninth, and twelfth paragraphs of the answer, on the ground that the provisions embodied in the defense, not being expressed in the written contract and being in conflict with it, constituted an attempt to add to, vary, and contradict by parol the terms of a valid written instrument. Upon inspection of the pleadings we think there can be no question that this ground of the demurrer was well taken and properly sustained. The answer does not seek to reform the contract (and, indeed, the city court had no jurisdiction to do so); nor does it set up that there was any fraud, accident, or mistake; nor does it allege that the provisions sought to be added were embodied in a written contemporaneous agreement or in a subsequent parol agreement, or that the written contract is either incomplete or ambiguous. The provisions which the answer sought to add are in conflict with the written contract, which distinctly provides that the character of the matter is to be whatever in plaintiff's judgment will produce the best results, and there is nothing in the contract providing that "matter of like character and kind" should not be furnished by plaintiff to others, nor that the matter furnished to the defendants should be the work of Charles Austin Bates. These new and distinct provisions were limitations on the rights of plaintiff under the contract, and could not be added without reforming it.

The plaintiff also demurred on the ground that the answer distinctly admitted that the reading matter and sketches for designs were submitted to the defendants for approval, and the work was approved and accepted and agreed to be paid for at the less price under the contract; the defendants electing the smaller price on account of the expense, and thereby waiving any defects which had been discovered. In the seventh paragraph of the answer, notice at the time of submission of the character of the work is admitted, because it is averred that the defendants saw that the work was of poor quality, and not of the kind the plaintiff had contracted to furnish. We think, therefore, that as to this ground the demurrer was properly sustained. It is true that the answer denies acceptance, but it clearly admits all the facts necessary to constitute an acceptance, to wit, the submission of the matter for approval and the writing and sending of the letter making the election and giving the reason why they preferred to pay $180, rather than $960. The defendants' denial of acceptance being inconsistent with the facts admitted by them, there was no error in striking on demurrer that portion of defendants' plea. "Where a defendant, in his answer to a petition filed in orderly and distinct paragraphs, * * * does not undertake to deny allegations in the petition which are entirely inconsistent with the truth of the denial set up in the answer, and the plaintiff moves to strike the answer on this ground, it is not error for the court to strike the answer after giving the defendant ample opportunity to amend the same." Burns v. Condon, 108 Ga. 794, 33 S. E. 907. "The defendant could not both admit and deny its allegation of its indebtedness to the plaintiff on the account sued on; and, as its pleadings are to be taken more strongly against it, it is the admission, and not the denial, which must prevail." Williams Mfg. Co. v. Warner Refining Co., 125 Ga. 411, 54 S. E. 96.

The plaintiff further demurred to the answer, as we think properly, upon the ground that the defendants, after admitting the writing of the letter of December 6th, attempt in their answer to set up other reasons for declining to go on with the service than that expressed in their letter. It seems to us that the reason why they agreed to pay the very amount for which they are being sued would be immaterial in any view of the case; but, however this may be, as they admit the letter, they are estopped from setting up other reasons not assigned in that letter. Fenn v. Ware, 100 Ga. 563, 28 S. E. 238; Cowdery v. Greenlee, 128 Ga. 786, 55 S. E.

918 (1). "Where a party gives a reason for his conduct and decision touching anything involved in a controversy, he cannot, after litigation has begun, change his ground and put his conduct upon another and different consideration. He is not permitted to thus mend his hold. He is estopped from doing it by a settled principle of law." 2 Herman on Estoppel, 947.

The demurrer to the answer on the ground that the defenses that the sketches submitted were not made by Charles Austin Bates, and were not specially made for the defendants, were insufficient in law, was properly sustained, because the defendants' admission showed that under the election made by them the sketches submitted were to be returned to the plaintiff at the end of ten days, and under the election it was immaterial whether these sketches were the work of Bates, or whether they were similar in character to other sketches sent out by the plaintiff. We see no error in sustaining the special demurrers to which we have referred; and when the special defenses had been thus stricken, as there was nothing left in the answer except denials inconsistent with the admissions, these, too, could properly be stricken, under the principles so clearly announced in the Williams Case, 125 Ga. 408, 54 S. E. 95, to which we have previously referred, and the judgment rendered was an inevitable consequence.

We find no error in the rulings complained of. Neither rescission nor recoupment was properly pleaded; and, indeed, neither could be pleaded, under the admissions made by the defendants. The defendants, according to the answer, got nothing for their money; but, if they were bitten by an empty scheme, it was their own fault. They admit the contract, the submission of the sketches, and the letters confirmatory of the first contract and affording evidence of the second. They expressly accepted the work at the price stipulated in the contract. They filed no plea of failure of consideration. The litigation reached its only legitimate termination.

Judgment affirmed.

VIRGINIA BRIDGE & IRON CO. v.
CRAFTS. (No. 42.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. June 19, 1907.)

1. TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—APPLICABILITY TO ISSUES.

In no trial should the scope of the court's instructions to the jury be more limited or more extensive than the range of the relevant evidence properly submitted therein. The charge of the court should be pertinent and applicable to the issues presented by the evidence, and it is error to charge the jury upon a theory which is not sustained by evidence.

2. SAME.

Where one of the issues was no contract, or a certain definite contract, charges applicable to the nature of a contract which had not been shown to exist were properly refused.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 46, Trial, § 596.]

3. CONTRACTS—CONSTRUCTION—LEGALITY OF OBJECT.

A contract will be construed as made for a legal, rather than for an illegal, purpose; and the more especially when such contract is attacked by a party thereto who has been benefited thereby.

7. SAME.

The judgment refusing a new trial is not, for any reason assigned, erroneous. (Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Atlanta; H. M. Reid, Judge.

Action by the Virginia Bridge & Iron Company against George H. Crafts. From the judgment, plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Arthur Heyman, Dorsey, Brewster, Howell & McDaniel, and Francis L. Eyles, for plaintiff in error. Westmoreland Bros. and Hamilton Douglas, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. The Virginia Bridge & Iron Company brought their action against George

H. Crafts in the city court of Atlanta to recover a balance of $2,850.66 alleged to be due on an account for structural material furnished to the defendant, who was a contractor and builder of bridges. Defendant admitted the correctness of the account, but pleaded a counterclaim, by way of set-off (averring that the plaintiff had no office or place of business, or assets, in Georgia), that the plaintiff "is indebted" to defendant in the sum of $3,836 for failure to comply with certain agreements made between plaintiff and defendant as to sharing in the work of building certain bridges in the Vicksburg National Military Park, in the state of Mississippi, let out under competitive bids by the United States government.

The defendant, in his extended answer, avers that in 1903 and 1904 both plaintiff and defendant were in the business of taking contracts to build both substructure and superstructure of bridges; that plaintiff, in addition to being a contractor, was also a manufacturer of structural steel superstructures; that defendant made a special feature of building substructures, such as excavations, concrete bases, brick piers and walls, etc., commonly called the "substructure"; that this fact was known to plaintiff, who often let out the substructure work of bridges let to it by entire contract; that in January, 1903, when the United States called for bids looking to the construction of certain bridges in the Military Park, negotiations were entered into between plaintiff and defendant that they should so arrange their bids as that defendant should put in the only bid, with the understanding and agreement that plaintiff should have the steel work, or superstructure, and defendant the other work, or substructure, on whatever contracts might be awarded by the United States government to defendant; that the bid so made by defendant was partly for the use and benefit of plaintiff and at prices for the respective portions agreed on by the parties before the bid was submitted; that on February 12, 1903, the contract to build three bridges was awarded to defendant, and he at once placed an order with plaintiff for the steel work, in accordance with their agreement, but subsequently (February 18, 1903) the government, through its officers, decided to reject all the bids and call for new ones, and specified that the estimate of cost for building both superstructure and substructure should be made separately, in each bid, these second bids to be opened April 16, 1903, in Vicksburg.

It is further averred that on March 16, 1903, the president of the plaintiff company addressed a letter to defendant, saying, "If it is your desire to take the matter up along the lines we worked together before, * * * we know of no special objection;" and asked what method of procedure defendant would advise; the meaning of said letter (defendant avers) being to arrange some plan by which plaintiff and defendant could co-operate in securing one or more of the dozen bridges to be let by the government, so that one could furnish the substructure and the other the superstructure. Defendant had extended negotiations with Vernon H. Smith, the representative of plaintiff, and submitted to Smith the figures and calculations which were the basis of the bids made by plaintiff at the second letting, and under which plaintiff, in his own name, finally obtained the contracts and erected three of the bridges let by the government. Defendant avers that on the night of April 15, 1903, before submitting bids next day, in Vicksburg, plaintiff and Smith met, had a long interview, examined plans, estimates, figures, and prints; that Smith made an agreement with defendant to take defendant's estimates, submit a bid in plaintiff's name, and that defendant should have the substructure work at the figures submitted, and plaintiff the superstructure of whatever contracts might be awarded to plaintiff. Defendant, being on the ground with all equipments and implements for work (having just finished some similar work), could do the work cheaper than other contractors, and this fact was a mutual inducement for plaintiff and defendant to work in concert; and defendant then and there disclosed and turned over to the plaintiff's said agent his estimates, prices, calculations of quotations, etc., to be used by plaintiff in preparing his bid. He says, further, that immediately on said contract being made with the United States government by plaintiff to construct three bridges, known as Nos. 4, 5, and 8, in said park, defendant offered to perform his part of said contract, and demanded his right to do the substructure work at the price named for same in plaintiff's bid, all of which was denied and refused by plaintiff, who awarded the substructure to another contractor (Rubush) at a cheaper price, all to his injury and damage as aforesaid. To the defendant's answer were attached tabulated statements showing how he would be entitled to damages, and for which he prays set-off, amounting to $3,856, besides interest from October 1, 1903.

The jury found for the plaintiff $837.75, upon which judgment was entered. Plaintiff moved for new trial on the several grounds stated in the record. At the hearing of the motion the trial judge passed the following order: "Defendant having voluntarily written off the sum of $144.23 from the set-off found in his favor, leaving the amount due the plaintiff the sum of $981.98, the motion for new trial is hereby overruled and denied."

In the voluminous record there is evidence for the defendant that the first letting, which was afterwards rejected by the government, took place as alleged; that afterwards, on the night of April 15, 1903, before the second letting next day, plaintiff's agent, Vernon H. Smith, and the defendant, met in the latter's room at the hotel in Vicksburg to confer as to methods of submitting bids; that plaintiff's agent said his principal was chiefly a manufacturer of steel structural work and did not care for foundation work, though it did not refuse it; that defendant had figures made out in detail on substructure, and Smith some detailed figures on superstructure; that Smith stated that he had compared certain figures he had from his company, on both substructure and superstructure work, with the plans of the engineer on substructure work, and did not consider them reliable; that, if defendant would show him his estimates on quantities and prices, he (Smith) would use those prices in bidding on the substructure, and, if he got any contract on any of the subwork of the bridges, he would turn the subwork over to the defendant. In bidding for the entire bridge Smith agreed to put his separate bid for the subwork 1 per cent. higher than the defendant's bid, and the defendant was to put his price for superstructure higher than the plaintiff's. Both submitted bids. There was no agreement as to what should be done in the event defendant got the award for superstructure and substructure. If defendant got the award for superstructure, then he was to do it; and there was nothing said as to where he should get the superstructure materials. "I was not presumed to get the superstructure work, as I was to bid above him." Some time afterwards the defendant and Smith met in Atlanta, and for the first time the defendant learned that the plaintiff had given the contract to Rubush. When pressed for an explanation, he said that the bid had named 4 months as the time for completion of the work, and that he had to make the contract in such a time as that the substructure work must be done in 2½ months, and that he did not know that the defendant could do it in that time; that the other party had agreed to do it in 2½ months, and he had given him the contract.

The plaintiff, in its testimony, through its representatives, denied that any such agreement as defendant alleged ever took place in Vicksburg, and testified that the first agreement, governing the first bid, came to an end with the rejection by the government of the first letting; that the naked suggestion in the first letter of its president (Robertson) to Crafts was a suggestion only, and no subsequent negotiations ever ripened it into a contract; that, after the bids had been formulated and submitted, Vernon Smith, agent of plaintiff, was informed by the government officer superintending construction that, if the time mentioned in plaintiff's substructure work bid were shortened, he could recommend acceptance as to three bridges; that said officer told him that Rubush could do it in less time; that Smith immediately went to see Rubush, and was assured that the latter could do the substructure in 2½ months; that he then shortened the time in his bid to correspond, and his bid was then recommended and finally closed by contract with the government. He (Smith) did not give the contract to Rubush at that time, but merely got a basis to rely on; had not closed with Rubush at time of meeting with Crafts at the latter's house in Atlanta, but did afterwards; was willing at that time to give the work to Crafts, if the latter had proposed to do the work in the same time as Rubush; and had also lessened his calculation as to quantities. There was some agreement among the bridge builders and contractors in the line and intendment of allowing certain work to go to certain individuals without underbidding on the part of others. Defendant did not participate in this scheme. After the rejection of the first bids there was correspondence between Crafts and Smith about certain changes in tracings and estimates which Crafts wanted to use at the second letting. Smith erased the name of Virginia Bridge Company on blue prints, and substituted the name of George H. Crafts; this because, says Smith, "I took my tracings to our draftsman and notified him, at Crafts' request, of certain changes to be made in them." The parties differed in respect to the size and amount of steel joists, and perhaps in other respects.

The business Crafts had with the witness (Smith) when they met at the Vicksburg hotel was "to get the blue prints we had prepared for him." In turning over these plans to Crafts, he was simply carrying out the agreement of the previous letting. In case this was arranged, he (Crafts) was to use these plans in the bidding; and, in case it was so agreed, Crafts was to have this work as at previous bidding, with the understanding that he was to give "us" the steel work for the superstructure at a pound price. The pound price was not fixed by witness and Crafts that evening. It remained the same as at former letting. Smith looked at Crafts' estimates and adopted his unit of prices. His estimates did not check relatively with Smith's. The greater variance was as to bridge 5, in which there was decided difference. Witness told Crafts that he would place plaintiff's bid on substructure above Crafts', so that, in event the work was let separately, it would go to him. Witness said nothing in regard to what was to be done as to Crafts getting subwork in the event the government did not let bids separately and plaintiff got awards. "I had no contract with Crafts at all with reference to his getting the substructure at the price I bid to the government for it, in the event I was successful in my bid." It was not agreed that witness was to get any interest out of Crafts' bid, or "he out of mine," in the event Smith put in a bid. Crafts bid at the second letting, and did not use plans of the Virginia Bridge & Iron Company. Smith, for plaintiff, bid at the second letting. Crafts did not give Smith anything definite as to the time he could "do this work," except what was contained in his bid to the government. Plaintiff got the letter that Crafts wrote, after contract with Rubush, about May, agreeing to do the work in 2½ months. He refused to make that bid in Atlanta at time spoken of. The president of the plaintiff company, C. E. Michael, testified that Crafts bought other orders for bridges and paid for them without making demand for claim on account of the Vicksburg affair. As he paid for those, the plaintiff sold him still another order, the one now sued for. It also appeared in testimony that the Virginia Bridge & Iron Company and George H. Crafts were competitive bidders for the work on the bridges in controversy.

After a careful examination of the very voluminous record in this case, we are unable to find any reason for reversing the judgment of the trial court in refusing a new trial. Omitting the general grounds of the motion, we come to consider the grounds contained in the amendment thereto. The plaintiff in error insists that the court should not have charged the jury that the contract set up in defendant's plea, if proved, was a legal, enforceable contract, with sufficient consideration to support it, for the reason that the evidence did not authorize the charge, and that the evidence, if it showed anything, proved an agreement in restraint of trade and in violation of the laws relating to fair competition, and was unilateral, not mutual, and because there was no authority in the plaintiff to transfer the contract or any part thereof to any other person. We see nothing in the evidence offered by the defendant showing that the agreement was illegal or contrary to public policy. The plaintiff denied any agreement at all. The defendant's testimony only proved that, without any intention to defraud or overreach the government, the plaintiff, who did not desire the substructure work, agreed, in consideration of the use of the defendant's carefully prepared estimates on the substructure, to allow the defendant to do that portion of the work under any contract the plaintiff might receive. The contract was not unilateral, because the plaintiff (if the agreement was really made) could have compelled the defendant to do the substructure work, though at a loss; and the contract, as appears in the record, forbids the transfer of the contract or any interest therein, and does not forbid the contractor from having any portion of the work done by any other person, as, for instance, by subcontract.

The next insistence of the plaintiff in error is that the court erred in submitting to the jury the question as to whether the defendant was damaged. We think, from what has been already stated, that the jury were authorized to find that a legal agreement was entered into by which Crafts was entitled to do the substructural work on any bridges contracted for in the Vicksburg Military Park; and if the evidence satisfied the jury that a profit would have resulted to Crafts by reason of that agreement, and of compliance therewith by the plaintiff company, the defendant was entitled, as damages, to any profits which would thus have accrued to him. For this reason we think there is no merit in the seventh, eighth, and ninth grounds of the motion for new trial.

In the tenth ground of the motion it is insisted that the court erred in not charging the jury upon a material issue in the case, to wit: It is contended by plaintiff that, if there was a valid contract giving the defendant the substructural work of bridges 4, 5, and 8, it was based upon estimates as to the actual cost of the construction of said substructures submitted by defendant to plaintiff, and claimed by the defendant to be accurate, and upon a certain percentage added by defendant as his profit for doing the work; and plaintiff contends that it offered to let defendant do this work, provided he would do it on the percentage of profit specified by him at the time the agreement was entered into, and that the defendant refused to accept this offer of plaintiff. The plaintiff insists that the court erred in not instructing the jury that if they found that the plaintiff offered to let the defendant do the work for this certain percentage of profit, and the defendant refused to accept this proposition, the plaintiff would be relieved from liability. There is no merit in this ground of the motion, for the reason that the instructions of the court must be predicated upon evidence, and there was no evidence to authorize such a charge. In its last analysis the issue was clear-cut between the plaintiff and the defendant; the plaintiff insisting that there was no contract at all by which it was bound to let the defendant have the substructural work, and the defendant insisting that in consideration of having prepared proper estimates for the plaintiff, which estimates were of advantage to the plaintiff in securing the contract for superstructure, he was entitled to erect the substructure and receive whatever profits might accrue from the bid thus submitted by the plaintiff in reality as his agent. There was no evidence from any source that there was any agreement that the defendant should only receive a certain per cent. of profit on the actual cost, and therefore it was immaterial that the plaintiff offered to let defendant do the work upon that basis.

The request to charge, which the court refused, and which is embodied in the eleventh ground of the motion, is as follows: "I charge you, if you believe from the evidence that an arrangement was made by which the bids of the plaintiff for substructure, if successful, were to be turned over to defendant, that such an arrangement was not binding on the plaintiff, because, under the contract entered into between the government and plaintiff, such agreement was impossible of performance." We think this request was properly refused. An examination of the contract shows that there was nothing in its terms which prevents the contractor from procuring any portion of the work to be done by others. It is merely the manifest purpose of the United States government to recognize no one, in so far as its liability is concerned, except the original contractor, and to hold such contractor solely liable for any breach or nonperformance. This, too, without question, is the construction placed upon it by the government; for the evidence in this very case discloses the fact that the plaintiff, upon the suggestion of the agent of the government who signed the contract in its behalf, procured one Rubush to erect the very substructures which the defendant claimed the right to build. The same complaint substantially is made in the twelfth ground of the motion for new trial, and, for the reasons just stated, is without merit.

In the thirteenth ground of the motion the plaintiff contends that the court should have submitted to the jury the contention that the reduction of the time, in its bid, from 4½ months to 2½ months, was the making of a new contract, and that, even if the agreement between plaintiff and defendant had been a legal and valid one, the new agreement was not binding on defendant, and defendant had no interest therein. The court properly refused plaintiff's request upon this subject. If the defendant had any agreement with the plaintiff, it was that he was to do the substructure work under any contracts made by the plaintiff with the government for bridges in the Vicksburg Military Park—not on any bids made by the plaintiff. The bids might never materialize into a contract, and the defendant testified that the agreement reached to the contract. When the chairman of the government commission declined to accept the plaintiff's bid unless the time was reduced to 2½ months, it was the duty of the plaintiff to inform the defendant of the change; and this the plaintiff did. Good faith required this. As no contract had yet been entered into, the defendant might then either decline to undertake the labor in the lessened time or accept the modification of the proposal. In this case the defendant, by his letter of April 23, 1903, offered to do the work in the 2½ months; and the contract was not entered into until May 11, 1903. This testimony is undisputed. There would be point in the plaintiff's request to charge, if the evidence had shown that defendant was only to receive the substructure under certain bids, instead of the substructural work of such bridges as the plaintiff might get to build, or if he had delayed in notifying the plaintiff that he was still ready to do the work in conjunction with the plaintiff, according to their agreement, regardless of the reduction of time to 2½ months.

After a very painstaking review of the evidence, we are unable to sustain the plaintiff's contention that the amount of damages awarded as a set-off to the defendant is excessive. We have expended much labor and time in the consideration of the tremendous record in this case, only to find, after several successive readings of the evidence, a plain conflict in the testimony, which it was the duty of the jury to settle. The charge of the court, when considered in connection with the evidence, is a clear and forcible presentation of the law applicable to the case, and is free from error of any kind.

Judgment affirmed.

(2 Ga. App. 41)

FIELDS v. STATE. (No. 199.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. May 24, 1907.)

1. RAPE—ASSAULT WITH INTENT TO RAPE—EVIDENCE—CORROBORATION OF FEMALE.

In the charge of assault with intent to rape, the credit to be attached to the testimony of the injured female is a matter wholly for the jury. If such witness is credible to the jury, corroboration of her testimony is unnecessary.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 42, Rape, § 83.]

2. SAME.

It is not error, in a case of assault with intent to rape, to refuse to charge that the accused should not be convicted upon the testimony of the woman alone, unless she made some outcry or told of the injury promptly, or her clothing was torn or disarranged, or her person showed signs of violence, or there were other circumstances which tend to corroborate her story. The particular circumstances which may tend to corroborate a witness, and the number of such circumstances necessary to produce that result, are wholly matters for the jury; and the jury may believe the witness without corroboration.

3. SAME—INSTRUCTIONS—GRADE OR DEGREE OF OFFENSE.

On the trial of an indictment for assault with intent to rape, where the evidence is such that the jury may be authorized to find that the assault was committed by the accused with the intention of gaining the woman's consent to have sexual intercourse with him, without any intent to overpower her will and commit the crime of rape, it is error to refuse to give in charge the law of assault, or assault and battery, as the indictment may authorize.

4. CRIMINAL LAW—INSTRUCTIONS—DEFENDANT'S STATEMENT.

In charging upon the prisoner's statement, a trial judge can employ no better language than that embodied in Pen. Code 1895, § 1010. Omission to instruct the jury that they may believe the defendant's statement in preference to the sworn testimony is reversible error.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Muscogee County; Wm. A. Little, Judge.

James Fields was convicted of assault with intent to rape, and he brings error. Reversed.

Carson & McCutchen, for plaintiff in error.
S. P. Gilbert, Sol. Gen., for the State.

RUSSELL, J. The defendant was convicted of assault with intent to rape. His motion for a new trial was overruled, and he assigns error on the judgment refusing a new trial. The plaintiff in error relies upon three assignments of error, all predicated upon the charge of the court.

He insists that the court erred in refusing a written request to charge the jury as follows: (a) "I charge you, gentlemen of the jury, that in a case where rape, or assault with intent to commit rape, is the charge against the defendant, that he shall not be convicted upon the testimony of the woman alone, unless there are some concurrent circumstances which tend to corroborate her evidence. In this respect the offense of rape seems to be an exceptional one, and the accused should not be convicted upon the testimony of the woman alone, however positive it may be, unless she makes some outcry, or told of the injury promptly, or her clothing was torn or disarranged, or her person showed signs of violence, or there were other circumstances which tend to corroborate her story." (b) "In rape cases the testimony of the party alleged to have been raped should always be scrutinized with care." In our opinion the court properly refused to instruct the jury as requested. The request seems to be almost a literal quotation of some of the language used in the opinion of the majority of the court in the case of Davis v. State, 120 Ga. 435, 48 S. E. 180; and, while it is a statement of the considerations which controlled the judgment of the majority of the Supreme Court, "there are many things said by this court, both in headnotes and opinions, that are sound law, but which nevertheless would be improper instructions to a jury." Savannah Ry. Co. v. Evans, 115 Ga. 318, 41 S. E. 631, 90 Am. St. Rep. 116. (2) This must naturally be true, for the reviewing court can analyze and discuss the evidence in a case with a freedom absolutely forbidden trial judges by Civ. Code 1895, § 4334; nor does it follow that the charge requested, even if it should be proper in a case of rape, was appropriate to a case like this, of assault with intent to rape.

The decision of the majority of the court in Davis v. State does not accord with our individual views, and seems to us to be an invasion of the constitutional prerogatives of the jury. We shall be bound by it, in view of the legal requirement to that effect, as applicable to cases of rape; but we shall not extend the principle therein embodied to cases of assault with intent to rape. The dicta of Judge Hale, upon which the decision in the Davis Case rests, refers only to cases of rape, and the reasoning is based upon the necessity for protection of the defendant from that speedy and uncontrollable indignation aroused by as heinous a charge as that of rape. This is recognized in the Davis Case. Rape, unless the accused be recommended to mercy, is a capital felony, and the dicta of Lord Hale seems to recognize the ghastly fact that there can come no remedy to the defendant after he has paid, with his life, the penalty of perjury on the part of the prosecutrix. On the other hand, the penalty for assault with intent to rape cannot at most exceed 20 years imprisonment in the penitentiary, and if, by any chance, the truth should develop that the accused was the innocent victim of a feigned charge and false accusation, some reparation, however late, could be afforded the defendant unjustly accused. We would be bound by the decision of the Supreme Court, if this court had jurisdiction to correct errors on convictions for rape; but we do not apprehend that the decision in Davis v. State was intended to apply to cases of assault with intent to rape, but rather that the ruling in that case, as drawn from the language of the decision, was based upon the exigencies arising from the gravity of the charge and the enormity of the penalty. We are the more impressed with this view by the fact that at the time Lord Hale wrote, assault with intent to rape was a mere misdemeanor, as, indeed, it was in our own state until 1817; and from 1817 to 1833 it was only punished by imprisonment from one to five years. The amount of corroboration, if any, required to support the testimony of a witness in a case of assault with intent to rape is a question, not for the court, but for the jury; and for the judge to instruct the jury that the accused should not be convicted, no matter how positive the testimony of the woman may be, unless she made some outcry or told of the injury promptly, or unless her clothing was torn or disarranged, would be for the judge, and not the jury, to measure the credibility of such witness.

In our opinion the testimony of the prosecutrix in a prosecution for the offense of assault with intent to rape needs no corroboration. Her testimony alone is sufficient to authorize conviction, if it is credible to the jury. Pen. Code, § 991, declares that the testimony of a single witness is generally sufficient to establish a fact. The only exceptions to this rule enumerated in our Code "are made in specified cases, such as to convict of treason or perjury, and in any case of felony where the only witness is an accomplice. In these cases (except in treason) corroborating circumstances may dispense with another witness." It is clear, therefore, as the crime charged in this case is neither treason nor perjury, the only way the offense could be brought within the exception provided in section 991, supra, is by holding that the female assaulted is an accomplice; and the mere statement of that proposition is sufficient to expose its fallacy, for, to say that the female assaulted considered, consented, and willingly participated, as an accomplice must do in the commission of the offense, is to destroy the charge and acquit the accused. Assault with intent to rape is an assault made with intent to have carnal knowledge, not only forcibly, but against her will; and if the female is not to be deemed an accomplice, and therefore required to be corroborated, she must produce an eyewitness.

From the nature of the case this is generally impossible. The protection of female virtue is far too priceless to be thus jeopardized.

The learned trial judge was right in refusing the request, not only for the foregoing reasons, but especially upon the ground that the request, as a whole, was not a correct statement of the law applicable to the case. "If a request to charge be not all proper, the court need not give any part of it in charge." Atlanta v. Buchanan, 76 Ga. 585. And, furthermore, the request was argumentative. Regardless of these two latter defects, and even if the request had been properly framed, the court did not err in refusing to instruct the jury as requested. In the earliest decision of our Supreme Court upon this subject (Camp v. State, 3 Ga. 421) the court laid down the rule as to the testimony of the injured female in cases of assault with intent to rape, and it is controlling until expressly reviewed and overruled. The learned trial judge presented the principle therein affirmed (and which we now follow) with unequalled clearness and impartiality. In the Camp Case, above referred to, Judge Nisbet, delivering the opinion, after quoting from Blackstone and his reference to Lord Hale, says: "The degree of evidence which in this case ought to satisfy the jury of the defendant's guilt depends upon the circumstances of each case, and cannot be reduced to specific rule. 3 Chitty, Criminal Law, 572." The trial judge left the credibility of the little girl in this case to the jury, and we do not see, under the ruling in the Camp Case, how he could have done otherwise. When Lord Hale wrote: "If the witness be of good fame, if she presently discovered the offense," etc., "these and the like are concurring circumstances give greater probability to her evidence"—it was simply an illustration of the practical effect of the rule he had previously stated, and which, in different language, was charged by the judge in this case. It was no more applicable to be given in a charge to a jury than his oft-quoted reminiscent reasoning: "Rape is an accusation easily to be made, hard to be proved, and harder to be defended by the party accused, though never so innocent." But antecedent to the illustration and the reasoning is the rule: "The party ravished may give evidence upon oath, and is in law a competent witness; but the credibility of her testimony, and how far forth she is to be believed, must be left to the jury, and is more or less credible according to the circumstances of fact that concur in that testimony." The request to charge embodied words of caution to be applied in measuring the admissibility of the evidence, which is a function of the court. It sought to apply them to the weight of the testimony, the determination of which is a question for the jury.

It is alleged that the court erred in failing to charge upon the subject of assault and assault and battery. It is well settled that where a charge of graver character includes minor offenses, if the evidence will justify or require a verdict finding the defendant guilty thereof, it is the duty of the judge to instruct the jury as to the principles of law applicable to the lesser offense, and that the defendant may be convicted thereof if in the opinion of the jury he be guilty of such lesser grade of the same generic offense. This general rule is to be qualified to the extent that the lesser offense must either necessarily be included in the greater by a charge in the indictment, or, if it may or may not be, then the averments of the indictment describing the manner in which the greater offense was committed must contain allegations essential to describe the lesser offense. The whole subject is discussed in Watson v. State, 116 Ga. 607, 43 S. E. 32, and the cases of Willson v. State, 53 Ga. 205, Hopper v. State, 54 Ga. 389, Bard v. State, 55 Ga. 319, Trowbridge v. State, 74 Ga. 431, Malone v. State, 77 Ga. 767, Jenkins v. State, 92 Ga. 470, 17 S. E. 693, and Bell v. State, 103 Ga. 401, 30 S. E. 294, 68 Am. St. Rep. 102, are there cited as authority. The jury should in all cases be instructed that the defendant may be convicted of the lesser offense, where the evidence submitted, under any view thereof, will authorize conviction of the lesser grade. Sutton v. State, 123 Ga. 125, 51 S. E. 316. Otherwise, though the jury may have doubts as to whether the defendant may be guilty of the graver or of the lesser charge, if satisfied that the defendant is guilty of one or the other, they will be misled into the opinion that conviction can only be had in the particular case for the greater offense, and thereby injustice will result to the defendant. Inasmuch as the indictment in this case not only alleged an assault, but the evidence might have authorized an inference that the defendant intended to cajole or persuade the female into consent to yield to his desires, and thus to effect intercourse without force, the jury should have been instructed that if they found, from the evidence, that it was not the intention of the defendant to have carnal knowledge of the female forcibly and against her will, but that the intention of the defendant was to arouse the passions of the female or otherwise induce her consent, and that, if the circumstances were such as to lead them to believe that the defendant would have desisted short of force and violence, then the defendant might be convicted of the offense of an assault. We cannot tell what was the opinion of the jury upon this subject; but the omission of a charge upon the subject of assault excluded from the consideration of defendant's intention as a whole, and forced them to the conclusion that the assault made by defendant was made with no other intention than to rape. The evidence seems to us to strongly sustain this conclusion, and no doubt the learned trial judge entertained the same view; but in view of the publicity of the place where the assault was alleged to have been made, and the fact that it was at the home of the female, where the defendant was not an intruder, but a frequent visitor, the jury might have taken an entirely different view, if they had been told that they could consider another aspect of the question and might find the defendant guilty of assault, instead of being instructed, as they were, that they should find him guilty of assault with intent to rape, or acquit him.

We think, too, that the court erred in the instructions given the jury with reference to the defendant's statement. The jury should have been instructed, especially in this case, that they had the right to believe the statement of the prisoner in preference to the sworn testimony, if they chose so to do. In this particular case the omission was harmful, for the reason that the statement of the defendant and the evidence of the little girl (totally antagonistic to each other) were the only evidence in regard to the commission of the crime. The statement of the defendant was in material conflict with the evidence offered against his plea, and for that reason it was the duty of the court, without request, to instruct the jury fully upon that subject. The court did give a very full charge with reference to the defendant's statement, but omitted to tell the jury, what they should always be informed, that they had the right to prefer the statement, if they chose, to the sworn testimony. It is possible (considering the very able charge of the learned trial judge upon this subject as a whole) that the jury may have understood that they had the right to believe the statement if they saw proper; but in our opinion this does not dispense with the necessity of their being unequivocally so instructed. Decisions of our Supreme Court upon the defendant's statement are almost without number; but, after all, the proper course is pointed out in the case of Ozburn v. State, 87 Ga. 185, 13 S. E. 247, in the following language: "In this connection we will state that it would be a much wiser and safer practice for our brethren of the circuit bench, in charging concerning statements made by defendants, to confine themselves to the language of the statute upon this subject, and not to indulge in extended comments upon the effect to be given such statements. This course on their part will relieve them and this court of much embarrassment and difficulty arising from a contrary practice."

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Macon; Robt. Hodges, Judge.

Action by D. D. Adams against J. V. Haigler and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

Hardeman & Jones, for plaintiff in error. M. Felton Hatcher, for defendants in error.

HILL, C. J. Adams brought suit on a contractor's bond against Haigler and Frey as principals and Bazemore as surety. Demurrers were filed by the defendants to the petition, and were sustained by the trial court. On exceptions to this judgment, the Supreme Court reversed the judgment, and held that the "allegations in the original petition and the amendment seem to set forth a complete cause of action upon the bond" and that "the petition was not subject to any of the objections set forth in the demurrers." Adams v. Haigler, 123 Ga. 659, 51 S. E. 638. The opinion of the Supreme Court is comprehensive, and fully settles the law of the case relating to the allegations of the petition. We do not think any profitable purpose would be accomplished by making an extended statement of the case, as that has been done by the Supreme Court. The case is now before this court on exceptions to the refusal of the court to strike certain pleas and to the granting of a nonsuit.

The defendants filed separate answers, denying the allegations of the plaintiff, except as to the execution of the contract. Haigler pleaded: (3) That at the time of entering into that contract another contract was made by Frey and himself with the plaintiff, in which it was agreed that the plaintiff should purchase the lumber and other things necessary in the construction of the house; (4) that after the signing of the original contract it was agreed between the plaintiff and himself that they would not carry out all its terms, and it was not carried out in all its terms, in that the plaintiff agreed to buy and to furnish to him certain lumber, and the plaintiff instructed him that it was not necessary to live up to paragraph 5 of the contract, and not necessary for him to see the architect and get a written estimate, but that he (Haigler) could come to him (the plaintiff) when in need of money; (5) that it was agreed between the plaintiff and himself that paragraph 3 of the contract should not be carried out; (6) that it was agreed between them that no written direction from the architect was necessary for alterations in the plans or for extra work; (12) that in good faith he (Haigler) performed his work as far as possible, and the plaintiff was not damaged in any amount, for he was not subjected to any loss, and he got more than his money's worth. Other parts of Haigler's pleading were stricken on demurrer. The demurrer as to the foregoing paragraphs was overruled.

Frey, in his answer, repeated the foregoing averment of Haigler as to the agreement that the plaintiff should furnish lumber, etc., and set up further: (4) That after the signing of the contract he (Frey), with the consent of the plaintiff and of Haigler, withdrew from "said partnership" and the contract, and was released from any further interest or connection therewith; and (5) that up to the time of said withdrawal he had not failed or refused to carry out his contract, and it was at the suggestion of the plaintiff (he has learned since his withdrawal) that he gave up the contract, and it was admitted by the plaintiff as being satisfactory that he should withdraw. A demurrer to each of these paragraphs, as well as to the entire answer of Frey, was overruled.

Razemore pleaded: (3) That at the time the contract attached to the petition was made he "knew of no other contract being signed between the parties thereto, and he never consented in any way to the change, abrogation, or alteration of said contract in any way, nor to the signing of any other contract in reference thereto"; (4) that "he is discharged by law from any liability on said bond, for the reason that said averments in the declaration admit said contract was abrogated, altered, and changed by the parties thereto by mutual consent, and without the knowledge and consent of" this defendant; (5) that "he is discharged from liability on said bond as surety, for the further reason that said changes, alterations, and abrogations of said contract increased the risk of said defendant as surety, and exposed the defendant to greater liability thereon, without his knowledge or consent"; (6) that he is discharged as surety because the plaintiff purchased the material used in the construction of the building, in violation of the contract, defendant being willing to risk the judgment and experience of the parties whose faithful performance he guaranteed, but unwilling to accept and risk the judgment of the plaintiff in purchasing material, owing to the plaintiff's lack of experience in that line; (7) that he is discharged because the plaintiff violated paragraph 7 of the contract, "in that he purchased said material without giving five days' notice as required thereby, and without any notice or consent to or of this defendant"; (8) that he is discharged because the plaintiff failed to have the said lumber delivered at the proper times, which delay increased the cost of the building several hundred dollars, and which delay and purchases above set out increased the risk and liability of this defendant as surety, and since the filing of this suit he has learned that the plaintiff admitted that there were such delays, and put in a claim against the parties from whom the material was purchased for a certain sum as damages for the delay; (9) that he is discharged because the plaintiff, without his knowledge or consent, paid out money in a different way and mode from that required by the contract; (10) that he is discharged because, without his knowledge or consent, the plaintiff consented to Frey's withdrawal from the contract, which consent increased the risk of the surety and exposed him to greater liability; (11) that he is discharged because the plaintiff accepted the house from the contractors; (12) that he is discharged because the plaintiff, in his declaration, avers that the said additions and alterations in the plan of work were made without being directed in writing by the architect, and without the consent or knowledge of the surety, as required by the contract, which likewise increased the risk of this defendant as surety; and (13) that he is not liable to the plaintiff in any amount, for the reason that the plaintiff has not been damaged, but has received more than his money's worth for every expense incurred. The plaintiff demurred generally and specially to Bazemore's answer, and the demurrer was overruled.

1. We will consider the pleas and demur-ers in so far as we think the judgment of the court was erroneous thereon. The demurrer to paragraph 3 of Haigler's answer should have been sustained; the alleged change of the contract in the particular mentioned having been the result of an agreement by all the parties thereto, as stated in this paragraph. Such consent novation could not be set up as a sufficient and valid defense by the contractors. The demurrer to paragraph 4 of Haigler's answer should have been sustained. It was wholly immaterial from whom Adams, the plaintiff, purchased the lumber to be used in building the house; it having been agreed, as alleged in paragraph 3, that he should purchase the "lumber and other things necessary in the construction of the house." Paragraph 5 of the contract provides how the contractors shall be paid, to wit, that the architect shall make an estimate of the material and labor put into the building during the preceding month, and this estimate shall be paid by the owner, deducting 15 per cent. to be paid on the completion and acceptance of the work. This clause of the contract was changed by the owner and Haigler, the contractor, who continued the work under the contract, and the change was for the benefit of the contractor. A change for the benefit of the contractor and with his consent certainly could not be pleaded as a defense to his failure to complete the contract. The demurrer to the sixth paragraph of Haigler's answer should have been sustained; it being alleged that the matter therein referred to was the result of an agreement between the parties to the contract. The twelfth paragraph of Haigler's answer sets up no issuable fact, but is a conclusion of the pleader, and constitutes no defense. This paragraph should have been stricken.

The third paragraph of the answer of the defendant Frey should have been stricken, for the same reason that the demurrer to paragraph 3 of Haigler's answer should have been sustained.

The demurrer to paragraphs 4, 5, 6, 7, 9, 10, 12, and 13 of Bazemore's answer should have been sustained. The questions made by these paragraphs of the surety's answer are fully covered by the decision of the Supreme Court overruling the demurrers to the petition. These allegations of the petition were held by the Supreme Court not to constitute a novation of the contract so as to increase the risk of the surety and to release him from the contract. "The act of Haigler in carrying on the work was, under the allegations of the petition, not a novation, but in pursuance of the original contract. * * * Bazemore's risk as surety was not increased by any act of Adams, and * * * the condition of the bond was broken by Haigler's failure to comply with the terms of the contract." "Haigler was allowed, with the knowledge of Bazemore, the surety, to continue the work which Frey had failed to complete. Both Haigler and Frey were under an obligation to complete the work, and it was immaterial to the plaintiff which one actually did the work. Bazemore, the surety, was surety for both, and he was alike responsible for the failure of either." Adams v. Haigler, 123 Ga. 659, 664, 51 S. E. 638.

The decision of the Supreme Court, we think, reduced the defenses that could be made by the defendants (1) to showing that the delay in completing the work was due to the alterations and additions made by the plaintiff, and not by the fault of the contractors; (2) to any material changes in the contract not embraced in the admitted changes set out in the petition, and which were not consented to by the defendant Bazemore, and which increased his risk as surety. (3) The separate answer of Frey averred that the plaintiff had, with the consent of Haigler, released him from compliance with the contract. This made a sufficient defense as to him, if true. Except as herein ruled, we think the judgment of the trial court in overruling the demurrers to the pleas was right.

2. We think the court erred in sustaining the motion to nonsuit. The question on the nonsuit is, not whether the plaintiff was entitled to recover, but whether his evidence supported the case made by the allegations of his petition. An examination of the evidence will show that the plaintiff substantially supported the allegations of his petition. The damage claimed under the contract was composed of three items: (1) The sum of $426.03, besides interest, expended by the plaintiff in excess of the contract price in the purchase of material and in the payment of labor; (2) $40, the rental value of the house between the date fixed in the contract for the completion of the house and the date when it was sufficiently completed for occupation; (3) $33.60 for additional work necessary to be done, and the material therefor, in order to complete the house in accordance with the contract. In support of these items the plaintiff introduced the contract and bond sued on, and showed, by his own testimony and that of his architect, that the contractors commenced work under the contract. In a few days one of the contractors, Frey, abandoned the work without the consent of the plaintiff, and the other contractor, Haigler, continued under the contract. He could not get credit for the material, nor could he pay for the labor, unless Adams would agree to be responsible. It was agreed between Adams and Haigler that Adams would furnish the money to meet the pay rolls and would pay the bills for the material whenever they were approved by Haigler. The payments made by Adams for material and labor, according to the evidence, exceeded the contract price by $426.03. There seems not to have been any proof submitted by the plaintiff in support of his claim for $40 as the rental value of the house for the month he was delayed in getting into it. The item of $33.60, covering additional work and materials necessary to complete the house in accordance with the terms of the contract, was proved by the testimony of the architect and the plaintiff. The evidence introduced in behalf of the plaintiff, assuming it to be true, proved his case as laid, except as to the item of $40 above mentioned; and it was error to grant the nonsuit.

Judgment reversed.

Error from Superior Court, Chattooga County; Moses Wright, Judge.

Attachment in a justice's court by D. J. Atkins against J. W. Cavender. From a judgment of the superior court dismissing a petition for certiorari to review the judgment in the justice's court for plaintiff, defendant brings error. Affirmed, with direction.

Taylor & Jolly and McHenry & Porter, for plaintiff in error. F. W. Copeland and J. M. Bellah, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. The defendant in error caused to be issued against the plaintiff in error an attachment, upon the ground that he was not a resident of the state of Georgia, which was returned to the justice's court of the 962d district, to the February term, held February 4, 1905. Prior to the court day the plaintiff in error spoke to the justice of the peace about a continuance of the case, in order that he might attend the superior court of Murray county. Upon his return to his home in Chattanooga, Tenn., he inclosed the following certificate in the letter which follows:

"Mr. J. W. Cavender is ill with la grippe, and unable to attend to business.

"C. Holzclaw, M. D.

"State of Tennessee, County of Hamilton.

"Sworn to and subscribed before me this the 1st day of February, 1905.

"W. S. Weitzell, N. P. [Seal.]"

"Chattanooga, Tenn., Feb. 1st, 1905.

"Esquire Geo. O. Ramsey, Subnigna, Ga.—
Dear Sir: I returned home sick, and, as I am not able to come down Saturday, I send you my doctor's affidavit, which is proper showing for you to continue the case. Hope the continuing of it won't disconcert any one. I am sorry I am not able to come.

"Your friend,

J. W. Cavender."

Upon this showing the judge, in the exercise of his discretion, refused to continue the case and rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiff. As appears from the answer of the justice, no plea had been filed in the case, and no point is made that evidence sufficient to authorize the judgment was not adduced. The defendant carried the case to the superior court by certiorari, where the petition was dismissed; and exception is taken to the judgment dismissing the certiorari.

The only question in the case is whether the justice of the peace abused his discretion in refusing a continuance of the case upon the showing made. We agree with the judge of the superior court in holding that the magistrate was not required to continue the case upon the showing presented. The certificate of the physician purported to give the condition of the party on February 1st. The court did not sit until February 4th, and the certificate contained no statement which could inform the court as to the duration of the movant's illness, or from which the court could absolutely infer that the movant's ailment would continue until the day upon which court was to be held. We think every facility should be afforded each and every party in every case for fairly presenting his side of the issue, and that the law of continuance should be given a liberal construction; but we are not prepared to say that the trial judge in this case abused the discretion with which he is vested by law. The mere absence of a party has nowhere been held to be of itself enough to authorize the continuance of the case. A meritorious reason existing at the time of the trial, which prevents his presence, must be made to appear; and it should further be shown that the presence of the party would be likely to cause a different result from that obtained, before the judgment should be set aside and a new trial ordered. "The law's delay" is one of the most serious impediments in the administration of substantial justice in the courts. We do not mean to say that in any case there should be unseemly, undue, or unjust haste; but hope deferred makes the heart sick, and many a case is killed by continuance.

Though constrained to affirm the judgment in this case, for the reason that the showing made did not require a continuance, because it did not cover the date of trial, this judgment is not to preclude or prevent the plaintiff in error from proceeding by equitable petition to have the judgment rendered set aside, if as a matter of fact he has a meritorious defense and was really physically unable on the day of trial to attend court. The judgment is affirmed, with direction that this judgment shall not operate to prejudice the right of plaintiff in error to proceed accordingly.

Judgment affirmed, with direction.

1. CARRIERS—CARRIAGE OF GOODS—ACTIONS—QUESTION FOR JURY—DELIVERY.

Delivery of freight to a common carrier, where an action is brought to recover for loss of articles alleged to have been delivered, is a question of fact for the determination of the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 9, Carriers, § 596.]

2. SAME—CONTRACTS FOR TRANSPORTATION IMPLIED.

Where the evidence authorizes a finding that certain goods were delivered to the agent of a railroad company, who received them and was made acquainted with their destination, a contract of carriage may be implied, although no bill of lading or receipt for the goods be issued and delivered to the shipper.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 9, Carriers, § 202.]

3. SAME—ACTIONS—PERSONS ENTITLED TO SUE.

While, in the absence of a contract, a person who has no property, general or special, in goods, cannot sue in his own name, in tort, for the destruction of such goods by a carrier, nevertheless the contract need not be in writing, but may be implied from delivery and acceptance of the goods for shipment, and the consignor may sue for the loss or nondelivery, though he be but a bailee. "He has such a special property in the goods as to give him a right of action." Great Western R. Co. v. McComas, 33 Ill. 185. The shipper, if not the owner, holds the recovery in trust for the true owner.

4. SAME.

"The shipper is a party in interest to the contract, and it does not lie with the carrier who made the contract with him to say, upon a breach of it, that he is not entitled to recover the damages, unless it be shown that the consignee objects." Hooper v. Railway Co., 27 Wis. 81, 9 Am. Rep. 439.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Appling County; T. A. Parker, Judge.

Action by Mrs. Johnson against the Southern Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Mrs. Johnson having died pending the writ of error, J. O. Johnson, her administrator, was made party defendant in error. Affirmed.

De Lacy & Bishop and H. A. King, for plaintiff in error. J. H. Thomas, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. Mrs. Johnson, the plaintiff in the court below, agreed with Krauskoff Bros. & Co., of Savannah, Ga., to take a certain shipment of hats to her store; they insisting that she keep or buy all the hats in the shipment, but allowing her the privilege of returning to them such of the goods as she did not want. She took the goods on these conditions to her place of business and kept them for some time, but finally decided to ship back to them the larger portion of the goods, packed them in boxes, and had them marked "K. B. & Co., Savannah, Ga.," and delivered them to a drayman to take to the depot. The drayman swears that he delivered the goods to the agents of Krauskoff Bros. & Co. at the depot, and that he delivered them as he was accustomed to deliver such goods. The evidence of the plaintiff showed that she delivered the goods to the agents of Krauskoff Bros. & Co., and that these agents accepted them for shipment, but failed to furnish her with a bill of lading, receipt, or other evidence of delivery. Krauskoff Bros. & Co. not having received any of the goods, or any bill of lading or receipt of shipment, naturally insisted on payment for the entire shipment, and Mrs. Johnson, having failed in her effort to return a portion of the goods, paid for them. She then sued the railroad company in a justice's court for the value of the goods delivered to the company. This suit was appealed to the superior court, and a verdict was rendered for the plaintiff. The original defendant in error, Mrs. Johnson, having died pending the writ of error, J. C. Johnson, her administrator, was made a party defendant in error.

Learned counsel for plaintiff in error insists that this action is a suit in tort, and that for that reason the plaintiff was not entitled to recover, because it appears that she had no title to the goods that were lost. While particularity of pleading is not required in justices' courts, we think it very clear that the suit is one on a contract of carriage arising from the transaction between the plaintiff as bailee and agent for Krauskoff Bros. & Co., and the defendant as common carrier. In the summons it is alleged that "all the articles named in said bill of particulars * * * were turned over to said company by petitioner to be transported," etc.; "said railway company being a common carrier for hire," etc., and "said railway company having failed to deliver the goods as agreed between them and the shipper, the said Mrs. J. C. Johnson, at their destination, Savannah, Ga., as aforesaid." We think that this alleges a contract, and asks recovery only for the breach of such contract; and it is only upon the theory that a contract was proved that the verdict can be sustained, for the plaintiff failed to show that she had title to the goods in question, and, of course, no one but the owner can recover damages in tort.

The plaintiff in error claims that there was no contract; and the evidence certainly discloses that there was no written contract to carry the goods in question. It is insisted that the goods were never received; that the evidence fails to show proper identification of the goods sued for, or their delivery to the company. The plaintiff in error further contends that the defendant in error had no right to her recovery in the court below, because she had no title to the goods sued for. As to whether or not there was delivery and identification of the goods, and proof of their delivery to the carrier, these are questions of fact; and the evidence admitted, so far as this portion of the case is concerned, authorized the finding of the jury. Mrs. Johnson testified that she packed the hats in two boxes and saw her husband mark them "K. B. & Co., Savannah, Ga." She herself delivered these boxes to the drayman. The drayman swears that he delivered these boxes to the agents of the company, and called their attention to their presence in the depot; and to show that they were the same two boxes, the plaintiff's husband testifies that he saw them at the depot after the drayman carried them there, and called the attention of the company's agent to the marking or lettering he had placed on them. If the jury believed plaintiff's witnesses, there could be no doubt as to the identification of the goods sued for, and of their delivery to the company. While we agree with counsel for plaintiff in error that the testimony fails to show that Mrs. Johnson was the owner of the goods (although she did pay for them after their loss), still, if we are right in our construction of the nature of this suit, it becomes immaterial that Mrs. Johnson was not the owner; for by delivery of the goods to the carrier for shipment to the place marked upon the boxes, to wit, Savannah, Ga., and their acceptance by the railroad company for that purpose, a contract to carry arose by natural implication, and the ownership of no person other than Mrs. Johnson is disclosed, and it is not sought to enforce the rights of any other person. Mrs. Johnson, although not the true owner, can maintain the action, and could hold the recovery in trust for the true owner. Construing the decision in Carter v. Southern Railway Company, 111 Ga. 38, 36 S. E. 308, 50 L. R. A. 354, with the Lockhart Case, 73 Ga. 472, 54 Am. Rep. 883, it may be stated that a bailee may sue for the breach of a contract of carriage made with him. It is distinctly decided in Carter v. Southern Railway Company that a person who has in charge, as agent, the goods of another, and who makes with the common carrier a contract to ship the goods, in which the agency is not disclosed, may maintain an action in his own name for the breach of the contract. Such a plaintiff being the consignee or of the goods shipped, the contract is made with him, and he is primarily liable for the charges for carriage. The carrier, having treated him as the owner of the goods, cannot dispute his title, unless the title of the true owner is sought to be enforced against the carrier. It is equally well settled that, where a plaintiff has no interest in the property and no contract with the carrier, he has no cause of action. Lockhart v. Railroad, 73 Ga. 472, 54 Am. Rep. 883. We are of the opinion that under the evidence Mrs. Johnson was such a bailee of the goods in question that, if she had made a contract with reference to their transportation, she could have maintained an action for the breach of the contract.

The real question in this case, then, is. Was a contract of carriage entered into between Mrs. Johnson and the carrier? No bill of lading, freight receipt, or other written evidence of a contract, was put in evidence, and we must therefore determine from the circumstances appearing in evidence whether the defendant company made a contract to transport the goods in question. The evidence of the plaintiff discloses nothing on this subject. She delivered the goods to a drayman, and she never received a bill of lading, and had no knowledge of what the drayman did with the goods after she turned them over to him. Her husband testified that the goods were delivered to the company's agent, for he saw the boxes containing them at the depot, and called the attention of the company's agent, Lee Patterson, to the marking on the box, "K. B. & Co., Savannah, Ga." The drayman testified that he delivered two boxes, marked "K. B. & Co.," to the depot agent at Baxley. He did not get a bill of lading at that time, because he was in a hurry. It appears, therefore, that there was evidence to authorize the jury to find that the two boxes of hats were delivered by the plaintiff to the company for shipment, and accepted by them. They were plainly marked "K. B. & Co., Savannah, Ga.," and the testimony is undisputed that the goods for whose loss the suit is brought were contained in boxes marked "K. B. & Co., Savannah, Ga." According to testimony which the jury was authorized to believe, there was nothing lacking to show an implied contract, and the terms of the contract. The point of destination was plainly marked on both boxes, and when the railroad company received the goods, without objection, under the evidence that it was quite usual not to make out bills of lading immediately, the company tacitly agreed to deliver them, either at destination or to a connecting carrier, to be transported to destination. The course of dealing evidenced a contract. The jury could well imply a contract from the acceptance of the goods for shipment, and that it was only through oversight that a receipt or bill of lading was not issued. So we do not think that the contention of plaintiff in error that this is an action in tort is sustained. In any event a common carrier cannot dispute the title of the person delivering the goods for shipment, by setting up adverse title in himself or in a third person, which is not being enforced against him. Wallace v. Matthews, 39 Ga. 617, 99 Am. Dec. 473. Payment to the administrator of Mrs. Johnson will be full protection against payment to any one else.

Judgment affirmed.

DICKS v. STATE. (No. 490.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. June 20, 1907.)

1. WITNESSES—EXAMINATION BY COURT.

While the court has a right to question a witness during the trial of a case, the examination must be carefully guarded so as not to violate the inhibition of section 4334, Civ. Code 1895. The examination of the witness by the court in this case was not so guarded, and amounted to a clear violation of that section.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 50, Witnesses, § 852.]

2. CRIMINAL LAW—APPEAL—OBJECTIONS WAIVED.

Exceptions not insisted on in the argument, or covered by the brief, will be treated as abandoned.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, § 4256.]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Richmond County; H. C. Hammond, Judge.

John Dicks was convicted of burglary, and brings error. Reversed.

A. L. Franklin, for plaintiff in error. J. S. Reynolds, Sol. Gen., and John M. Graham, for the State.

HILL, C. J. Plaintiff in error was convicted for a violation of section 184 of the Penal Code of 1895, upon an indictment charging that he did break and enter a certain railroad box car of the Augusta Southern Railroad Company with the intent to steal valuable goods therein, and, after having so entered, did wrongfully and fraudulently take and carry away, with intent to steal the same, two boxes of raisins, the property of the said railroad company. His motion for a new trial was overruled, and the case is before this court for review. Exceptions to the judgment of the court in overruling a plea in abatement, and in admitting certain testimony over the objection of the defendant, are not alluded to in the brief filed in this court, and will therefore be treated as abandoned. Two points are presented for the decision of this court.

1. It is complained that the presiding judge erred, in that he intimated to the jury his opinion of the defendant's guilt and what had been proved, as follows: During the progress of the trial and after the defendant had made his statement, the detective who made the arrest and who discovered the stolen property was recalled, and after he had been examined by counsel for both the state and the defendant the court continued the examination as follows: "Q. Was he told what he was being arrested for? A. We carried a search warrant, and told him we had a search warrant for his place and for him; and he never did make any explanation as to where the goods came from or why he was in possession of them. Q. Did he make any denial? A. No, sir. Q. Did he see these raisins? A. Yes, sir. Q. Said nothing about Aaron Skinfeld at that time? A. No, sir; he did not. Q. Were you present at the preliminary hearing? A. I was. Q. Did he make any denial there? A. Not that I heard. Q. Have you ever heard of Aaron before in connection with this case? A. No, sir; I think not." Then the witness was cross-examined, and the court asked him the following questions: "Q. Explain to the jury where John Dicks was when you and the gentleman with you discovered this first box of raisins in his house. A. He was there in the room. Q. Did he or not see you put your hands on the box of raisins and take them into your custody? A. I don't see why he couldn't. He was right there in the room, dressing. Q. Did he see you with the two boxes of raisins? A. Yes, sir. Q. Did he see you remove them from his house? A. I can't say that he did, because we ran him right off to jail. Q. Did he see you with these boxes of raisins at the time? A. Yes, sir. Q. Did he offer you any explanation? A. No, sir. Q. Did he say he got them from Aaron Skinfeld? A. He did not. Q. Were those raisins at the magistrate's office? A. Yes, sir. Q. Did he say there at the magistrate's office that he got them from Skinfeld? A. No, sir; he did not. Q. Have you ever seen him where those boxes of raisins were, at police headquarters or anywhere else, when he was being charged with this crime? A. Yes, sir; they were at the magistrate's there, and he was faced with them there. Q. Did he offer any explanation? A. No, sir. Q. Did he offer the explanation that Skinfeld had come to his house and asked permission to leave them there? A. No, sir." Defendant's counsel continued to cross-examine the witness, and when he finished the court asked the following questions: "Q. How long did John Dicks stay in jail before he had a preliminary and went out on bond? A. I don't remember how long. I think he was there probably three weeks. Q. Did you see him during that time? A. Yes, sir. Q. Did he offer you any explanation? A. No, sir; none at all. He told me to go to his lawyer."

To illustrate the pertinency of the foregoing examination it is only necessary to state that the only evidence of the defendant's guilt was the presumption arising from the possession of the stolen property soon after the commission of the crime, without a satisfactory explanation of such possession. This detective, three days after the raisins were stolen from the car, found them in the defendant's house. Neither at that time, nor on the subsequent occasions alluded to by the court, when he had an opportunity to do so, did he ever make any explanation at all of his possession. He delayed his explanation until he made his statement to the jury on the trial; then stating that one Aaron Skinfeld left them at his house the night they were stolen. The iteration and reiteration by the court of this strongly incriminating omission on the part of the defendant must have forcibly impressed the jury with the idea that in the opinion of the judge the explanation of his possession of the stolen goods, as then given by the defendant, was a fabricated afterthought. The emphasis which the judge by his questions gave to this significant failure of the defendant on the repeated occasions before the trial, when it was to his interest to have promptly made an explanation, and when it was reasonable to think that he would have done so, indicated that the judge had very grave doubts of the truth of the one made. This question has been fully covered by the recent decision of this court in the Sharpton Case, 1 Ga. App. 542, 57 S. E. 929. We can only repeat what we said then—that while the court can with propriety ask questions of a witness on the stand for the purpose of bringing out the facts of the case, such practice is imprudent and unsafe, and will invariably result in the imperative grant of a new trial when such examination is at all extended and on the vital points of the case. The rather lengthy examination of the witness above set out, calling repeated attention to the weak point in the defense, was a clear, though doubtless an unconscious, violation of the right of the defendant to have his guilt determined by the jury without the slightest assistance from the court.

2. It is insisted that there was no evidence of a "breaking" of the car. We have carefully examined the brief of evidence, and we find that, while the evidence on this point is weak and not entirely satisfactory, yet there is some evidence to support the verdict as to this fact, and the trial court was satisfied.

Judgment reversed.

ACKER v. ANDERSON COUNTY.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Aug. 5, 1907.)

CORONERS—INQUEST—FEES—LIABILITY OF COUNTY.

An inquest over a dead body is a proceeding essentially criminal in its nature, and falls within the term "criminal proceedings," for which salaries are provided in lieu of fees given by Civ. Code 1902, § 3117—section 1006 providing for salaries of magistrates in Anderson county, and section 994 providing that magistrates shall receive annual salaries in lieu of fees in criminal cases or proceedings—and a magistrate in Anderson county holding an inquest cannot collect fees from the county therefor.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Anderson County; Watts, Judge.

Controversy without action between R. V. Acker and Anderson county. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

J. E. Breazeale, for appellant. Bonham & Watkins, for respondent.

JONES, J. This was a controversy in the circuit court without action upon an agreed statement of facts. The plaintiff is a magistrate for Anderson county, and in the year 1905 held two inquests over dead bodies, for which services he presented a claim for $17 to the county commissioners of Anderson county. The inquests were held more than 15 miles from the courthouse and upon the request of two reputable citizens. The county commissioners refused to pay the claim, upon the ground that the statutes make no provision for the payment of such fees to magistrates in Anderson county. The circuit court sustained this view and dismissed the proceedings.

We concur with the circuit court. Costs and fees are never allowed to an officer unless some statute, strictly construed, confers the right. Lancaster v. Barnwell, 40 S. C. 446, 19 S. E. 74; Green v. Anderson Co., 56 S. C. 411, 34 S. E. 691. We find no statute authorizing such costs.

The authority of a magistrate to hold an inquest is derived from section 888, Code of Laws 1902, which provides that "any magistrate of the county, except in the county of Charleston, is authorized and required to exercise all the powers and discharge all the duties of the coroner in holding inquests over the body of deceased persons and taking all proper proceedings therein, in all cases where the coroner of the county is sick, or absent or at a greater distance than fifteen miles from the place for such inquiry, or when the office is vacant." Section 3117, 1 Civil Code 1902, among the fees and costs of magistrates for civil and criminal matters, provides a fee of $8.50 for "proceedings on coroner's inquest as prescribed by law." But section 1006 of that volume and amendatory statutes provide for salaries of magistrates in Anderson county, and section 994 expressly provides that the magistrates "shall receive annual salaries in lieu of all fees and costs in criminal cases or proceedings." An inquest over a dead body is a proceeding essentially criminal in its nature, and must fall within the meaning of the term "criminal proceeding," in lieu of fees for which the salary is provided. Cr. Code 1902, §§ 701-729, regulates the procedure, and by section 890, 1 Civ. Code 1902, the inquisition and evidence must be returned to the clerk of the court of general sessions. This would be conclusive if the coroner were allowed fees for holding inquests in Anderson county, but by act of 1904 (24 St. at Large, p. 418) the coroner of Anderson county is paid a salary in lieu of all costs and fees. Hence there is no statute authorizing the payment of fees for holding an inquest in Anderson county, whether the service is rendered as magistrate or as coroner.

The judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

GERMAN-AMERICAN INS. CO. v. SOUTHERN RY. CO.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Aug. 3, 1907.)

RAILROADS—FIRES SET BY LOCOMOTIVES—LIABILITY.

Where cotton is deposited on the premises of a railway company under an agreement that it remain on the premises of the company without its consent at the sole risk of the shipper until tendered and accepted for shipment, the carrier is not liable for its loss by fire from its locomotive under Civ. Code 1902, § 2135, making every railroad company responsible for property destroyed by fire from its engines, unless the property was placed on the right of way unlawfully and without its consent.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 41, Railroads, § 1665.]

Gary, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court, Fairfield County; Prince, Judge.

Action by the German-American Insurance Company, the Royal Insurance Company, and Millett & Co. against the Southern Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendant appeals. Reversed.

Defendant appeals on following exceptions:

(1) "That his honor, the presiding judge, erred in refusing the motion to direct a verdict in favor of the defendant, upon the ground that it appeared from the undisputed evidence in the case that the property destroyed had been placed on the defendant's right of way by Millett & Co., the owners, with knowledge that the defendant did not consent to its being so placed before it should be tendered for shipment, and that it was never so tendered.

(2) "That his honor, the presiding judge, erred in refusing to direct a verdict for the defendant, for the reason that there was no testimony tending to show that the property which was destroyed while upon the defendant's right of way had been placed on such right of way with its consent.

(3) "That his honor, the presiding judge, erred in refusing to direct a verdict for the defendant, for the reason that it appeared from the evidence that there was a misjoinder of parties plaintiff and of causes of action. The rights of the plaintiffs being several, and not joint, the evidence could not sustain a verdict in favor of the defendants jointly.

(4) "That his honor, the presiding judge, erred in refusing the defendant's motion for a new trial, for the reason that there was no testimony tending to show that the cotton destroyed had been placed upon the defendant's right of way with its consent.

(5) "That his honor, the presiding judge, erred in refusing the defendant's motion for a new trial, on the ground that the verdict, being for a single sum in favor of the defendants jointly, was not supported by the evidence, which showed the rights of the plaintiffs to be several, and not joint.

(6) "That his honor, the presiding judge, erred in charging the jury, with reference to the cotton on the right of way: 'Now, if you find it was there with the knowledge of the defendant company, then the inference, in the absence of other testimony, the inference might be drawn that it was there with the consent of the company; and that inference arises only in those cases where the property of one is placed upon the lands of another, who has a right to object to its being there. But I charge you that a railway company has a right to object to the storing of cotton on its right of way that is not placed there for the purpose of shipment on the railroad'—in that he thereby instructed the jury, in effect, that an inference of consent on the part of the company to the placing of property on its right of way arose from the fact, if shown by the evidence, that the property was placed upon such right of way with its knowledge, in the absence of any other testimony, and was a charge on the facts, in violation of section 26, art. 5, of the Constitution of this state, and said charge was in violation of the provisions of section 2135, 1 Code of Laws of South Carolina 1902, which required the plaintiff to affirmatively prove consent on the part of the railway company to the placing of the property on its right of way.

(7) "That his honor, the presiding judge, having charged the jury that 'the statute exempts the railroad company from liability for the destruction by fire of property placed upon its right of way without its consent, and recognizes the right of the company to withhold its consent when any property is placed thereon, and such consent must be affirmatively shown,' erred in also charging the jury that the inference that the company consented to the property being placed on its right of way arose, if the jury should find that it was placed there with the knowledge of the company, it having a right to object, in the absence of any other testimony, the charge being contradictory, and making proof of knowledge equivalent under the statute to proof of consent.

(8) "That his honor, the presiding judge, erred in construing the written notice, Exhibit F, introduced in evidence, and in charging the jury in reference thereto, as follows: 'By this notice the railway says it doesn't consent. It is for you to say whether it did or not. It says the cotton is there at the risk of the owner. I charge you that, if the railroad consented for that cotton to be there, the railroad couldn't limit its liabilities under that statute. The question is: Did the railroad company consent for it to be there? If it consent for it to be there, it can't say: 'I consented for it to be there, but it must be at your risk.' I charge you that under that statute the railroad company can't do that; and, if the railroad company consented for it to be there, why, then, it was at the risk of the railroad if it burned it. Now, that is my interpretation of the law in connection with this notice that has been placed in evidence'—whereas, it is submitted that the railroad company was under no obligation to permit property to be placed or to remain on its right of way until it should be tendered for shipment, and could, in the exercise of its rights, attach to its permission that property be placed or remain on its right of way before being tendered for shipment, a valid condition that should be there without its consent, and at the risk of its owner until tendered for shipment."

B. L. Abney and W. H. Townsend, for appellant. J. E. McDonald, for respondents.

JONES, J. The plaintiff insurance company seeks to be subrogated to the rights of Millett & Co. to recover under section 2135 of the Civil Code of 1902. This statute makes every railroad corporation responsible in damages to the owner whose property may be injured by fire, communicated by its locomotive engines or originating within the limits of the right of way, in consequence of the act of its authorized agents or employes, except in any case where the property shall have been placed on the right of way of such corporation unlawfully or without its consent. It was shown that the cotton of Millett & Co. was destroyed by fire while on defendant's right of way, but not tendered for shipment, by a spark communicated from defendant's locomotive engine; but the vital question is whether the cotton was on defendant's right of way by its consent, as contemplated by the statute.

The undisputed testimony was that Millett & Co. placed the cotton on defendant's right of way under an agreement stipulating: "This cotton is deposited on the premises of the Southern Railway Company and the same remain upon the premises of this company without its consent and at your [Millett &

Co.] sole risk, until tendered and accepted for shipment." Now, it is contended that, notwithstanding this express stipulation, the cotton was on defendant's right of way by its consent before it was tendered for shipment. We cannot think so. Millett & Co. and those in privity with them should be estopped to assert a fact which is contrary to their agreement that until tendered for shipment the cotton remains upon the right of way without defendant's consent. It is said that such an agreement is void on the ground of public policy. As it subverts a very high public policy to enforce contracts between parties sui juris, courts should not nullify contracts as against public policy unless the case is free from all reasonable doubt. The rule is that "a contract is not void as against public policy unless it is injurious to the interest of the public or contravenes some established interest of society." What interest of the public is injuriously affected by the agreement in question? Millett & Co. had no right as a member of the public to place cotton on defendant's premises, unless tendered for shipment, except by agreement with defendant, and defendant owed no duty to the public or to Millett & Co. to allow cotton to be placed on its right of way, except for shipment. A different question would be present if Millett & Co. had the right as a member of the public to place cotton on defendant's right of way, independent of an agreement. The status of the cotton on the right of way, being fixed by the agreement alone, must be determined by the agreement alone. If it be true that the cotton was on defendant's premises by its consent on condition, the owner cannot cling to the consent and repudiate the condition upon which it was given, for that would be like a consent obtained by fraud or deception which is no consent.

The authorities generally hold that a contract by a railroad corporation is not against public policy because it exempts from liability for fires, even negligently communicated by its agents or defective instrumentalities to property placed by the owner upon railroad premises, not as a patron dealing with the company as a common carrier, but by virtue of the special agreement. Griswold v. Illinois Central R. R. Co., 90 Iowa, 285, 57 N. W. 843, 24 L. R. A. 647; Hartford F. Ins. Co. v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co., 70 Fed. 201, 17 C. C. A. 62, 30 L. R. A. 193; Id., 20 Sup. Ct. 33, 175 U. S. 91, 44 L. Ed. 84, following the rule established by the state court in the Griswold Case. Stephens v. Southern Pacific Co., 109 Cal. 86, 41 Pac. 783, 29 L. R. A. 751, 50 Am. St. Rep. 17; Greenwich Ins. Co. v. Louisville & Nashville R. R. Co., 112 Ky. 598, 66 S. W. 411, 67 S. W. 16, 56 L. R. A. 477, 99 Am. St. Rep. 313; Osgood v. Central Vermont R. Co., 77 Vt. 334, 60 Atl. 137, 70 L. R. A. 930; Mann v. Pere Marquette R. Co., 135 Mich. 210, 97 N. W. 721. These cases combat the view that the public has an interest in the contract, because it tends to induce negligence in the equipment and operation of the locomotives. The contract in this case is not to do an act prohibited by statute or which is contrary to the public policy as declared by a statute, but is the admission by both parties of a fact which takes the case out of the statute, viz., that the cotton was not upon the right of way with the consent of defendant until tendered for shipment.

Under the foregoing views, it was error to refuse to direct a verdict for defendant and to refuse the motion for new trial.

The judgment of the circuit court is reversed.

GARY, A. J. (dissenting). This is an appeal from a judgment recovered by the plaintiff against the defendant, under section 2135 of the Code of Laws, for loss of, or damage to, 37 bales of cotton by fire from a locomotive of the defendant, which cotton, it is alleged, had been placed upon the platform and right of way of the defendant, at its depot in Winnsboro, S. C., on the 22d of September, 1904, by its consent.

The cotton had been purchased by Millett & Co., who took out two policies of insurance—one in German-American Insurance Company and the other in Royal Insurance Company—each of said policies being in the sum of $1,000. The loss under the policies, if any, was made payable to the Winnsboro Bank, as its interest might appear, by virtue of an agreement between the insurance companies and Millett & Co. The insurance companies and Millett & Co. joined as plaintiffs in the action, although it was alleged in the complaint that the insurance companies had paid the loss which had been adjusted between them to Millett & Co. and the Winnsboro Bank. It was, however, alleged that Millett & Co. were made parties plaintiff, as a matter of form, by reason of their former interest, to which the insurance companies were subrogated.

The defendant demurred to the complaint, and also filed an answer. The grounds of demurrer were: (1) "That it appeared upon the face of the complaint that no cause of action was stated in favor of the plaintiffs Millett & Co." (2) "That it appeared on the face of the complaint that there was a misjoinder of causes of action, in that the plaintiffs insurance companies each had a separate claim against the defendant, and not a joint cause of action." The demurrer was overruled. At the close of the testimony, the defendant's attorneys requested his honor, the presiding judge, to direct the jury to find a verdict in favor of the defendant, upon grounds hereinafter mentioned, which was refused. The defendant did not introduce any testimony. The jury rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiffs for $1,560.84. The defendant's attorneys also made a motion for a new trial upon the same grounds as those upon which they requested the presiding judge to direct a verdict. The appellant's exceptions will be set out in the report of the case.

The first question that will be considered is whether there was any testimony tending to sustain the allegation of the complaint that the cotton was placed upon the defendant's platform with its consent.

We reproduce the testimony touching this question. E. Millett, a witness for the plaintiffs, testified as follows: "Q. What is that platform used for, Mr. Millett? A. At that time it was to store cotton on principally. Q. Store cotton on principally? A. Yes, sir. Q. For what purpose? A. Until they got a bill of lading for it, or put it in a warehouse. Q. Was cotton generally put there for shipment? A. Yes, sir; but not absolutely. Q. Mr. Millett, you had just bought this cotton from wagons, as they came to town? A. Yes, sir. Q. And it was taken down there and weighed, and just left on the platform? A. It was. Q. You have not tendered it for shipment at all? A. No, sir. Q. Now, as to this notice, can you state whether or not for every bale of cotton you put there you got a notice? About when were these notices sent—once a week, or once a month, or how? A. Well, almost all the time, almost every time I sent one bale or more there, more or less. Q. Sir? A. Once in a while he wouldn't stamp them. He would overlook stamping them, but as a general thing it was on all the notices. Q. You accepted that notice as the terms upon which the cotton was accepted by the railroad company, did you not? A. I paid no attention to it at all. Q. Did you understand that it was not there with their consent? (Mr. McDonald: We object to that.) A. No, I didn't. (Mr. McDonald: Well, I will let that come out. I will withdraw my objection.)"

T. J. Cureton, a member of the firm of Millett & Co., testified as follows: "Q. About this time how was cotton put on that platform for what purposes? A. Well, it was put there for shipment, and also the convenience of the parties. Q. Who weighed the cotton? Q. Who was the weigher there? A. Mr. Creight. Q. Well, captain, will you state whether or not during the cotton season, I mean about this time, along in September, 1904, all the cotton that was bought here, that was not stored in a warehouse, was put there on that platform? A. I think it was, when they could get it on it. Sometime they couldn't get it on. Q. Why couldn't they get it on? A. Sometimes there would be more on the platform than it would hold, and they would have to put it on the ground contiguous. Q. Do you know who controls that platform there? A. I suppose the railroad—the railroad agent. Q. The railroad agent? A. Yes, sir. Q. How near does that platform come up to the depot? A. Comes right up. Q. It is joined to the depot? A. Yes, sir; joined to the depot, and surrounds it. That is, the depot cuts it off rather. Q. Well, there is a platform on all sides, one next to the track, and one the side next to your house? A. Yes, sir. Q. Captain, what did you say about this at the last trial? A. I don't remember. Q. Didn't you say they were there at your risk? A. I considered it there at the risk of my insurance. I wouldn't have taken a policy otherwise. Q. You accepted this as showing that the railroad company didn't consent to that cotton being there, did you not? A. Yes, sir, not on those terms—at their risk. Q. And this cotton was never tendered for shipment? A. Not that I recollect of. Most of it had been bought that day. Q. Captain, were these notices sent every day or every week, or every month, or how? A. It was generally on every lot of cotton bought. Q. Captain, what did you do with these notices? A. I filed them on my file. Q. Did you pay any attention to them? A. I didn't pay any attention to them. Of course, I knew that that was the terms."

W. H. Flenniken, another witness in behalf of the plaintiffs, testified as follows: "Q. Mr. Flenniken, when cotton is bought here from wagons, what is done with it? A. It is hauled to the depot down there, weighed up by the public weigher, and the tickets are sent here for settlement. Q. Who is the public weigher there? A. Mr. Creight—W. D. Creight. Q. Where is the cotton left after it is weighed? A. On the platform, sir. Q. For what purpose? A. For shipping; that is as far as I know, of course."

The following instrument of writing was introduced in evidence, under the admission that, while it is not the notice given to Millett, it is similar:

No. — Winnsboro, S. C., —, 190—. Bought by — from (—) Bales. Cotton as listed. Weight. This cotton is deposited on premises of the Southern Railway Company, and the same remain upon the premises of this Company without its consent and at your sole risk until tendered and accepted for shipment.

W. B. Creight, Agt.
Weigher.

This testimony shows that the platform was used by the public generally as a place for storing cotton, preparatory to shipment, by consent of the defendant; that, as the railroad company had control of the platform, the cotton was in its possession as soon as it was deposited thereon; that, while the mutual benefits contemplated by the public and the railroad company may not have created the relation of temporary warehouseman on the part of the defendant, nevertheless it became a gratuitous bailee; that the conduct of the defendant was not only calculated to affect the rights of Millett & Co., but likewise of the public generally, who, in effect, were invited to place cotton on the platform.

Our construction of the writing containing the notice is that the defendant consented for the cotton to be deposited on its platform, but attached a condition to its consent.

The testimony shows that the exceptions raising this question cannot be sustained.

The next question for consideration is whether the condition is valid. Section 2135 of the Code of Laws is as follows: "Every railroad corporation shall be responsible in damages to any person or corporation whose buildings or property may be injured by fire communicated by its locomotive engine, or originating within the limits of the right of way of said road in consequence of the act of any of its authorized agents or employees, except in any case where the property shall have been placed on the right of way of such corporation unlawfully, or without its consent, and shall have an insurable interest in the property upon its route for which it may be held responsible, and may procure insurance thereon in its own behalf." This statute was construed in the case of McCandless v. Railroad, 38 S. C. 103, 16 S. E. 429, 18 L. R. A. 440, and declared to be constitutional, and in every state adopting a similar statute it has been construed with the same result. The Supreme Court of the United States has sustained the constitutionality of these statutes, and in the case of St. Louis & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Mathews, 165 U. S. 1, 17 Sup. Ct. 243, 41 L. Ed. 611, ably and elaborately discusses the reason for this conclusion, which is that they are a legitimate exercise of the police power. See, also, Atchison T. & S. F. R. R. Co. v. Matthews, 174 U. S. 96, 19 Sup. Ct. 609, 43 L. Ed. 909, and McConnell v. Kitchens, 20 S. C. 430, 47 Am. Rep. 845. Statutes prohibiting certain acts on the ground that they are against public policy stand upon a different footing from others, inasmuch as contracts entered into between parties contrary to the provisions of such statutes are null and void. McConnell v. Kitchens, 20 S. C. 430, 47 Am. Rep. 845; Thomas v. Railroad Co., 101 U. S. 71, 25 L. Ed. 950. As this statute has been declared valid as a police measure, it necessarily follows that the public has an interest in its provisions, which cannot be abrogated by private agreement. It is this reason that prevents us from following the principle announced in the cases cited by the appellant's attorneys. In determining the question under consideration, we are not controlled by the decisions of the Supreme Court or the United States, as that court decided in the case of Hartford Ins. Co. v. Railroad Co., 175 U. S. 91, 20 Sup. Ct. 83, 44 L. Ed. 84, that such questions arise under statutory local laws and the decisions of the state courts will be followed, by the courts of the United States, in the construction of these statutes.

These views practically dispose of all questions presented, except those mentioned in the third and fifth exceptions, which have not been argued by the appellant's attorneys, and we deem it only necessary to state that, upon examination, it has been found they cannot be sustained.

To recapitulate, it thus appears (1) that the testimony shows the cotton was placed on the platform by consent of the railroad company; (2) that the statute was enacted as a police regulation; and (3) that the contention of the appellant that a valid condition was attached to the notice cannot be sustained, for the reason that the condition limited the operation of the statute as a police regulation and was against public policy.

For these reasons, I dissent.

THOMPSON v. PIEDMONT MUT. INS. CO.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Aug. 5, 1907.)

1. INSURANCE — ADDITIONAL POLICIES — KNOWLEDGE OF AGENT.

In an action on an insurance policy, evidence held to show that the soliciting agent of the company had notice that the property was insured in two other companies at the time of the application.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 28, Insurance, § 1716.]

2. SAME—MUTUAL INSURANCE—RIGHT TO SUE.

A mutual assessment insurance policy provided that no suit should be brought thereon until an assessment had been made, or until insured had taken such steps as were necessary to compel the assessment. After loss the company denied all liability. Held, that insured could sue on the policy before bringing an action to compel an assessment.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Chesterfield.

Action by John Thompson, as trustee for J. E. Williams, against the Piedmont Mutual Insurance Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Carlisle & Carlisle, for appellant. R. T. Caston, Edward McIver, and Stevenson & Matheson, for appellee.

GARY, A. J. The following statement is set out in the record: "This is an action brought by the plaintiff as the trustee of the bankrupt estate of J. E. Williams against the Piedmont Mutual Insurance Company. The complaint is based upon a policy of insurance in the sum of two thousand ($2,000.00) dollars, and alleges the compliance with all the terms and conditions of the policy and loss of twelve thousand ($12,000.00) dollars on storeroom and goods in Chesterfield county. The complaint further alleges that J. E. Williams, the insured, was adjudged bankrupt by the United States court before this suit commenced. In the prayer for judgment, demand is made against the defendant for the sum of two thousand ($2,000.00) dollars and costs." The answer admits the execution of policy sued on, and sets up several affirmative defenses, all of which were abandoned at the trial, except two, as follows: "First. In that after the issuance of the policy, without the knowledge or consent of this defendant, plaintiff took out additional insurance upon the property covered by this policy, in other companies, which said policies were in force at the time of the fire. Second. In that insured agreed in said policy that no suit or action against this company, for collection of any claim against it, should be sustainable in any court of law until assessment had been made against the policies then liable for their pro rata share due on each policy to pay said claim, and that he would assume the burden of proving affirmatively, as part of his case in chief, that said assessment had been made, and that all the other conditions and requirements of the policy had been complied with, or that he had taken such legal steps as may have been necessary to compel said assessment, if the company should refuse to pay the same; and the defendant had refused, and did refuse, to make an assessment to pay the claim of plaintiff's assignor, J. E. Williams, and that no steps were taken before this suit was brought to compel them to do so." The jury rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $2,000. The defendant made a motion for a new trial, upon grounds which were overruled, and afterwards made the basis of its exceptions.

1. The first assignment of error is as follows: "Because the verdict was totally without evidence to sustain it, under the charge of his honor 'that a mere soliciting agent of the company, without the power to write or deliver a policy, would have no power to receive notice for the company, except as the same would relate to a policy of insurance which he was soliciting at that time; that is, notice of additional insurance,' and also because the said verdict was without facts and evidence to sustain it under the charge of his honor 'that a mere soliciting agent, who does nothing but go around and ask people to insure, and take their application, any incidental knowledge he may acquire would not amount to notice to insure company itself—the error being that all the testimony showed that agent mentioned was merely a soliciting agent, and did not obtain knowledge of additional insurance while soliciting or delivering the policy sued on, but that such information, if received at all, was received months afterward."

J. E. Williams, the party insured, testified in behalf of the plaintiff as follows: "Q. You didn't get this insurance policy from Mr. Clark? A. I think the same man. Q. Did not the policy come by mail? A. Of course. Q. Do you mean you got the paper from Mr. Clark? A. I took the insurance from Mr. Clark, and the policy came through the mail. Q. What other insurance was there on that property at the time of the fire? A. One in Philadelphia and one in New York.

Q. When Mr. Clark was there the last time, did you tell him about the other insurance you had? A. Yes. Q. What was Mr. Clark doing? A. He was talking up for the Piedmont. Q. Did he solicit insurance with you? A. Yes; he said he could let me have a little more insurance, that they did not hardly ever go further than $2,000, but they could put a few hundred more. I told him I had $6,000 in insurance, and he said he could give a few more hundred, a little amount, he didn't say the amount, in his company. Q. Did you take it or not? A. No; I told him I would see him later. Q. You paid assessments after Mr. Clark and you were talking that summer? A. Yes. Q. After the fire? A. No; I sent a check after the fire, and it was returned. Q. Was that the only one you paid after your last talk? A. No; I paid until the fire and after the fire. Q. When they sent the check back that you sent, was there a letter or anything with it? A. Yes; they said they had sent it through mistake. Q. What reason did they assign for sending it back? A. They said I was not due it; that they had sent it through mistake; that I was not due them any, as my store was burnt." When recalled for the defendant, he testified as follows: "Q. After you took out this additional insurance, is it not a fact that Mr. Clark came there representing the same company that you had insured in? (Defendant objects to witness proving agency of Clark by the declarations of Clark himself.) Q. Is it not a fact that he had the applications of this same company along? A. Yes. Q. And undertook to get you to take insurance in the same company that you had it in before? A. Yes. Q. That was after you took the other insurance? A. Yes. Q. You told him that fact? A. Yes. Q. He solicited insurance for this very company? A. He did. Q. Had you had any notice that he was not representing that company from the company itself? A. No. Q. You made your application through him? A. Yes. Q. And the company issued you a policy? A. Yes. Q. You dealt with him while he was there representing the company? A. Yes. Q. Without any notice that he was not representing the company? A. No." Opposite the signature of J. E. Williams to his application for insurance, in pursuance of which the policy herein was issued, are these words: "Witnessed and approved by J. B. Clark, agent."

From the foregoing it will be seen that there was testimony to the effect that J. B. Clark was the agent of the insurance company who solicited insurance from the plaintiff, and through whom he made his application, which was approved by Clark; also, that he not only then, but afterwards, exercised powers other than those of a mere soliciting agent, and apparently within the scope of his employment; and that he received notice from J. E. Williams, while soliciting additional insurance, and exercising the right to determine, in the first instance, whether it was a desirable risk, that Williams had insured the property in two other companies. There was no testimony tending to prove that J. E. Williams had notice of any change of the relations existing between the insurance company and Clark. He therefore had the right to presume that they still continued. Wilson v. Assurance Co., 51 S. C. 540, 29 S. E. 245, 64 Am. St. Rep. 700. The information which Clark received had a direct connection with the transaction in which he was attempting to negotiate additional insurance, and notice of such facts was, therefore, imputable to the insurance company.

In the case of Gibbes Machinery Co. v. Roper, 77 S. C. 39, 43, 57 S. E. 667, 669, J. A. Pate, an agent of the plaintiff, while negotiating the sale of certain machinery, received notice of a deed from L. B. Roper to Pocahontas Roper, and of the mortgage of the land from Pocahontas Roper to C. S. McCall, but failed to communicate such notice to his principal. The question was whether the Gibbes Machinery Company was a creditor for value without notice as to the land conveyed by the deed. The court thus ruled upon this question: "Pate unquestionably had authority as agent to enter into the agreement for the sale of the machinery subject to the approval of his principal, and, in this instance, the sale of the machinery was ratified by the principal. The contract showed upon its face that a due regard for business methods made it the duty of the agent to take into consideration the financial responsibility of the purchaser, in the absence of a limitation upon the authority of the agent, of which the purchaser had notice. And it appears from the testimony that the agent, in discharging said duty, considered the fact that the land had been conveyed to Mrs. Roper, and by her mortgaged to C. S. McCall, in determining whether the credit of L. B. Roper was thereby affected. As the financial condition of L. B. Roper was an element necessarily entering into the sale of the machinery by the agent, in the first instance, unless the purchaser had been notified that the agent was not authorized to consider this question, the fact that Roper had conveyed the land and that it had been mortgaged was material, and had a direct bearing upon the contract. Under such circumstances notice communicated to the agent will be imputed to the principal. Salinas v. Turner, 33 S. C. 231, 11 S. E. 702; Bates v. Mortgage Co., 37 S. C. 88, 16 S. E. 883, 21 L. R. A. 340; American Co. v. Felder, 44 S. C. 478, 22 S. E. 598; Blackwell v. Mortgage Co., 65 S. C. 105, 43 S. E. 395. Therefore there was error in the ruling that the plaintiff was a purchaser for value without notice." This exception is overruled.

2. There are several other exceptions, but they simply present, in different form, the question whether "his honor erred in charging the jury that plaintiff did not have to bring an action to compel assessment against the policies then liable for their pro rata share, before suit could be brought at law on the policies of insurance, when the company denied liability on the policies." The rule is thus stated in Lawler v. Murphy, 58 Conn. 294, 20 Atl. 457, 8 L. R. A. 113, 119: "Two other questions were discussed before us, namely, whether, if it should be held that the contract contained an agreement to make an assessment, the plaintiff's remedy is at law, or whether she must first go into a court of equity to compel the defendants to make the assessment; and, if an action of law can be sustained, what is the rule of damages. As to the first, we think an action at law can be sustained. Neither circuitry nor multiplication of actions is favored by our practice. If there is a contract to make an assessment, a breach of which is alleged and damages demanded therefor, and a rule of damages can be provided, why should not an action at law be sustained? Both Niblack and Bacon, recent writers upon the subject of Mutual Benefit Societies, after examining a great number of cases, come to the conclusion, with which we fully agree, that the decided weight of authority is to the effect that an action at law will lie for damages for breach of a contract to make an assessment." See, also, Bentz v. N. W. Aid Ass'n, 40 Minn. 202, 41 N. W. 1037, 2 L. R. A. 784; Jackson v. N. W. M. B. Ass'n, 73 Wis. 507, 41 N. W. 708, 2 L. R. A. 786.

When the insurance company denies all liability and refuses to make the assessment, it has no just ground to complain if the party insured brings an action at law, and recovers the amount of damages to which he would have been entitled if the company had performed its part of the contract.

These exceptions are also overruled.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

LEE v. UNKEFER et al.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Aug. 2, 1907.)

1. PARTIES—DEFECT.

Where a defect of parties plaintiff appears on the face of the complaint, the objection must be raised by demurrer, otherwise by answer.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 37, Parties, §§ 123, 125.]

2. SAME—WAIVER.

Where a defect of parties plaintiff is not raised by demurrer or answer, it is waived.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 37, Parties, § 167.]

3. FRAUDS, STATUTE OF—PROMISE TO PAY DEBT OF ANOTHER—NEW CONSIDERATION.

A promise to pay the debt of another on forbearance to enforce a subsisting lien is not within the statute of frauds, where the release is a damage to the creditor or a benefit to the party making the promise.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 23, Frauds, Statute of, §§ 50-58.]

4. DISMISSAL AND NONSUIT—GROUNDS.

Admission of improper evidence is not ground for nonsuit.

5. TRIAL—EVIDENCE—MOTION TO STRIKE.

Where no objection is made to evidence when offered, a motion to strike it out is properly denied.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Spartanburg.

Action by J. M. Lee against J. G. Unkefer and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant Unkefer appeals. Reversed.

Simpson & Bomar, for appellant. Sanders & De Pass, for appellee.

GARY, A. J. This is an action to recover the balance alleged to be due on a promissory note.

The questions presented by the exceptions render necessary reference to the complaint, the allegations of which are substantially as follows: That the defendants were partners doing business, as plaintiff is informed and believes, under the firm name of McIlwain, Unkefer Company. That on or about the — day of —, 1900, the plaintiff herein, being then the owner of a note, dated the 19th of December, 1895, for $7,500, due on or before the 1st of January, 1901, signed by James C. Johnston, and secured by a mortgage of real estate, and being also the owner of a note dated the 18th of November, 1896, due December 18, 1896, for $3,964, signed by James C. Johnston, and secured by mortgage of real estate, commenced an action to foreclose said mortgages. That at the time of the commencement of said action the Central National Bank held a note of James C. Johnston, indorsed by this plaintiff, dated June 10, 1898, for $6,129.23, with interest thereon at 8 per cent. per annum from the 4th of April, 1900, and to secure said note this plaintiff had assigned and delivered, as collateral security, the notes and mortgages to said bank. That the defendants, having formed a corporation, or being about to form one, with James C. Johnston, and being desirous of purchasing the land covering said mortgages, for the purpose of quarrying stone, in order to obtain a clear title to said land, contracted with this plaintiff that, if he would stop said suit and assign Samuel B. Goucher the said mortgages and notes, they would pay the amount due the Central National Bank by the said James C. Johnston, for which this plaintiff was security, and, in addition to that, would pay the plaintiff in cash the sum of $2,000, and would pay the balance due on the note by James C. Johnston to the Central National Bank, for which this plaintiff was security, which note was to be assigned by the Central

National Bank to this plaintiff. Said payments to be made as follows: $1,000 of said balance to be paid on the 1st of November, 1901, the balance to be paid on April 1, 1902, the interest in the meantime to be paid semiannually. That, in consideration of said agreement, this plaintiff did stop said suit for the foreclosure of said mortgages, and did assign the same to Samuel B. Goucher, which assignment this plaintiff alleges was for the benefit of all the defendants herein; it being understood, as plaintiff is informed and believes, that these defendants were to take stock in the corporation then recently formed, or about to be formed, to be known as Keystone Granite Company, in payment and satisfaction of said mortgages. That thereafter the defendant did pay to plaintiff the amount due Central National Bank, and the sum of $2,000 in cash, and on the 10th November, 1901, the $1,000 first installment on the balance of said note, as they had agreed to do. That defendants have failed to pay the balance due on said note, and there is now due by defendants to plaintiff the sum of $3,459.56, interest thereon at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum from the 1st of November, 1901. The defendant, J. G. Unkefer denied the allegations of partnership, also the allegations as to the agreement between the plaintiff and the defendants, and interposed the plea that the said agreement was obnoxious to the statute of frauds. At the close of the plaintiff's testimony, the defendant Unkefer made a motion for a nonsuit, on the following grounds: "(1) That James C. Johnston was a partner also, and there was a failure to join him as a party plaintiff. (2) That the testimony merely showed a collateral agreement to pay the debt of another, and which was not to be performed within a year. (3) That the plaintiff's action was to recover the balance on a note originally given for $6,129.23, and his own testimony showed that the defendant had promised to pay not the note sued on, but an entirely different note, executed at another time, and for the sum of $7,500." The motion for nonsuit was refused. The jury rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $4,410.72 against J. G. Unkefer (the only defendant who was served). The defendant appealed upon numerous exceptions which, however, may be considered under the following heads:

1. Was there error in refusing the motion for nonsuit on the ground that there was a failure to join James C. Johnston as a party plaintiff? The rule is well settled that if there is a failure to join a necessary party as a plaintiff, and the defect appears upon the face of the complaint, the proper remedy is by demurrer. If, however, the complaint does not disclose the infirmity, then the objection must be taken by answer; but in either case the party raising the objection must point out the defect, in order that the amendment may not cause delay.

If the objection to the nonjoinder of a party is not raised in this manner, it is waived. Pomeroy's Code Rem. §§ 206, 207; 15 Enc. of Pl. & Pr. 747-749.

2. Does the testimony merely show a collateral agreement to pay the debt of another? One of the considerations entering into the agreement was the discontinuance of the suit for foreclosure of the two mortgages, and the cancellation or control of them by the defendants. The case is ruled by the well-settled principle recognized in Ellis v. Carroll, 68 S. C. 376, 47 S. E. 679, 102 Am. ~~Est.~~ Rep. 679, that a promise to pay the debt of another, upon forbearance to enforce a subsisting lien, is not within the statute of frauds, when the release is a damage to the creditor, or a benefit to the party making the promise. The exceptions raising this question cannot be sustained.

3. Was the testimony of the plaintiff inadmissible, on the ground that it contradicted the written evidence of the agreement? In the first place, his honor, the presiding judge, was not requested to rule upon any specific objections to testimony supposed to contradict the written evidence of the agreement, and the general objection interposed by the defendants' attorneys was not sufficient to raise this question. The presiding judge, therefore, properly refused to consider this objection in ruling upon the motion for nonsuit, and, even if it was incompetent, it could not serve as the basis of a motion for nonsuit. Ashe v. Railway, 65 S. C. 134, 43 S. E. 398. The exceptions raising this question are overruled.

4. Was there a fatal variance between the allegations of the complaint and the testimony, as to the agreement between the plaintiff and the defendants? On the 8th of January, 1900, while the action was pending to foreclose the two mortgages, S. P. Goucher, for McIlwain, Unkefer Company, entered into a written agreement with the plaintiff, whereby Lee was to take no further action in the foreclosure proceedings until April 1, 1900, and in consideration thereof the defendants were to pay the interest on the $7,500 note from that date, until the 1st of April, 1900, and also the interest on the $6,129.23 note, and at the expiration of the time mentioned the defendants were to have the option of paying the $6,129.23 note and of securing to Lee payment of the note for $8,000 (meaning thereby the $7,500 note), or of paying that note and of having it assigned to them or some one of them. The testimony shows that Unkefer about the 1st of April, 1900, came to Spartanburg and refused to abide by the said agreement, and that he and the plaintiff entered into another agreement, the terms of which are thus stated by the plaintiff: "Q. What was the trade? A. He was to pay off the bank note and release me of that, and then was to pay $2,000 to me at that time, and at six months to pay another $1,000, and at another six months was to pay the remainder, with interest. Q. Which note was that? A. $8,000 note. Q. How much did he pay the bank at that time? A. He paid it all up. Q. Paid the $8,000 all off? A. $6,000. Q. The $6,000? A. Entirely off. Q. He paid that to the bank on that date? A. Yes, sir. Q. After he had paid it off, what did he do—what did the bank do? A. Gave it to me, I reckon. Q. What note are you suing on in this action? A. Suing on the note that was given first, as he promised to pay off. Q. What I want to know is which note is it you claim McIlwain, Unkefer Company owe you. Is it this $6,129, or $7,500, or the $3,149 note? A. I reckon it is the $7,500 note. Q. Don't you know? A. He paid off the bank. Q. Your suit, Mr. Lee, is brought on the $6,129 note, and the allegation here in the complaint is that they owed you a balance on that note. Is that correct? A. They had two mortgages. Q. Which note is it you are suing on? Which note is it that Unkefer promised to pay? A. It was the $8,000 note. He promised to pay me first, and then he would not do that. He wanted some changes, and, when I agreed, then he paid the bank off. Q. How much money did Mr. Unkefer pay the bank when he was here the latter part of March? A. He paid them $6,000. Q. $6,129? A. Yes, sir. Q. What became of the note for $6,129? Have you ever had it from that day until this? A. No, sir. Q. And it was paid off that day at the bank, the Central National Bank? A. Yes, sir. Q. After that was paid he paid you in addition $2,000 in cash? A. That was on that $8,000. Q. He paid you that day $2,000 in cash? A. Yes, sir. Q. Didn't he also pay you later a $1,000? A. Yes, sir; in six months. Q. You say that $8,000 is still due? A. Yes, sir. Q. Balance of the $8,000 note? A. Whatever it is." It will thus be seen that the agreement alleged in the complaint and the testimony of the plaintiff to sustain those allegations vary in important particulars. It is stated in the complaint, and seems to be conceded by the plaintiff in his testimony, that the note for $6,129.23 was paid in full to the Central National Bank by the defendants. If this be true, then a recovery in this action would, to that extent, compel the defendants to pay the note twice, even, too, after it had lost its legal effect. These complications would be avoided, if the plaintiff could recover upon an agreement that the defendants were to pay the balance due on the note for $7,500. This court, of course, is not to be understood as expressing any opinion upon the facts, but wishes merely to show that there is a vital variance between the allegations and the testimony. The exceptions raising this question are sustained.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be reversed, and the case remanded to that court for a new trial.

ROUNTREE et al. v. GAULDEN.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 13, 1907.)

1. DESCENT AND DISTRIBUTION—SURVIVING WIFE—ELECTION—DOWER—CHILD'S PART.

When it appears that the widow, who was entitled either to dower or to a child's part in the real estate of her husband, dealt with an interest therein as if she were the absolute owner, such conduct will be sufficient to raise an inference that she had made an election to take a child's part in the time prescribed by law, and cast upon those seeking to show that she had not so elected the burden of showing that such an election had not taken place within such time. And this is true notwithstanding the widow may have made a mistake of law as to the interest she was entitled to, and claimed a one-sixth interest, when she was really entitled to a one-fifth interest.

Error from Superior Court, Brooks County; R. G. Mitchell, Judge.

Action by S. S. Rountree and others against Mrs. Gaudlen. Judgment for plaintiff. On levy of execution, S. S. Gaudlen filed a claim. Judgment for claimant, and plaintiffs bring error. Reversed.

The executors of Rountree obtained a judgment against Mrs. Jones, and caused the execution issuing thereon to be levied upon an undivided one-sixth interest in a described parcel of land. Gaudlen interposed a claim. The case was submitted to the judge, without the intervention of a jury, who heard the same upon certain agreed facts and evidence, and rendered a judgment finding the property not subject. The plaintiffs in execution assign error upon this judgment, and also upon certain rulings upon the admissibility of testimony. It appeared from the evidence that Hardy E. Hunter, who died intestate in the year 1855, was at the time of his death the owner of the tract of land which was referred to in the levy; that he left surviving him a widow and five children; that his widow was appointed his administratrix, and in the year 1856 intermarried with Jones, who became the administrator; that Jones, as administrator, sold all of the lands of the intestate, except the land referred to in the levy, and paid three of the children their interests as distributees in the proceeds of the sale, the receipts for such amounts being dated at different times during the year 1869. The testator of the plaintiffs in execution obtained a judgment against Mrs. Jones, who was the widow of Hunter, in 1881. The execution issued upon this judgment has been kept in life by proper entries, and is the execution levied in the present case. A witness testified that Mrs. Jones resided on the land described in the judgment when the same was obtained, and lived there during the lifetime of her husband, Jones, and since his death. A deed was introduced in evidence, dated December 31, 1900, in which three children of Hunter and Mrs. Jones were the grantors and Hardy M. Hunter, another child, was the grantee, which recited that the parties to the deed being the heirs at law of Hardy E. Hunter, and the parties of the first part having received their distributive shares of the estate, and the party of the second part not having been settled with, and only a small portion of the estate remaining, in consideration of these facts and the sum of $10, the grantors quit-claimed to the grantee all of their interest in the lot of land described in the levy. A deed from the grantee in the deed above referred to to Gaudlen, the claimant, dated January 11, 1901, upon a consideration of $2,000, conveying the lot described in the levy, was also introduced. J. E. Hunter, a son of the defendant in execution, was examined by interrogatories. One of the interrogatories was as follows: "How much land did your father own at his death? Did she ever claim a child's part in any of those lands? What became of those lands? How much remained unsold by the administrator of your father's estate?" The witness answered: "About 1,500 acres, and my mother never claimed a child's part in any of it. All of this was sold by the administrator, except the 205 acres now held by Dr. S. S. Gaudlen." This interrogatory and answer were objected to, on the ground that it was sought thereby to introduce secondary evidence as to the facts inquired about, and because the evidence was irrelevant and immaterial. In answer to the question as to why his mother and the children made a deed to H. M. Hunter, the witness said: "Because he had never received anything from the estate." This was objected to on the ground that the evidence was irrelevant. The witness, in answer to another interrogatory, stated that Wm. Jones had bought the land of the estate and badly managed it, and he heard his mother say that her husband had so squandered her first husband's estate that she did not feel that she was entitled to anything. This was also objected to, upon the ground that it was immaterial and irrelevant. The evidence in the answer to the interrogatory above referred to was also objected to upon the ground that the witness admitted, in the answer to the interrogatory, that he derived his information from having heard his mother talk and on account of his familiarity with the matters connected with the estate. The plaintiff in execution offered in evidence the answer of Mrs. Jones to an interrogatory propounded to her in another case, in which she said she had agreed to waive her right to dower and take a child's part in the estate of her first husband. Upon objection by counsel for claimant this evidence was ruled out. It was shown that the records of Lowndes county, which contained the record of the administration of Hunter's estate, had been destroyed by fire in 1863. Plaintiff in execution tendered in evidence the marriage settlement between Wm. Jones, Martha Hunter, and James West, trustee, dated August 7, 1856, which recited that Martha Hunter was "entitled, as widow and heir" of the estate of Hardy Hunter, to a "one-sixth part of said estate," and, no division having been made among the heirs and distributees, she, in consideration of the intended marriage and of $1 paid by said Jones, conveyed to West "her interest in the said estate of said Hardy Hunter, deceased, together with its increase, it being a one-sixth part of the property herein specified," but nevertheless upon certain trusts therein referred to. The land referred to in the levy was embraced in the property described in the marriage settlement. The trustee in the marriage settlement was to hold the property therein conveyed "upon the trusts and for the uses of the said Wm. Jones during the joint lives of the said Wm. Jones and Martha Hunter, his intended wife, and, after the death of either of them, then of the survivor during the term of his or her natural life, and, if either of them die having no issue living by the other, then to convey the said property to the survivor, forever, and, if the said Wm. Jones and Martha Hunter should both die having issue living of the said marriage, then in trust to convey said separate property to the said issue living at the time of the death of the survivor of them share and share alike." It appeared from the evidence that Wm. Jones was dead at the time of the levy. The court refused to admit the marriage settlement, and this ruling is assigned as error.

COBB, P. J. (after stating the facts). 1. Upon the death of the husband, the wife is entitled to dower. She is permitted to take, however, in lieu of dower a child's share in the estate. If she elects to take her dower, she has no further interest in the realty. If she elects to take a child's share, she is entitled to the share which a child would take, unless the shares exceed five in number, in which event she is entitled to a one-fifth part of the estate. Civ. Code 1895, § 3355. Her election to take a child's part of the real estate in lieu of dower must be exercised within 12 months from the grant of letters testamentary or of administration on the husband's estate. Civ. Code 1895, § 4689; La Grange Mills v. Kener, 121 Ga. 429, 49 S. E. 300. There is no presumption of law that a widow will elect, or has elected, to take a child's part in the estate of her husband. Jossey v. Brown, 119 Ga. 758, 47 S. E. 350.

It must affirmatively appear that she elected to take a child's part within the time prescribed by law. This may appear by an election in writing, duly signed, filed and recorded in the office of the ordinary, but this is not the only method of proving the fact of such election. The fact of election may be shown by circumstances establishing the same, as well as by direct evidence. If the circumstances are such as to establish that an election has been made in time, it is as much affirmatively established as if there were direct evidence to that effect. The conduct of the widow in reference to the property of the estate of her husband may be looked to in determining whether an election has taken place. In Sewell v. Smith, 54 Ga. 567, it was held that where the widow remained in possession of land in which she was entitled to take either dower or a child's part until long after her right to dower was barred, without making any formal election, there would be a presumption that she had elected to take a child's part, and this is especially true where such a course was most beneficial to her interests. In Sloan v. Whitaker, 58 Ga. 319, it was held that where a widow, whose apparent interest was to take a child's part in lieu of dower, was assigned a child's share of her husband's realty as well as personalty, which was accepted and appropriated, there would be a presumption after her death, until the contrary appeared, that she had elected to take a child's share in lieu of dower, and this was true, though no steps for making the division were taken until after the time for making an election had expired. If the widow deals with an interest in the estate as her own, which she would not be entitled to except upon the theory that she had elected to take a child's share, the fact that she so dealt with it is a circumstance to be considered in determining whether she had so elected. We think that the marriage settlement, in which Mrs. Jones dealt with the property in question as if it were her own, and which could not be hers unless she had elected to take a child's share in the estate, was admissible on the question as to whether an election to take a child's share had been made by her. It is true that it does not appear that this marriage settlement was executed within 12 months from the date of the administration upon the former husband's estate, and that it does not appear that the other acts by the widow tending to show an election took place within 12 months; but the fact that she so dealt with it, even if it was after the expiration of such time, indicated that an election had taken place, and the evidence, taken as a whole, both that admitted and that rejected, which could be properly admitted, was of such a character as to at least establish prima facie that an election had taken place. It was sufficient to cast the burden upon the claimant to disprove an election. But, it is said, she dealt with a one-sixth interest in the estate as her own, when, under the law, she was entitled to a one-fifth interest. That she made a mistake of law as to her interest does not alter the situation. She was entitled to no interest in the estate except dower or a child's share in fee. She made a mistake as to the quantum of her share in fee, but she was evidently dealing with the property as if she were the owner, and there is nothing in her conduct to indicate that there was any other intention on her part. If she was entitled to a one-fifth interest, and claimed, under a mistake of law, only a one-sixth, she would not lose that which she claimed simply because by the mistake she received less than the law allowed.

2. The admissions of the defendant in execution in a claim case, made after the pendency of the litigation, are not admissible in evidence, but admissions made before the pendency of the litigation are admissible. Civ. Code 1895, § 5189; Horn v. Ross, 20 Ga. 210, 65 Am. Dec. 621; Van Epps' Notes; Smith v. Cox, 20 Ga. 240. The declaration of a defendant in execution, made at a time when it was against his interest to make it, has been held to be admissible in favor of the plaintiff in execution. Foster v. Rutherford, 20 Ga. 676. When a defendant in execution is in possession of the land at the time of the levy, any declaration made by him up to the time of the levy, and while in possession, is admissible in evidence in a claim case. Rutledge v. Hudson, 80 Ga. 267, 5 S. E. 93; Smiley v. Padgett, 123 Ga. 39, 50 S. E. 927. Any declaration made by Mrs. Jones while she was in possession of the property, which was prejudicial to her interest, would be admissible in evidence against those claiming under her. Glanton v. Griggs, 5 Ga. 434. Declarations by Mrs. Jones against her interest, made while she was in possession of the property and prior to the conveyance which passed whatever interest she had therein to her son, would be admissible against a claimant who derived title from her grantee. The declarations made by her, whether against her interest or in her own favor at the time when she was not the owner or in possession of the property, and subsequently to the pendency of the present litigation, would not be admissible. Civ. Code 1895, § 5180. It is said, though, that, even if it was erroneous to refuse to admit in evidence the marriage settlement, the judgment should not be reversed, for, if the marriage settlement had been admitted, it would have shown that Mrs. Jones had no leviable estate in the property, for the reason that the marriage settlement created an executory trust. We will not now pass upon the question as to the character of the estate that Mrs. Jones has in the property, for the reason that this question was not passed upon by the trial judge. The marriage settlement was offered in evidence for the purpose of showing that Mrs. Jones had dealt with what she thought was a child's share in her husband's estate, and its admissibility for this purpose was the only question passed upon by the trial judge. Whether Mrs. Jones, since the death of her second husband, has an interest in the property which is subject to levy and sale, or whether the marriage settlement created merely an executory trust giving her an interest only in the rents, issues, and profits, we will not now undertake to determine, leaving these questions to be decided on another trial. The evidence was admissible for the purpose for which it was offered—that is, as a circumstance showing an election by the widow to take a child's share—and whether when admitted it will have the effect to entirely defeat the plaintiff in execution we will leave for determination after the evidence is before the court, and the question of the construction of the instrument has been passed upon by the trial judge.

Error from Superior Court, Cherokee County; Geo. F. Gober, Judge.

Action by J. B. Roberts against U. L. Starnes. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Roberts brought his action against Starnes to recover two marble monuments. The evidence showed, in brief, as follows: At one time the plaintiff, the defendant, and another were partners, and conducted business under the name of the Roberts Marble Company. Subsequently the plaintiff bought the interests of the other two, and conducted business in the same name. At a later date the defendant purchased from him the two monuments for which suit was brought. The written contract which was signed by the defendant stated that he had made the purchase from the Roberts Marble Company. It provided that the purchase price should be paid in cash; that the property should belong to the Roberts Marble Company until wholly paid for, and that it could be taken possession of by the vendor. The plaintiff testified: "I delivered it [the property] to him with that understanding, that he pay for it in cash, as soon as he could drive there and set it up and come back, he would pay me for it. I delivered it to him with that understanding." When asked, "Isn't it true you agreed to deliver it to him for him to load on wagon and carry to Mrs. Stephens and deliver it?" he answered, "I supposed it was going there, from the contract. That was not the agreement between me and Starnes. I was not present when they were loaded on the wagon. We agreed to load the stuff for him." He was then asked, "And for him to take them over there to the original purchaser, Mrs. Stephens?" He answered, "There was no agreement about that." At another time he said: "I do not know it is true that at the time Mr. Starnes told me he would take the monuments and set them up and come back and pay me that he was taking them to set up for Mrs. Stephens in Milton county." The defendant took the monuments, but failed to pay for them or to return them on demand. He introduced no evidence. The presiding judge refused to grant a nonsuit or to direct a verdict for the defendant, but directed a verdict for the plaintiff.

N. A. Morris and Chas. H. Griffin, for plaintiff in error. G. I. Teasley and P. P. Du Pre, for defendant in error.

LUMPKIN, J. (after stating the facts). The principles set out in the headnote and the authorities there cited control the case. The evidence did not show such a relinquishment or waiver of the plaintiff's right as against the defendant as to prevent a recovery. Had it been sought to recover the property from the person who purchased it from the defendant, a very different case would have been presented; or, if the evidence had shown that the plaintiff agreed for the defendant to sell the property before payment, this might have raised the question whether such sale would have been a conversion. The testimony, however, does not go to that extent.

Some authorities go further than we feel called on to do in this case. Thus in Dows v. Dennistoun, 28 Barb. 393, the Supreme Court of New York declared that "an understanding, arrangement, or custom that the possession of the goods shall be intrusted to the vendee for the purpose of enabling him to realize upon them, and thus provide the means for the payment of the price, cannot be construed into an absolute transfer of the title to the property, as between the original parties to it, or persons having no greater equities than the original parties." See, also, on the general subject, Harding v. Metz, 1 Tenn. Ch. 610; Adams v. O'Connor, 100 Mass. 515, 1 Am. Rep. 137; Fleeman v. McKean, 25 Barb. 474; 24 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 1065.

The plaintiff in error insists that he was not in possession, custody, or control of the property when the suit was brought, and therefore there could be no recovery against him. This contention is unsound. If it were sustained, every defendant in a trover suit could defeat a recovery by showing that the conversion was complete before the action was brought. On the contrary, the conversion furnishes a basis for bringing the suit. Apparently the right of a person who has been incarcerated under bail process, and who is neither able to give security nor produce the property, upon showing to the presiding judge satisfactory reasons for the non-production to be discharged from custody, has been confused with the idea of defending against the recovery of a verdict in the main suit. Civ. Code 1895, § 4608, which regulates such a proceeding for discharge, expressly declares that it shall not in any way affect the right of the plaintiff upon the trial of the question of property involved in the suit. If the property has been placed beyond the reach of the plaintiff and defendant, and is in the hands of a third person from whom it cannot be recovered, this may perhaps affect the right to claim a verdict for the property itself, but would not destroy the right to recover a money verdict.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.
